Rubinstein's earlier recording of the D minor Brahms (with Fritz Reiner conducting) had a little difficulty in making up its mind whether to be primarily lyrical or dramatic. Though Rubinstein's conception has changed little since 1954, the emphasis has shifted decisively towards introspection. Here he gives a worldlywise, romantically mellow reading of this turbulent outpouring from Brahms's youthful years. He prefers to stress the golden autumnal majesty and glowing tonal colors of the writing, leaving it to the younger artists who have recorded the work—such as Leon Fleisher—to storm the heavens. Though such episodes as the double octaves in the first movement which marshall in the development section might sound a trifle cautious and constrained here when heard alongside the explosive freneticism of some other performances, the impression left by Rubinstein's interpretation is one of sustained beauty rather than any lack of power. According to informed sources, this performance comes from a memorable recording session in April of 1964 and was virtually unrehearsed. It stands, then, as a lasting tribute to the miracles sometimes wrought by sheer inspiration: Leinsdorf's accompaniment, effusive and impulsive, is most atypical of this ordinarily objective and punctilious maestro and is all to the benefit of Brahms.

The recorded sound in both formats is absolutely magnificent. In sum, this is a disc to treasure alongside the Fleisher/Szell (Epic), the Curzon/Szell (London), and the Arrau/Giulini (Angel). In its gracious plasticity, it resembles the last-named most closely.

H.G.

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

FEB 1967

Rubinstein, Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor. Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf.

RCA Victor LSC 2917 stereo

Ah—up with high priced records and down with all cheap labels! That's the inevitable and healthy reaction to this superb, but necessarily high-priced item, with RCA's ever-improving mainstay pianist, Arthur Rubinstein. You can't have Rubinstein for peanuts. Not even for $2.50. He's worth double.

There's a long, passionate orchestral introduction to this concerto. When, at last Rubinstein's piano enters, you know instantly that he has been following every second of the music, that he's with it—a part of the whole. So many of the brilliant young prize winners sit there, figuratively, saying just wait until they hear ME. That's how they sound.

There's a famous long solo melody here, too, one of those massive Brahms piano themes that knock you for a loop when you first hear them. Rubinstein plays it with all his persuasiveness—but how wonderfully it fades down, suddenly, at the end, to meet the incoming orchestra at exactly the right piano volume. He's with it again.

Rubinstein does better than the Boston here, and better than Leinsdorf himself; but it doesn't matter. The concerto is far and away ahead of a hundred lesser versions with men of less profound experience than Rubinstein in his supervital old age.

E.T.C.

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 146,624 SUN. 215,445

FEB 19 1967

From RCA comes the Brahms First Piano Concerto with Arturo Rubinstein, accompanied by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. This is a magnificent performance, full-blown, outgoing, brimming with life and vitality. RCA's sound is bright and spacious. The competition is very tough, including Rubinstein's own mono recording with Reiner and the Chicago Symphony. Reiner has a little more personality to offer than does Leinsdorf, but those insisting on stereo will find the new recording perfectly satisfactory. Serkin/Ormandy (Columbia) is also in the same league, and Curzon/Szell (London) is close.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 66,826 SUN. 200,259

JAN 15 1967

RUBINSTEIN, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra combine on RCA album LSC-2917 to do honor to Johannes Brahms and his Concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15. It is superb music. In this interpretation we hear maturity of musicianship, perfection of technique and a joy of performance which would be hard to match. The lovely slow movement is supposed to be a dedication by the composer to his dear friend, Clara Schumann. These musicians make it a dedication to a masterpiece of the Romantic School of writing.

The Houston Post
D. 267,620 SUN. 289,009

FEB 5 1967

Records

Leinsdorf, Previn Albums Out

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

If its recent releases are any indication, RCA Victor is much concerned these days with something called "The Symphony in Retrospect." They've come up with three recordings focusing on this subject — Bruckner's "Romantic" Symphony with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (stereo LSC-2915), Strauss's "Alpine" Symphony with Rudolf Kempe and the Royal Philharmonic (stereo LSC-2923) and Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony with Andre Previn and the London Symphony (stereo LSC-2866). All three are available in monaural as well.

THERE ARE different values in operation here, both technical and musical. The Boston Symphony is always a joy to listen to, as much for its collective excellence as for the quality of its soloists. This is nowhere more apparent than the magnificent sound of James Stagliano's horn at the opening. Also, there is that sense of ensemble that can make a whole violin section perform as one man on a thrilled passage.

However, the symphony as a whole does not acquire meaningful momentum under Leinsdorf's baton, and thus Neville Cardus prophesies correctly on the jacket: "One has to be patient with Bruckner." Excellent in detail, but less so in its larger design.

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 12,800

FEB 24 1967

New England Newsclip

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
D. 12,500

FEB 24 1967

NEW YORK (UPI) —A record of "Music of Irving Fine" performed by the Boston Symphony faithfully traces the creative struggles of that talented and highly competent composer who died in 1962 before he was 48 years old.

The record has three of his mature pieces. The earliest is the "Toccata Concertante", which dates from 1947 and which is a mixture of the influences of Stravinsky and of the classical masters on the composer's own substance.

It is followed by "Serious Song For String Orchestra," a song serious to the point of gravity in which the composer was influencing originally the tonality of the old-line composers. It belongs to 1955. Then comes his full-scale symphony which he completed in the year of his death.

In that he is reconciling the traditional tonality with the seril atonal techniques of the revolutionist, Arnold Schoenberg. The three pieces together show what a conscientous composer he was. Forces were loose in his creative world and he did not avoid them.

You probably are impressed most of all by the energy which Fine generates from the orchestra. Even at his quietest, there is driving relentlessness as though the music had life quite its own. The technical excellencies are unvaried with anything less —he was called "a composer's composer" —but they're the least part of the total effect.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

FEB 1967

ⓢ|Ⓜ PROKOFIEV: Piano Concertos No. 1 and No. 2. John Browning (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2897 $5.79, LM 2897 $4.79.

Performance: Slick
Recording: Big sound
Stereo Quality: Rich

The first two Prokofiev concertos are essentially student works: big, clattering, brilliant, iconoclastic pieces dating from 1911 and 1913 (the latter rewritten in the Twenties after the loss of the original score), and intended to show the composer's pianistic and compositional wit, virtuosity, and modernity. They are a pair of awfully empty-headed pieces; adolescent brashness may have a certain freshness and vitality in a talented young artist, but it is hardly enough by itself to have an appeal for all time. I find the two pieces back to back a bit much.

In all fairness, it must be admitted that there will be those who will disagree (the first time around, at least, these pieces do have an impact). In any case, the Browning brilliance does make its mark here, and Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony—the recording is part of their continuing Prokofiev series—have the right amounts of restraint, articulation, and polished thrust to get a dazzling surface onto the music. There's almost too much glamour to the performance and the sound, but there's no doubt that, for what is intended, it works. The second side of my disc has an odd crackle-swish cycle all the way through, something like a heavy surface noise ingrained in a lateral band across the disc. Probably a pressing defect and very annoying too; check it before buying.

E. S.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750

JAN 3 1967

New England Newsclip

New BSO recording

Fine's arboretum

By Richard J. Cattani

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Irving Fine (1914-1962) tended his compositions with the utmost in patience. He was a superb musical gardener. Gently he questioned each new shoot. With integrity he weeded out any aberrant phrase.

Yet he did not tamper with what was musically true. He had learned what the Spanish poet Juan Ramón Jiménez said about a poem's arriving of itself to completion: "Do not touch it any more, for that is how a rose is."

Aaron Copland, in a warm tribute to Fine, said: "To my mind his outstanding quality was his musical sensitivity—he had an ear that one could trust. His students and his fellow composers depended on him to tell the truth about their music, and in the sureness and rightness of his judgment we recognized ourselves."

Though appreciated as a composer's composer, Fine will probably continue to be thought of as 'minor" — like most other American composers so far. He was highly eclectic. He did not stake out and tame vast wilderness areas like a Bach or a Beethoven. He will not give his name to a forest of followers as has Stravinsky — himself a strong influence on Fine.

Fine's music will be thought of perhaps in terms of an arboretum. Modest in scope yet well tended.

Fine, Toccata Concertante, Serious Song for String Orchestra, Symphony 1962: Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, Irving Fine, conductors (RCA, stereo LSC-2829).

Fine's chamber music and songs have received more attention lately than his symphonic works. This album evens the balance with an excellent sampling from each of Fine's productive decades.

The Toccata was composed in 1947 when he was 32. Stravinskyesque, it shows the neoclassicism of this phase of Fine's work. It courses off athletically, elbows akimbo. It has drive, and humor tempered by style. Serge Koussevitzky first conducted it in October, 1948, with the Boston Symphony. Since then the orchestra has been closely associated with Fine's work. For nine seasons, between 1946 and 1957, he was a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., the symphony's summer home. He also taught at Harvard and Brandeis universities near Boston.

The Serious Song is a totally tonal work, written in 1955 during a period when Fine was immersed in 12-tone and serial composition. Fine felt pulled by both the tonal and atonal methods of writing. This tension gave birth to his most important work, the Symphony 1962. The Serious Song, vocal in texture, portrays the tonal direction. It is at once urgent and elegiac. Commissioned and given its first performance by the Louisville Philharmonic, it is here clearly defined by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

In many ways Fine's last work, the Symphony, completed in 1962, was his most impressive and most puzzling. Here conducted by the composer at Tanglewood in August of that summer, it suggests the opening of new roads.

Copland rightly notes the symphony's strongly dramatic, almost operatic gestures, its restlessness. It is emotionally outreaching. It shows that Fine was more than a craftsman, perhaps on the brink of works with unique musical substance.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 2,683,000

FEB 10 1967

Music of Irving Fine—Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf. [RCA Victor LSC 2829]. Many musicians and critics consider Fine one of the most gifted U.S. composers of the past 20 years—even though, outside of Boston, Fine's music rarely got a hearing before his untimely death in 1962 at age 48. Now, thanks to Brandeis University (under whose auspices the funds for this recording became available), the general public can hear three of his most representative works: the Toccata Concertante (1947), Serious Song—A Lament for Orchestra (1955), and his [illegible] Symphony (1962). The symphony has [illegible] with [illegible]nalism, doing it in a provocatively interesting way. The composer himself conducts the symphony (from a 1962 Tanglewood performance); Leinsdorf leads the other works.

(R.H.)

153

San Francisco Examiner-Chronicle
SUN. 750,000

NOV 20 1966

Brahms' Youthful Sparkle ...Other Classical LPs

By Heuwell Tircuit

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1. (Arthur Rubinstein, piano; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Boston Symphony Orchestra.) RCA Victor Mono LM-2917, Stereo LSC-2917.

JOHANNES BRAHMS

Brahms was 26 when he premiered his First Concerto, and much indebted to the styles of both Schumann and Chopin. Now we have this second recording by the leading Chopin pianist, and with a remarkable sense of youthful sparkle. Rubinstein plays the Concerto across the top of the keys, emphasizing pastoral lyricism rather than the brute rage of the work.

Leinsdorf's Brahms tends to be broad and expressive, contrary to his more common coldness. And these two elements joined together result in a very convincing if unique approach to the Brahms First Concerto. You will likely want to keep one of the heroic performances (Serkin's or Cliburn's are best), but this will make a fine second copy.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 105,700

MAY 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Recordings

[redacted] may not be as popular with music lovers as the composer's other three, but it has been my favorite for many years. The three mighty opening chords and the several bars which follow are grandeur itself, and the chromatic sweeps in the same first movement can really stir the soul.

The Brahms Third is performed on an RCA Victor album with Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. The orchestra plays well, but Leinsdorf seems less inspired than usual. Some of the dramatic passages sound pedestrian. Rounding out the album is Brahms' Tragic Overture, which comes off much better.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714

APR 1 1967

[redacted] No. 3; "Tragic Overture." Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC-2936 (stereo), LM-2936 (monaural). There are a lot of recordings of Brahms' Third, so it's hard to get too excited about another one. How[redacted] Leinsdorf and his [redacted] fine [redacted] always [redacted] This [redacted] as [redacted] and [redacted] Kle[redacted] good record, well worth adding to one's library.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,450

MAY 17 1967 New England Newsclip

ARCHIVES ON TAPE — Boston Symphony Orchestra archives have been placed in the Mugar Memorial Library at Boston University. Daniel J. Koury (right) holds a tape recording of a symphony concert, while he chats with Dr. Howard B. Gotlieb, director of the library's special collections division. Koury lives at 14 Cherry Road, Beverly and has bachelor of music and master of fine arts degrees.

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900

MAY 13 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Archives Now on Deposit At B.U. Library

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has designated Boston University's Mugar Memorial Library as the repository for the orchestra's archives that date back to 1881.

The musical material includes tape recordings, programs and original manuscripts such as that of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

The announcement of the transfer of the archives to Boston University came from Dr. Gustave A. Harrer, director of libraries, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Harrer emphasized that the collection is "not a gift, but simply on deposit."

All tape recordings of orchestra radio broadcasts since 1958, estimated at nearly 450, are in the audio department of the library. In addition there are several commercial recordings and 37 programs on video tape.

A complete set of programs dates back to 1881, when the orchestra was founded and played its first concert in October in the old Boston Music Hall.

The archives contain several hand-copied scores of operas of the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

"Symphony of Psalms," a choral work, was composed by Stravinsky on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

APR 16 1967

Irving Fine's Second Symphony is released by Boston

Usually it is the small recording company, the esoteric label that dares to produce new and unfamiliar music, but the picture has changed enough to be encouraging. Sometimes a foundation will sponsor a major label recording of a new work and occasionally someone on the inside has a hunch that commercial success will meet a new work.

So a trickle of new things comes along. One of the most interesting recent releases is a disc of the music of Irving Fine (RCA Victor LSC 2829) played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fine had close ties with the BSO and, until his untimely death in 1962, had been a [redacted] a summer facet of his work as professor at [redacted] versity.

His music had the stamp of originality, the weight of an independent mind sifting and discarding styles. By the time he came to write the Symphony No. 2, heard here in a Tanglewood performance conducted by the composer, he had embarked on a synthesis of serialism and a basic melodic gift which contained the seeds of greatness. The Symphony, this recording and his death all occurred in 1962 and sharpen the sense of loss.

The performance is lean and alive. The music demands nothing less, and Fine touches here the springs that flood the performance with colors and vitality. The three movements represent contrasting forms and the third, "Ode," is a deeply moving unit, an enticing summation of a growing talent.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts two other works which trace Fine's development, the Tocatta (1947) and "Serious Song" (1955).

The "Serious Song" is a substantial instrumental work within a neo-classic framework and with many of the gestures common to the idiom, but still with an independent point of view. The Tocatta is less important, a busy virtuoso piece that leaves a lighter impression. Performances are vivid with Leinsdorf's meticulous hand producing lucent sound.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100

APR 2 1967 New England Newsclip

[redacted] the Brahms Third Symphony by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is available on a recent RCA issue (LM-LSC-2936). Wide-ranged dynamics and fine balance contribute to the excellent sound on this disc which is filled out with the Tragic Overture.

153

San Francisco
Examiner-Chronicle
SUN. 750,000

NOV 20 1966

Brahms' Youthful Sparkle ...Other Classical LPs

By Heuwell Tircuit

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1. (Arthur Rubinstein, piano; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Boston Symphony Orchestra.) RCA Victor Mono LM-2917, Stereo LSC-2917.

JOHANNES BRAHMS

Brahms was 26 when he premiered his First Concerto, and much indebted to the styles of both Schumann and Chopin. Now we have this second recording by the leading Chopin pianist, and with a remarkable sense of youthful sparkle. Rubinstein plays the Concerto across the top of the keys, emphasizing pastoral lyricism rather than the brute rage of the work.

Leinsdorf's Brahms tends to be broad and expressive, contrary to his more common coldness. And these two elements joined together result in a very convincing if unique approach to the Brahms First Concerto. You will likely want to keep one of the heroic performances (Serkin's or Cliburn's are best), but this will make a fine second copy.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 105,700

MAY 21 1967

New England Newsclip

Recordings

[redacted] may not be as popular with music lovers as the composer's other three, but it has been my favorite for many years. The three mighty opening chords and the several bars which follow are grandeur itself, and the chromatic sweeps in the same first movement can really stir the soul.

The Brahms Third is performed on an RCA Victor album with Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony. The orchestra plays well, but Leinsdorf seems less inspired than usual. Some of the dramatic passages sound pedestrian. Rounding out the album is Brahms' Tragic Overture, which comes off much better.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714

APR 1 1967

[redacted] Symphony No. 3; "Tragic Overture." Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC-2936 (stereo), LM-2936 (monaural). There are a lot of recordings of Brahms' Third, so it's hard to get too excited about another one. However, Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra give it a fine reading — [redacted] always [redacted] This version [redacted] as the Toscanini [redacted] and not as [redacted] the Klemperer [redacted] But it's a good record, well worth adding to one's library.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,450

MAY 17 1967

New England Newsclip

ARCHIVES ON TAPE — Boston Symphony Orchestra archives have been placed in the Mugar Memorial Library at Boston University. Daniel J. Koury (right) holds a tape recording of a symphony concert, while he chats with Dr. Howard B. Gotlieb, director of the library's special collections division. Koury lives at 14 Cherry Road, Beverly and has bachelor of music and master of fine arts degrees.

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900

MAY 13 1967

New England Newsclip

BSO Archives Now on Deposit At B.U. Library

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has designated Boston University's Mugar Memorial Library as the repository for the orchestra's archives that date back to 1881.

The musical material includes tape recordings, programs and original manuscripts such as that of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

The announcement of the transfer of the archives to Boston University came from Dr. Gustave A. Harrer, director of libraries, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Harrer emphasized that the collection is "not a gift, but simply on deposit."

All tape recordings of orchestra radio broadcasts since 1958, estimated at nearly 450, are in the audio department of the library. In addition there are several commercial recordings and 37 programs on video tape.

A complete set of programs dates back to 1881, when the orchestra was founded and played its first concert in October in the old Boston Music Hall.

The archives contain several hand-copied scores of operas of the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

"Symphony of Psalms," a choral work, was composed by Stravinsky on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the orchestra.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

APR 16 1967

Irving Fine's Second Symphony is released by Boston

Usually it is the small recording company, the esoteric label that dares to produce new and unfamiliar music, but the picture has changed enough to be encouraging. Sometimes a foundation will sponsor a major label recording of a new work and occasionally someone on the inside has a hunch that commercial success will meet a new work.

So a trickle of new things comes along. One of the most interesting recent releases is a disc of the music of Irving Fine (RCA Victor LSC 2829) played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fine had close ties with the BSO and, until his untimely death in 1962, had been a faculty member [redacted] a summer facet of his work as professor at Brandeis University.

His music had the stamp of originality, the weight of an independent mind sifting and discarding styles. By the time he came to write the Symphony No. 2, heard here in a Tanglewood performance conducted by the composer, he had embarked on a synthesis of serialism and a basic melodic gift which contained the seeds of greatness. The Symphony, this recording and his death all occurred in 1962 and sharpen the sense of loss.

The performance is lean and alive. The music demands nothing less, and Fine touches here the springs that flood the performance with colors and vitality. The three movements represent contrasting forms and the third, "Ode," is a deeply moving unit, an enticing summation of a growing talent.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts two other works which trace Fine's development, the Tocatta (1947) and "Serious Song" (1955).

The "Serious Song" is a substantial instrumental work within a neo-classic framework and with many of the gestures common to the idiom, but still with an independent point of view. The Tocatta is less important, a busy virtuoso piece that leaves a lighter impression. Performances are vivid with Leinsdorf's meticulous hand producing lucent sound.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100

APR 2 1967

New England Newsclip

[redacted] the Brahms Third Symphony by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is available on a recent RCA issue (LM-LSC-2936). Wide-ranged dynamics and fine balance contribute to the excellent sound on this disc which is filled out with the Tragic Overture.

CAPITOL NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, December 4, 1966

RECORDINGS

Chamber Music for The Not-So-Casual Listener

By JOAN SIMMONS

A new recording by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players is a superb illustration of the philosophy of this particular group of artists. Consisting of nine first-desk musicians with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chamber Players were founded two years ago with the express purpose of providing these first-rate musicians with the opportunity and satisfaction of exercising and displaying their individual virtuosity that is so often overlooked in the size and swell of a major orchestra.

Under the direction of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO, the Chamber Players have enjoyed a highly successful career, the reasons for which are quite clear in their latest recording (Boston Symphony Chamber Players, RCA Victor Red Seal Dynagroove, LSC-6167, stereo, LM6167, mono.)

Just as the artistry of the musicians is not that of the casual player this album is not intended for the casual listener who is relatively uninitiated into the special joys of the world of chamber music. But this does not mean it will please only the expert musicologist.

Fourth Record

The three records of chamber music are accompanied by a fourth disc which presents Joseph Silverstein, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the BSO, and Peter Ustinov, amateur chamber music lover who has also written the accompanying notes and commentary.

PIANIST CLAUDE FRANK—"Tremendously gifted . . . has a marvelous control of his instrument, one which allows him to be equally effective whether as soloist or in accompaniment with other instruments . . ."

In this brief recorded discussion and demonstration Ustinov gives his personal outlook on the value and function of chamber music for both the musician and the listener. Chamber music, according to Ustinov, as a listener, is his favorite amateur pastime in other words, something that he loves but is not necessarily good at. So for the musician, Ustinov believes that chamber music has a special place for one who plays with love but not necessarily much adeptness.

The remainder of this explanatory recording is devoted to a discussion of some of the chamber works included in the album with Leinsdorf, Silverstein and Ustinov providing personal outlooks on various features. The discussion is interspersed with brief excerpts from the works under discussion for the further illucidation of the listener.

Moderns and Masters

The contents of the album balance the traditional masters with outstanding modern composers. Three of the artists represented are still alive and a fourth died in 1962.

On the other side of the ledger are Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. Mozart is the undisputed favorite of Ustinov ("he is my god, if I have a god among the masters") and is therefore most lavishly discussed in the notes while Brahms and Beethoven, each of whom inspires a certain hesitancy in Ustinov, although certainly not in the rendition of the Chamber Players, are less favorably presented. But it must be kept in mind that Ustinov is offering only his personal opinion and that of a devoted amateur, as he says himself.

Mozart is represented by two Quartets for unusual combinations, the first in D for Flute and Oboe, K. 285, and the second in F for Oboe and Strings. The flute is played with extraordinary beauty and sensitivity by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the only female member of the ensemble and the first woman to become a principal player with the orchestra. Paired with the strings the flute affects a new and different union, one not natural to strings and woodwinds, we are assured by Silverstein.

Beauty, Profundity

Ralph Gomberg on the oboe plays much the same role in his cooperation with the strings, a role which evokes the simple beauty of Mozart while revealing the profundity beneath. In addition to violinist Silverstein, strings include violist Burton Fine, cellist Jules Eskin and bassist Georges Moleux.

Brahms' Quartet in C minor for Piano and Strings, Op. 60, presents the tremendously gifted pianist Claude Frank. Although not a regular member of the Symphony or the Players, Frank has often appeared with both, being the official pianist for the Players.

Frank has a marvelous control of his instrument, one which allows him to be equally effective whether as soloist or in accompaniment with other instruments as he is in the Brahms Quartet.

Beethoven's Serenade for Flute, Violin and Viola is very much a light-hearted song with the emphasis on feeling of the Players rather than correctness. They have far surpassed the workmanlike stage which deprives chamber music of its pleasure when played by lesser musicians.

In the contemporary grouping are Irving Fine, Elliot Carter, Piston and Copland. Fine is represented by his Fantasia for String Trio, written just five years before his death. Fine leaves a relatively small collection of works, but like this trio they all have a personal urgency so that one never feels that his music is merely prattling.

Copland's Vitebsk — Study a Jewish Theme was written at a period when Copland was no longer a French composer and not yet an American. The tone is still influenced by a French air, almost as much Jewish.

The contents of this album and its professional expertness are meant for the special pleasure of the connoisseur of chamber music or the serious amateur eager to learn more.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
JAN 1967

STRAVINSKY: Agon. SCHULLER: Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2879 $5.79, LM 2879 $4.79. One of Stravinsky's late-period masterpieces—judged as a ballet score or as abstract music—together with an effective, colorful work by one of the talented younger American composers.

ERICH LEINSDORF
Conducts Symphony

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER-ENQUIRER
SUN. 57,500
OCT 30 1966

Hi-Fi Highlight

Boston Symphony Is in Forefront of U.S. Orchestras

BY CARROLL LISBY

Brahms: Symphony No. 4 in E Minor; Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5 in E Minor; Shostakovich: Symphony No. 9, performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, RCA Victor (three-record set; VCM-6174)

Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, performed by Artur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, RCA Victor (LM-2917, stereo LSC-2917)

For as far back as anyone can remember the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in the forefront of American orchestras.

This pre-eminence is due largely to two things:

1. The outstanding musical ability of the symphony members.

2. The genius of the men who have conducted the orchestra.

The roster of musical directors of the Boston Symphony reads like a who's who of conductors and includes Pierre Monteaux, Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf.

These new RCA Victor albums spotlight the orchestra during two of its periods of greatest achievement — 1939-47 under Koussevitzky and 1966 under Leinsdorf.

Koussevitzky, who directed the Boston Symphony for a quarter century (1924-49), was one of the most respected and influential musicians of his day.

His deep love of music and passion for perfection are reflected in the fine performances in this three-record boxed set.

The orchestra plays three complete symphonies—Brahms' 4th, Tchaikovsky's 5th and Shostakovich's 9th—plus four short pieces—Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Rachmaninoff's Vocalise, Op. 34, No. 14, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Battle of Kershenetz, Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings, Op. 35, and Foote's Suite for Strings in E, Op. 63.

Rubinstein, the premier pianist of our day, combines talents with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Brahms' Concerto No. 1 in D Minor in another LP release.

They give a beautiful, sensitive performance of what Rubinstein calls "my beloved Brahms concerto."

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN
Plays 'Beloved Brahms'

BOSTON SYMPHONY REHEARSES FOR CONCERT
It Ranks as One of Country's Finest Orchestras

155

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966

RCA VICTOR

Erich Leinsdorf records a well-microphoned Lohengrin in Boston's Symphony Hall.

Behind the scenes in CLASSICAL RECORDING

BRINKMANSHIP, DIPLOMACY, AND COMPROMISE PRESERVE THE TRUCE BETWEEN THE LIMITATIONS OF TECHNOLOGY AND THE DEMANDS OF MUSICAL TRADITION

By Jack Somer

THE LIBERTIES taken by some record companies in making their classical recordings are "... entirely unmusical. They prove either that the company making such recordings lacks artistic understanding or that it places economic considerations above the musical. Such policies may perhaps bring an initial profit, but they will surely embarrass their perpetrators in the end, when a gradually awakening public begins to recognize the impossibility of such instrumental manipulations."

This critical lament might possibly have been written yesterday, but the year was, surprisingly, 1909, and the German critic, Max Chop, was referring to the then-common practice of changing symphonic instrumentation to suit the severe limitations of the acoustic recording devices of the day. Early recording engineers found that the high-energy, low-frequency output of string basses and cellos could not be handled by the simple recording diaphragms available at that time without blotting out

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
SEPT 1966

reviewed by NATHAN BRODER
O. B. BRUMMELL
R. D. DARRELL
PETER G. DAVIS
SHIRLEY FLEMING
ALFRED FRANKENSTEIN

Records Reviewed

HARRIS GOLDSMITH
PHILIP HART
BERNARD JACOBSON
CONRAD L. OSBORNE
ERIC SALZMAN
JOHN S. WILSON

Symphony Hall: Leinsdorf leads three hundred strong.

OVER

by Conrad L. Osborne

Lohengrin in Its Entirety, with the Full Forces of Boston

IN VIEW OF the fact that HIGH FIDELITY's November issue will include a discography-in-depth of the available complete recordings of the Wagner operas, I shall confine myself to an over-all view of the new edition, saving comparisons for that occasion.

Two things are certain: 1) This is the most expensive opera recording in history, the use of the BSO and the Stateside recording location having sent its cost to something like double the normal expenditure for even an ambitious, glamorous recording, and 2) It is the first absolutely complete Lohengrin on records and, as nearly as can be determined, the first complete performance of it anywhere for very many years. This means that not only have all the frequent opera house cuts been restored (there is recorded precedent for that), but the second part of Lohengrin's Grail Narrative as well, which is not heard even at Bayreuth, and which is published as an appendix to the orchestral score. This comprises some choral wonderment over the first half of the narrative (the "In fernem Land," ending with "bin Lohengrin genannt," which is normally followed by the ensemble's "Hör ich so seine Art," etc., p. 359 of the partitur), and then some further explanation from Lohengrin, concerning just how and why he came to be sent in answer to Elsa's prayer. Musically, it is primarily a reworking of some of the principal motifs, such as that associated with the Swan; but it certainly has more interest and validity than some other pages of the score, and its final section ("Durch Flüsse und durch Meereswogen," p. 400) is quite beautiful—I am glad it has been recorded.

The set has two important things going for it, apart from any felicities one may find in the casting. These are, first, the recorded sound, which is characteristically Dynagroove in its bright, sometimes almost glary sound but which is unquestionably the clearest and most powerful of any of the recorded versions; and, second, the BSO itself, whose playing is in most respects head and shoulders above what we get even from good opera orchestras. One has only to hear the magnificent bronzed sound of the horns and (especially) the trombones at their entry on p. 4 in the prelude; the massed sound at the tutti a few bars later; the lucidity and shimmer on the violin tone at their sehr ruhig descent immediately following; or the wonderful execution of all the triplet sixteenths and thirty-seconds for trumpet and trombone as the King addresses his assembled vassals in the opening scene (pp. 12-13) to realize there is no substitute for a great orchestra, recorded with presence. The combination of orchestra and sound makes a tremendous impression at many points, the high-water mark being, perhaps, the transition music before the final scene—one can almost hear the bellowing sergeants and see the wagons sticking in the mud as the Brabantian army gathers at dawn for its campaign against the Hungarians.

Obviously, the playing of an orchestra must reflect on its permanent leader; so good things have already been said of Erich Leinsdorf—he has, after all, given us a superbly played Lohengrin. Yet if I were asked whether or not I liked his reading, my answer would have to be, on balance, no. It is fine on detail, fine when the clarity of a single line against another single line is what we want—the interplay in the light instrumentation of the Bridal Chamber duet, for instance, is beautifully balanced and pointed (again, the lovely playing doesn't hurt). But at many points (and many of the most crucial) Leinsdorf seems concerned with observing some letter of some law, rather than with creating a scene or with overwhelming us with the opera's beauty and power. It's like having a traffic cop on the Indianapolis Speedway.

Take three symptomatic examples from the first act: 1) The climax of Lohengrin's arrival, or specifically the beginning of the third scene, at his

155

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
SEPT 1966

7

For transistor amplifiers.
Main speaker systems: 4 ohms
One pair of extension speakers:
Either pair of speaker systems can be used alone, but not both pairs simultaneously.
R = 50-ohm, 5-watt resistors
Switch = double-pole, double-throw toggle switch

8

For transistor amplifiers.
Main speaker systems: 4 ohms
Two pairs of extension speakers:
Any pair of speakers can be used alone, or both pairs of extension speakers can be used simultaneously, but neither pair of extension speakers can be used simultaneously with the main speakers.
R = 50-ohm, 5-watt resistors
Switches = double-pole, double-throw toggle switches

9

For transistor amplifiers.
Main speaker systems: 8 ohms
One pair of extension speakers: 8 ohms
Either pair of speakers can be used alone, or both pairs simultaneously.
R = 50-ohm, 5-watt resistors
Switch = four-pole, three-position, non-shorting rotary switch (Mallory Type 3243J)

10

For transistor amplifiers.
Main speaker systems: 8 ohms
Two pairs of extension speakers: 8 ohms
Any pair of speakers can be used alone, or any two pairs can be used simultaneously, but not all three pairs simultaneously.
R = 50-ohm, 5-watt resistors
Switches = double-pole, double-throw toggle switches

chestra. So, string basses and cellos sed out of the orchestra and replaced though these gave the early discs a e bass, it was recognized by most (if ssity. It was the replacement of violins however, that really made Chop's hair inspired his passionate cry of foul. Un- on may be okay on the football field, but playing a Beethoven symphony!

tistic implications of that controversy are whether the perpetrators are embarrassed of recording remains still full of com- hough comparably primitive orchestral are not required today, electronic tech- finitely more sophisticated than the old , and a host of new manipulations has been technical evolution of recording. Today's d maker has many tools available to him— ed and provided by engineers—and it is maintenance, and imaginative use of these termines the quality of any record. Just what made of these tools is of course up to the ucer, and while the purists among them strive "concert-hall realism," the experimenters try d tradition and to succeed on their own terms ing violence to the music.

ky a-&-r man working in the pops field is not by these strictures of tradition. Each time he the studio he is, in the creative sense, reborn. masses of new material available to him. Even old song is cut for the umpteenth time, it is rranged with melodic and harmonic alterations, trumentation, and a fresh interpretive slant. Thus, market can sustain three hundred and fifty ver- f Begin the Beguine, three hundred of Jealousy, of Beatle tunes, and, in the first two years of its ver two hundred recordings of More, the theme the motion picture Mondo Cane. Virtually all popu- usic written and arranged today appears on records and that includes Broadway shows and film themes. e classical repertoire, as its somewhat tired name lies, has been around a long time, is steeped in tradi- , and was not written with the recording studio in d. The bulk of the classical repertoire now in the cata- was given to us during the eighteenth and nineteenth turies. In view of the fact that recording is a distinctly entieth-century phenomenon, the poor classical a-&-r an must devote his life to combining those irresistible rces of technical advance with that most immovable of bjects—tradition. In the following discussion it will be een how this impossibility is achieved, and how forces arger than men can and do make themselves felt and, of course, heard.

Having had a symphony orchestra of about one hundred men dropped in his lap, the first problem the a-&-r man faces is where to put them. This has usually already been "solved" by the founding fathers of the orchestra who have built a fine concert hall, with plush maroon and gold interior—and terrible acoustics for recording. The brilliant Philadelphia Orchestra, for example, doesn't make its recordings at home in the Academy of Music because the men of Columbia Records find the hall too "dry" (lacking in reverberation) for recording. Although the Chicago and Cleveland orchestras are more fortunate, Pittsburgh's is not. The New York Philharmonic also has had its acoustic dilemmas. In recent years (before the completion of Philharmonic Hall) the orchestra made its records in Manhattan Center, an old ballroom and union meeting hall noted for its spectacular reverberation. When the orchestra moved to Lincoln Center and faced the much-publicized acoustic mess, Columbia Records gamely tried to make a go of it but was forced to return to Manhattan Center for record sessions until improvements were made uptown. The Philharmonic has now returned to recording in the reworked hall, but there is little doubt that at some time when the Columbia staff feels the need for a grander, nobler acoustic for some large-scale work, they will return to Manhattan Center and obtain a sound that, alas, may never be attainable in Philharmonic Hall.

In Boston, the Symphony's recordings are made "at home" in majestic Symphony Hall, whose acoustics are among the best in the world. However, a brief history of Boston's quest for brilliant sound serves to illustrate the further problems faced by record makers: location of the orchestra within the hall, placement of microphones, and acoustic adjustment of the hall itself. Early Boston records were made with the orchestra on stage, seated as in concert. The microphones were placed above and in front of the orchestra to best translate the music and hall acoustics. During the sound-conscious Fifties, the men of RCA Victor found that by moving the orchestra out onto the floor of the hall (after removing twenty or thirty rows of seats) the microphones picked up more of the hall's splendid reverberation, and the result was a more exciting and sumptuous sound. Under the leadership of Charles Munch, the orchestra thus made some of its finest recordings (though there were ensemble problems at first resulting from the wider separation of sections). At the insistence of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra was returned to the stage for recordings. He felt more at home there, and the introduction of risers under the rear sections of the orchestra helped the orchestra project more into the hall and regain some of the lost reverberation. Since the summer of 1965 (when Lohengrin was taped in Boston) the Boston Symphony has once again been recorded on the floor because of the general recognition that the most brilliant, powerful, and vivid sound can be obtained only that way.

From the above, it should be obvious that the most

reviewed by NATHAN BROD
O. B. BRUMME
R. D. DARRE
PETER G. DAV
SHIRLEY FLEMIN
ALFRED FRANKENSTE

Symphony Hall: Leinsdorf

Lohengrin in Its

In view of the fact that High Fidelity's November issue will include a discography-in-depth of the available complete recordings of the Wagner operas, I shall confine myself to an over-all view of the new edition, saving comparisons for that occasion.

Two things are certain: 1) This is the most expensive opera recording in history, the use of the BSO and the Stateside recording location having sent its cost to something like double the normal expenditure for even an ambitious, glamorous recording, and 2) It is the first absolutely complete Lohengrin on records and, as nearly as can be determined, the first complete performance of it anywhere for very many years. This means that not only have all the frequent opera house cuts been restored (there is recorded precedent for that), but the second part of Lohengrin's Grail Narrative as well, which is not heard even at Bayreuth, and which is published as an appendix to the orchestral score. This comprises some choral wonderment over the first half of the narrative (the "In fernem Land," ending with "bin Lohengrin genannt," which is normally followed by the ensemble's "Hör ich so seine Art," etc., p. 359 of the partitur), and then some further explanation from Lohengrin, concerning just how and why he came to be sent in answer to Elsa's

155

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966

55

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
SEPT 1966

important factor in creating a rich classical sound is the control of the ratio of direct to reverberant (reflected) sound. Insufficient reverberation creates a "small," dry sound, unsatisfying in scope and brilliance. Excessive reverberation produces a washed-out quality, lacking in presence and solidity. In the case of halls with long, full reverberation, it is often necessary for the engineers to deliberately destroy some of that quality by hanging absorbent drapes and covering over the reflective surfaces. This is often required to compensate for the absence of a sound-absorbing audience, which affects concert-hall acoustics considerably. And, as if there aren't enough headaches in making records, it must be remembered that atmospheric conditions—the weather—seriously affect hall acoustics as well, and these day-to-day variations must be compensated for. Finally, the music itself will dictate sensible acoustics: a Mozart symphony will not float airily if too much reverberation is pulled in by the microphones, but a Berlioz work can hardly have enough.

Ultimately, it is the number and the placement of microphones that define the sound character. Most recording is done on three-track tape or film, so the minimum number of microphones for that—three—has become a standard. The microphones are hung 10 to 20 feet above the orchestra and in a pattern that simply divides the musicians into left, center, and right groups, corresponding to the tracks on the tape. When placed well, three microphones will amply translate the full, balanced power of an orchestra (or chamber group or piano solo) to tape. Often, it is necessary to add supplementary microphones within the orchestra. These extras, called "touch-up" microphones, are operated at lower output levels than the main set of three, and are used to add a bit more presence and control to the instruments in the rear of the orchestra (brasses, percussion, and string basses). The more complex the score, the greater the need for touching up.

"Purist" producers prefer to use only two or three microphones. The rest, like their popular-music brethren, will use any number that will give them the sound they want. The recent Columbia recording of Charles Ives' Fourth Symphony, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, required as many as twelve microphones, and the brilliant score was done great justice. Naturally, concertos and vocal-orchestral works require an additional solo microphone. And an opera, that most monstrous of recording undertakings, demands a complex of microphones, particularly if it is to be staged.

Even though the forces are more complex in classical recording than in pops, the operation itself is simpler. Usually, the performers are at home with the music to be played—unlike the pop orchestra, which is usually seeing the musical arrangement for the first time at the recording session. The orchestra sets right to work by recording a portion of the music for a test, which is played back to the conductor. Any differences are [illegible], sound quality, and special effects conductor and a-&-r man, who will [illegible] more "commercial." In making classi- changes in the physical setup or comp[illegible]ustment is usually not required. Very formance. If the balance, for example, [illegible]vels and balances even in the studio, to the conductor, changes can be mad[illegible]ice of remixing to set balance between gineer or by the conductor. Mutual ex[illegible]gle track) and orchestra (on the other fidence will dictate which method will [illegible]een abused. Why, then, do most record conductors prefer to record as much as [illegible]ally remix their product, and what are playbacks, and then remake those portio[illegible] and disadvantages—of this process? improvement. In this way, the final maste[illegible]an, historically, as a protective measure. consists of a complete "take" with smal[illegible]ys of tape recording, acetate tape was prefer to record progressively—they beg[illegible] vulnerable to use—the inevitable mishan- ning, stop when the going gets bad, a[illegible]le human error could ruin a whole tape. point just before the breakdown. [illegible] were copied and (as was often necessary) Reduced to an absurd simplification, [illegible]n copies" were used to replace whole or recording session is to cut enough takes [illegible]tions of master tapes. Inevitably, some measure (and every note) to be recorded [illegible]producer found that he could "improve" his at least one take in which it is played correc[illegible]g the copying, and so remixing was born. fully, beautifully. The session isn't over u[illegible]xing is further required because most original complished, the exception being the occas[illegible] done on half-inch-wide three-track tape which many dollars of overtime would have to be [illegible]o handle in mass-producing disc masters. The rect a minor mistake or two. In this latter c[illegible]ess produces quarter-inch tapes with all the de- dent a-&-r man will make do with what he ha[illegible]ies of sound and balance, and the original tape the protests of the artist. Of course, the bigges[illegible] a protection. sometimes prevail, and the money will be spen[illegible] unfortunate. Perhaps some day all record com- Editing can easily require more of the a-&-r [illegible]ill realize that the less done to a record, the than any other step in the recording process. [illegible]he better it will be. The fact is that the remixing men will spend days just listening over and [illegible]can do more harm than good. This has been takes to be sure that they have chosen the best o[illegible] by those few companies that have dropped the the final choice is made, the tedious splicing [illegible]pe[illegible] entirely—at the cost of some inconvenience, but gins. This consists of the delicate excision of [illegible]eat strides forward in quality. Strictly speaking, that are not up to the high standard of the re[illegible]xtra step in the making of a record tends to reduce formance, and their replacement by the "impro[illegible] somewhat. Every microphone, electron tube, coil, sages from other takes.

THIS process is both remarkable and contro[illegible] remarkable because the engineer is dealing with [illegible] of a very few thousandths of an inch. In ord[illegible] a splice work, both pieces of tape must be cut at the [illegible]cal instant in time. However, no orchestra ma[illegible] human beings can be expected to play twice with [illegible] precision just for the sake of editing, and it is a [illegible] the surgical and musical skills of the engineer and [illegible] man to find the literal split second that will make [illegible] tapes match. The success of this fantastic and pr[illegible] operation is best illustrated by a recently released o[illegible] recording in which there are well over four hundred spl[illegible] —and not one of them is detectable. The controversy o[illegible] whether to splice or not boils down to this: does [illegible] record-buying public want musical performances [illegible] are studded with obvious bobbles and goofs which will [illegible] there to be heard and winced at for the life of the record[illegible] The record companies obviously think not.

The final step in making a record is the mastering o[illegible] remixing. With popular records, it is a matter of fine adtransformer, tape-recording head, and reel of tape is imperfect in some small degree and introduces minute distortions into the musical signal. The most imperfect devices in the chain are the transducers, and the by-passing of the remix step eliminates two tape heads in the chain, not to mention numerous electronic stages.

In a very sophisticated recording process (see accompanying figure), it is likely that the sound impinging on any microphone will have to pass through no less than six transducers (one microphone, four tape heads, and a disc cutter), twenty to thirty transformers, and forty to fifty stages of amplification. If each of these devices introduces even an infinitesimal quantity of frequency-response alteration, waveform, harmonic, or phase distortion, and also a bit of system noise, it is easy to see how a signal can deteriorate as it is processed. This not only is a clear argument for the elimination of steps and stages in the process, but also indicates the tremendous importance of equipment quality and maintenance in the recording studio.

ANOTHER important personage in the already crowded chain of command is the chief engineer, who selects and buys every microphone, tube, tape head, amplifier, cutter, etc. He also designs the circuits in which the components operate and modifies commercial components to suit his own or his firm's electronic "philosophy." The total effect of his work produces a distinct "company coloration" in the recorded sound. The company sound is simply derived from the total of the characteristic imperfections of its equipment, and is eminently recognizable. All record buyers have avoided the purchase of some particular label's product from time to time because there was something

This diagram of a "very sophisticated recording process" gives some idea of the number of possible steps between microphone and record cutter. To this must be added the many processes of record manufacturing—and of cartridge, amplifier, and speakers.

reviewed by NATHAN BROD
O. B. BRUMME
R. D. DARRE
PETER G. DAV
SHIRLEY FLEMIN
ALFRED FRANKENSTE

Symphony Hall: Leinsdorf

Lohengrin in Its

IN VIEW OF the fact that HIGH FIDELITY's November issue will include a discography-in-depth of the available complete recordings of the Wagner operas, I shall confine myself to an over-all view of the new edition, saving comparisons for that occasion.

Two things are certain: 1) This is the most expensive opera recording in history, the use of the BSO and the Stateside recording location having sent its cost to something like double the normal expenditure for even an ambitious, glamorous recording, and 2) It is the first absolutely complete Lohengrin on records and, as nearly as can be determined, the first complete performance of it anywhere for very many years. This means that not only have all the frequent opera house cuts been restored (there is recorded precedent for that), but the second part of Lohengrin's Grail Narrative as well, which is not heard even at Bayreuth, and which is published as an appendix to the orchestral score. This comprises some choral wonderment over the first half of the narrative (the "In fernem Land," ending with "bin Lohengrin genannt," which is normally followed by the ensemble's "Hör ich so seine Art," etc., p. 359 of the partitur), and then some further explanation from Lohengrin, concerning just how and why he came to be sent in answer to Elsa's

155

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
SEPT 1966

important factor in creating a rich classical sound is the control of the ratio of direct to reverberant (reflected) sound. Insufficient reverberation creates a "small," dry sound, unsatisfying in scope and brilliance. Excessive reverberation produces a washed-out quality, lacking in presence and solidity. In the case of halls with long, full reverberation, it is often necessary for the engineers to deliberately destroy some of that quality by hanging absorbent drapes and covering over the reflective surfaces. This is often required to compensate for the absence of a sound-absorbing audience, which affects concert-hall acoustics considerably. And, as if there aren't enough headaches in making records, it must be remembered that atmospheric conditions—the weather—seriously affect hall acoustics as well, and these day-to-day variations must be compensated for. Finally, the music itself will dictate sensible acoustics: a Mozart symphony will not float airily if too much reverberation is pulled in by the microphones, but a Berlioz work can hardly have enough.

Ultimately, it is the number and the placement of microphones that define the sound character. Most recording is done on three-track tape or film, so the minimum number of microphones for that—three—has become a standard. The microphones are hung 10 to 20 feet above the orchestra and in a pattern that simply divides the musicians into left, center, and right groups, corresponding to the tracks on the tape. When placed well, three microphones will amply translate the full, balanced power of an orchestra (or chamber group or piano solo) to tape. Often, it is necessary to add supplementary microphones within the orchestra. These extras, called "touch-up" microphones, are operated at lower output levels than the main set of three, and are used to add a bit more presence and control to the instruments in the rear of the orchestra (brasses, percussion, and string basses). The more complex the score, the greater the need for touching up.

"Purist" producers prefer to use only two or three microphones. The rest, like their popular-music brethren, will use any number that will give them the sound they want. The recent Columbia recording of Charles Ives' Fourth Symphony, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, required as many as twelve microphones, and the brilliant score was done great justice. Naturally, concertos and vocal-orchestral works require an additional solo microphone. And an opera, that most monstrous of recording undertakings, demands a complex of microphones, particularly if it is to be staged.

Even though the forces are more complex in classical recording than in pops, the operation itself is simpler. Usually, the performers are at home with the music to be played—unlike the pop orchestra, which is usually seeing the musical arrangement for the first time at the recording session. The orchestra sets right to work by recording a portion of the music for a test, which is played back to the conductor. Any differences are [illegible], sound quality, and special effects conductor and a-&-r man, who will [illegible] more "commercial." In making classi- changes in the physical setup or comp[illegible]ustment is usually not required. Very formance. If the balance, for example, [illegible]vels and balances even in the studio, to the conductor, changes can be mad[illegible]ice of remixing to set balance between gineer or by the conductor. Mutual ex[illegible]gle track) and orchestra (on the other fidence will dictate which method wil[illegible]een abused. Why, then, do most record conductors prefer to record as much as [illegible]ally remix their product, and what are playbacks, and then remake those portio[illegible]-and disadvantages—of this process? improvement. In this way, the final maste[illegible]an, historically, as a protective measure. consists of a complete "take" with smal[illegible]ys of tape recording, acetate tape was prefer to record progressively—they beg[illegible] vulnerable to use—the inevitable mishan- ning, stop when the going gets bad, a[illegible]le human error could ruin a whole tape. point just before the breakdown. [illegible] were copied and (as was often necessary)

Reduced to an absurd simplification, [illegible]n copies" were used to replace whole or recording session is to cut enough takes [illegible]tions of master tapes. Inevitably, some measure (and every note) to be recorded [illegible]roducer found that he could "improve" his at least one take in which it is played correc[illegible] the copying, and so remixing was born. fully, beautifully. The session isn't over u[illegible]xing is further required because most original complished, the exception being the occas[illegible] done on half-inch-wide three-track tape which many dollars of overtime would have to be [illegible]o handle in mass-producing disc masters. The rect a minor mistake or two. In this latter c[illegible]ess produces quarter-inch tapes with all the de- dent a-&-r man will make do with what he ha[illegible]ies of sound and balance, and the original tape the protests of the artist. Of course, the b[illegible]ges a protection. sometimes prevail, and the money will be [illegible]en unfortunate. Perhaps some day all record com- Editing can easily require more of the a-&-r [illegible]ll realize that the less done to a record, the than any other step in the recording proces[illegible] The better it will be. The fact is that the remixing men will spend days just listening over [illegible]d can do more harm than good. This has been takes to be sure that they have chosen the b[illegible] or by those few companies that have dropped the the final choice is made, the tedious splicing ope[illegible] entirely—at the cost of some inconvenience, but gins. This consists of the delicate excisio[illegible] of eat strides forward in quality. Strictly speaking, that are not up to the high standard of the r[illegible]xtra step in the making of a record tends to reduce formance, and their replacement by the "im[illegible]rov somewhat. Every microphone, electron tube, coil, sages from other takes.

This process is both remarkable and contr[illegible] transformer, tape-recording head, and reel of tape is imperfect in some small degree and introduces minute distortions into the musical signal. The most imperfect devices in the chain are the transducers, and the by-passing of the remix step eliminates two tape heads in the chain, not to mention numerous electronic stages.

In a very sophisticated recording process (see accompanying figure), it is likely that the sound impinging on any microphone will have to pass through no less than six transducers (one microphone, four tape heads, and a disc cutter), twenty to thirty transformers, and forty to fifty stages of amplification. If each of these devices introduces even an infinitesimal quantity of frequency-response alteration, waveform, harmonic, or phase distortion, and also a bit of system noise, it is easy to see how a signal can deteriorate as it is processed. This not only is a clear argument for the elimination of steps and stages in the process, but also indicates the tremendous importance of equipment quality and maintenance in the recording studio.

Another important personage in the already crowded chain of command is the chief engineer, who selects and buys every microphone, tube, tape head, amplifier, cutter, etc. He also designs the circuits in which the components operate and modifies commercial components to suit his own or his firm's electronic "philosophy." The total effect of his work produces a distinct "company coloration" in the recorded sound. The company sound is simply derived from the total of the characteristic imperfections of its equipment, and is eminently recognizable. All record buyers have avoided the purchase of some particular label's product from time to time because there was something remarkable because the engineer is dealing with tol[illegible] of an inch. In or[illegible] a splice work, both pieces of tape must be cut a[illegible] cal instant in time. However, no orchestra r[illegible] human beings can be expected to play twice with ide[illegible] precision just for the sake of editing, and it [illegible] the surgical and musical skills of the engineer and [illegible] man to find the literal split second that will make tapes match. The success of this fantastic and pr[illegible] operation is best illustrated by a recently release[illegible] recording in which there are well over four hundre[illegible] —and not one of them is detectable. The controversy o[illegible] whether to splice or not boils down to this: does [illegible] record-buying public want musical performances th[illegible] are studded with obvious bobbles and goofs which will [illegible] there to be heard and winced at for the life of the record[illegible] The record companies obviously think not.

The final step in making a record is the mastering o[illegible] remixing. With popular records, it is a matter of fine ad-

This diagram of a "very sophisticated recording process" gives some idea of the number of possible steps between microphone and record cutter. To this must be added the many processes of record manufacturing—and of cartridge, amplifier, and speakers.

reviewed by NATHAN BROD
O. B. BRUMME
R. D. DARRE
PETER G. DAV
SHIRLEY FLEMIN
ALFRED FRANKENSTE

Symphony Hall: Leinsdorf

Lohengrin in Its

In view of the fact that High Fidelity's November issue will include a discography-in-depth of the available complete recordings of the Wagner operas, I shall confine myself to an over-all view of the new edition, saving comparisons for that occasion.

Two things are certain: 1) This is the most expensive opera recording in history, the use of the BSO and the Stateside recording location having sent its cost to something like double the normal expenditure for even an ambitious, glamorous recording, and 2) It is the first absolutely complete Lohengrin on records and, as nearly as can be determined, the first complete performance of it anywhere for very many years. This means that not only have all the frequent opera house cuts been restored (there is recorded precedent for that), but the second part of Lohengrin's Grail Narrative as well, which is not heard even at Bayreuth, and which is published as an appendix to the orchestral score. This comprises some choral wonderment over the first half of the narrative (the "In fernem Land," ending with "bin Lohengrin genannt," which is normally followed by the ensemble's "Hör ich so seine Art," etc., p. 359 of the partitur), and then some further explanation from Lohengrin, concerning just how and why he came to be sent in answer to Elsa's

155

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966

INFORMATION OBSCURED

characteristically unpleasant about its sound. And many have also become "fans" of a particular company's sound, finding it ingratiating no matter what the repertoire or who the artist.

Without question, the most universal responsibility of the engineering brains in a company is the setting and apparently inevitable pushing up of recording levels. For some inexplicable (or badly explicable) reason, there is a common equation accepted by many engineers, a-&-r men, and record-company executives: high level equals high sales. As a result there has been raging a "battle of levels" since the year one, and hardly any company or artist has been immune to its ravages. One good result of the battle has been to force manufacturers of home equipment, particularly of cartridges, to improve their product to do justice to the increasingly higher-level discs. Unfortunately, the battle has also forced the record manufacturers to take misguided expedient steps in order to maintain their competitive position. One tendency has been the use of limiters in the cutting of discs. Although acceptable in the pop market, this trick has fallen unhappily on the ears of classical record buyers. Worse, there is a tendency to alter the frequency content of disc masters in order to increase allowable levels. The most common method is the rolling off of very low frequencies (which are the primary limiting frequencies for cutting levels) or the shaving off of very high frequencies to reduce the problem of tracking distortion.

Undoubtedly the single most publicized and controversial process, designed primarily to increase apparent levels and improve sound quality, is the RCA Victor Dynagroove system. Dynagroove is a collection of improvements and innovations designed to reduce record distortion and heighten presence and realism—in short, to sharply improve the performance of the phonograph record in the home. Critical and public reactions have been by no means universally favorable, and it is worth a quick look at RCA's system to see just what has been done and how.

Among the indisputable improvements that the Dynagroove process represents is the use of a 30-inch-per-second tape speed. The industry has with good economic reason been reducing tape speeds (for home use) as equipment has improved. For many years the standard professional tape speed has been 15 ips, while home equipment operates at 7½, 3¾, and even slower. A daring but simple logic dictated to Victor engineers that a remarkable improvement in sound quality could be obtained by reverting to the superior 30-ips speed (higher level capacity, better high-frequency resolution, improved signal-to-noise characteristics). They were right. At 30 ips, an original master recording has a breathtaking clarity and lack of distortion and noise that seems to remove a large part of the barrier that has long existed between recorded sound and the listener, as some other companies had already discovered.

At the other end of the process, [illegible] new device that also has great me[illegible] disc-cutting "computer." Reduced to [illegible] tion, this "computer" is an amplifie[illegible] torts the electrical signal being fed t[illegible] distortion is the theoretical inverse o[illegible] distortion resulting from the inherent [illegible] a ball-tipped playing stylus as it rid[illegible] cut by a chisel-shaped cutter. This, un[illegible] is most effective in cleaning up record[illegible] near the center of the record where in[illegible] most severe.

The real cause of the fuss over Dyn[illegible] applied to classical recordings was the a[illegible] for the first time by a major label) of e[illegible] mixing process. The Dynagroove dynam[illegible] device that (unlike the standard static [illegible] throughout the industry) is capable of c[illegible] gree of equalization in response to the m[illegible] put. It enhances the low frequencies du[illegible] musical passages so that at normal home [illegible] the bottom will not drop out of the sound [illegible] hances the middle and high frequencies dur[illegible] passages to give a feeling of expansion. Thu[illegible] helps to some degree to compensate for th[illegible] known variability of response to loudness [illegible] quency spectrum (the Fletcher-Munson e[illegible] judiciously controlling those portions of th[illegible] spectrum that present the highest degree of tr[illegible] culty. But, unfortunately, theory does not al[illegible] good sound, and the overriding effect of e[illegible] (even when applied dynamically) gives the [illegible] at times of compressed dynamics (from the low [illegible] manipulation) and of shrillness (from the a[illegible] mid-range boost).

But such efforts nonetheless demonstrate a vi[illegible] est in the progress of sound recording and in the [illegible] ment of a unique and growing art. Once again, as [illegible] in my previous article on popular recording tec[illegible] is the use of the tools, not the tools themselves, th[illegible] character and individuality to recorded sound. Gr[illegible] blame must be given to the men who use the tools [illegible] a-&-r men, engineers, and musicians—those who se[illegible] lives are spent in the pursuit of excellence in the st[illegible] The modern phonograph record is a marvellous ach[illegible] ment, whether it is being played or being studied u[illegible] a high-power microscope (a fascinating experience). [illegible] critics and public alike can profit from an understand[illegible] of the complex of efforts and compromises that are [illegible] quired to produce them.

Jack Somer is a veteran of many years of record producing, b[illegible] popular and classical, with major companies. His article on t[illegible] techniques used in popular recording appeared in the May issu[illegible]

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
SEPT 1966

reviewed by NATHAN BRODE[illegible]
O. B. BRUMMELL[illegible]
R. D. DARRELL[illegible]
PETER G. DAVIS
SHIRLEY FLEMING
ALFRED FRANKENSTEIN

Symphony Hall: Leinsdorf [illegible]

Lohengrin in Its E[illegible]

In view of the fact that High Fidelity's November issue will include a discography-in-depth of the available complete recordings of the Wagner operas, I shall confine myself to an over-all view of the new edition, saving comparisons for that occasion.

Two things are certain: 1) This is the most expensive opera recording in history, the use of the BSO and the State-side recording location having sent its cost to something like double the normal expenditure for even an ambitious, glamorous recording, and 2) It is the first absolutely complete Lohengrin on records and, as nearly as can be determined, the first complete performance of it anywhere for very many years. This means that not only have all the frequent opera house cuts been restored (there is recorded precedent for that), but the second part of Lohengrin's Grail Narrative as well, which is not heard even at Bayreuth, and which is published as an appendix to the orchestral score. This comprises some choral wonderment over the first half of the narrative (the "In fernem Land," ending with "bin Lohengrin genannt," which is normally followed by the ensemble's "Hör ich so seine Art," etc., p. 359 of the partitur), and then some further explanation from Lohengrin, concerning just how and why he came to be sent in answer to Elsa's blinding appearance ("Gegrüsst du Gott-gesandter Held!," etc., pp. 53 ff.). A frequent device at this point is a slight quickening of the tempo, and increased urgency to build towards the big climax two pages later. Leinsdorf will allow neither the quickening nor the urgency, and technically he is quite correct—"Zeitmass wie vorher," Wagner has carefully marked at this juncture. 2) The music marking the formal arrangements for the duel (No. 40, on p. 73); here again, there is often some sort of freshening of the impetus, and again, Leinsdorf punctiliously follows the "Etwas weniger schnell" that is marked. 3) The actual finale of the act, from No. 47 (the end of the duel) on. Once more—the conductor is correct, for there is no indication of any tempo change or feeling change from the "sehr lebhaft" on p. 92 to the end of the act, on p. 109, and the assembled forces grind inexorably and with machinelike regularity through the whole section.

In all three cases, there can be no arguing the literal correctness of the interpretation. But all this shows, really, is that Leinsdorf can read. It sounds as if he is saying that everything in the music is clearly marked on the page; therefore, that which is unmarked is impure—it is a sort of un-interpretation. What results is a flattening out, an evening down. If you can obtain urgency without a quickening of tempo, well and good—that is possibly the ideal situation; but the urgency you must have, if you have any sense of the specifically dramatic nature of the work. In such moments this reading simply refuses to acknowledge that a theatrical condition exists, a condition involving characters under stress of conflicting sorts, and involving a specifically theatrical effect. It firmly declines to carry us along with any sweep, to lull us with a flow, to impress us with any climax save those of mere loudness. Never before in my experience has Telramund's anguished berating of Ortrud been kept to a reasoned, measured statement of a dissatisfied husband's point of view, or the strings in the prelude to the third act been held to a fiendishly literal, unaccented constancy. This is Lohengrin as pure music, and pure music as it appears on the page. It is impressively executed, but it is not dramatic, which is to say it is not operatic.

When it comes to the casting, Victor seems to have operated under a sort of jinx, at least on the female side. Leontyne Price was originally scheduled to learn and sing Elsa for both the recording and the Tanglewood concert performance which preceded it, but her illness of the previous winter, combined with her other commitments, made this impossible. She was replaced by Lucine Amara. On top of that, Rita Gorr, a fine artist and potentially a great Ortrud, happened into a period of extreme vocal difficulty, from which she had not yet recovered this past season, and has not been able to make the expected effect on the recording.

Miss Amara is simply all wrong. I concede that Elsa is a lyrical part, but there are lyric sopranos and lyric sopranos. What is wanted is a large, round voice that sings lyrically—that has a true line and the ability to float phrases, but which also holds body and color from bottom to top and which can soar over the ensembles with authority. Miss Amara's is weak at the bottom, and much too insistently bright and light, for this part; there is no ability to play with color, to darken the timbre, to lend any variety to the sound. She sings all the notes and shows a perfectly solid grasp of the general characteristics of the style—some of the piano passages are very pretty. But there is just not enough intensity or variety or substance to her singing; it is Micaëla, who has somehow taken a wrong turn and wound up at Antwerp instead of Seville.

Mme. Gorr is in another boat—a right voice and temperament for the part, but nowhere near its good representative form. Most of the second act is managed reasonably well—though one is conscious that the sound is not as round and free as it ought to be, it is solid and has a cold bite that fits Ortrud well enough. The steadiness of her singing is welcome at "In fernem Einsamkeit des Waldes," which is also done with fine insinuation, and even the curse is surmounted with a certain steely impact. But her interruption of the wedding procession at the end of the act is precarious and effortful, and her big moment in Act III ("Fahr' heim," etc.) is just one gust of pushy sound atop another—each of the repeated A's sounds like it must be the last. A great shame, both for her and for us, that she was unable to equal the level of her splendid Amneris or Fricka.

The male side does not let us down so badly. Lohengrin is Sándor Kónya's best role, and he brings to it a vocal juice and a rounding of phrase that seem to elude his competitors. All the strong, outgoing moments are fine—the voice has some presence in the middle and a good ring on top, and except for a tendency to let it open into a white, blatty tone around the break, it sounds firm, often beautiful and even heroic at full voice. Kónya's attempts at the soft caress, laudable as they are in intention, are rather less successful—he tends to thin the tone out too much and to lose the on-going line, with the result that his "Nun sei bedankt," certain portions of the Bridal Chamber duet, and the opening of the Erzählung come out overcareful and tentative. Still, there is musicality and an understanding of the intentions behind the phrasing even at such moments—his singing is never pedestrian, and at its best moments rises to a level of genuine beauty and excitement.

William Dooley, the young American baritone, is another newcomer to his role, having learned it for this occasion. He captures all the outlines of it—he is a singer of considerable dramatic grasp and intelligence, and can produce a big, dark sound in the middle part of his voice that approximates the timbre called for by the role. And he always sings, never simply barks or bellows. Unfortunately, the area where he makes a consistently good effect ends rather abruptly at E, and Telramund does not—there is much trafficking with F, F sharp, and even G, and in this region Dooley's voice loses its resonance and focus, and sometimes (as with his interruption of the Act II procession) its intonation. We consequently have a Telramund who makes all his points well, except for the climactic ones, and just as he seems about to walk off with a really compelling effect, he lets us down.

Jerome Hines's voice does not have all the ring and freshness it possessed a few years ago, especially on top, but it is still the right kind of voice for the difficult role of Henry the Fowler. It has the black coloration, bigness of size and timbre, and the wide compass required. The top Es and Fs sometimes turn dry and unsteady, but they are at least there with substance, and the voice has enough genuine singing quality for an effective "Mein Herr und Gott." That his German is somewhat unidiomatic is true, but German basses normally give us not only idiomatic enunciation but idiomatic singing as well, which generally means a sustained, unmusical roar, besides which Hines's slightly Americanized German is an insignificant transgression indeed. Calvin Marsh, the Herald, sounds fine so long as he is not puffing his voice up to try to sound like a big, dark baritone, as he does with part of his Act II reading of the decree. A steady, ingratiating baritone.

Boston's Pro Musica chorus sings exceptionally well, and no doubt Leinsdorf is partly responsible for the extraordinary observance of nuance at some points—the contrast in dynamics between "Streiter der Tugend" and "Zierde der Jugend" in the Bridal Chorus, for example (which is, by the way, sung with remarkable purity and balance throughout—it would have been a smash single in the 78 days). The over-all sound of the group undeniably has what we might call the New England Oratorio color, recognizable chiefly for a peculiar hollow purity in the female voices. I happen to like the sound (I grew up thinking all choruses sounded this way; you can check it out in any of the college chapels or horrid barnlike auditoria spaced every few hundred yards throughout New England), but I know it sets some people's teeth on edge, and it is heard here in its typical empty-hall ambience. In any case, the choral singing is exceptionally fine of its sort. Stereo is well handled, except that I find the right/left exchanges of Telramund and Heinrich in the first scene a trifle distracting.

WAGNER: Lohengrin

Lucine Amara (s), Elsa; Rita Gorr (ms), Ortrud; Sándor Kónya (t), Lohengrin; William Dooley (b), Friedrich von Telramund; Calvin Marsh (b), The King's Herald; Jerome Hines (bs), King Henry; Boston Chorus Pro Musica; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
• RCA Victor LM 6710. Five LP. $23.95.
• • RCA Victor LSC 6710. Five SD. $28.95.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
AUG 1966
153

156

HOUSE BEAUTIFUL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 885,000

DEC 1966

Four famous musicians choose FAVORITE RECORDS TO GIVE

Because the records they like may inspire your own Christmas shopping, we asked four great musicians to recommend a few they would most like to share with friends. They modestly refrained from selecting their own work, but we have listed their most significant new recordings on page 187

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director, The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The whole idea of a gift is that it be something special. For this reason a multirecord set—say an opera—is a good choice for this special season.

A magnificent gift would be Die Götterdämmerung, a six-record set with Birgit Nilsson and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Georg Solti conducting. London 4604 (1604).

This year there should be much sentiment attached to the three-record set, Opening Nights at the Met, RCA Victor LM-6171 (not available in stereo). It features great stars in recordings of roles they sang on opening nights through 60 years at the old Metropolitan Opera House.

There is now speculation that Anton Bruckner may be the next "in" composer with the musical elite. An interesting gift would be the fine release—Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 by the Columbia Symphony, Bruno Walter conducting. Columbia M2L-290 (M2S-690).

Of course a safe gift is always the latest original-cast Broadway show album. This year it could be Mame, Columbia KOL-6600 (KOS-3000); or that sensational sleeper, Man of La Mancha, Kapp-4505 (S-4505).

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony, 2 records, RCA Victor, LM 7044 (LSC 7044). Wagner's Lohengrin, the first Wagner opera recorded in America. 5 records: RCA Victor LM-6710 (LSC 6710). Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Orchestra are also recording a series that will encompass all the major works of Prokofiev.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

JAN 29 1967

SOUND ADVICE

Symphony Recording Found Disappointing

By ROBERT E. BENSON

RCA Victor has a new recording of Anton Bruckner's best-known symphony, the "Symphony No. 4 in E Flat Major," sometimes called the "Romantic" symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA stereo LSC 2915, 5.79). It is disappointing in all respects.

Leinsdorf shows no particular affinity for Bruckner's music, offering a small-scaled reading, sensitive in some respects, but missing the Olympian heights of the score. Even if his interpretation were of greater interest the disc could not be recommended because of the substandard quality of the recorded sound. The orchestra sounds blurred and vague, with a distant pickup and a sad lack of ynamic range. The cause of Bruckner is ill-served by this unfortunate record.

London's earlier version with Istvan Kertesz and the London Symphony Orchestra and Angel's recording with Otto Klemperer and the Philharmonia Orchestra are definitely preferable to this new recording.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 25 1967

Post Grammy Night Presentations

BOSTON'S GRAMMY—Richard Mohr (left), recording producer at RCA Victor presents Grammy awards to Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the orchestra's music director Erich Leinsdorf (right). The awards were received by Silverstein for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and by Leinsdorf for his recording with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mahler's Symphony No. 6. The Chamber Music Players won the Grammy for their first RCA Victor record in the category of Best Chamber Music Performances. The symphony's Grammy, awarded to the conductor, is for Best Orchestra' Performance.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 718,221 SUN. 699,943

MAR 3 1967

Grammy Honors

CLASSICAL MUSIC

In the classical categories, strangely unfamiliar locally, Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony were honored for the Best Engineered Recording, in Wagner's "Lohengrin," and the Best Orchestral Performance in Mahler's "Lohengrin," and the Best Orchestral Performance, in Mahler's Symphony No. 6. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players provided the Best Chamber Music Performance, according to the NARAS voters.

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 27,000

MAR 12 1967

ANOTHER GRAMMY award for Erich Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra received a Grammy for the best performance by an Orchestra for the recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 6.

Since his appointment as Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra have received two other awards: in 1963 Best Classical Performance by an Orchestra (Bartok Concerto for Orchestra); 1964 Best Performance - Orchestra (Mahler Symphony No. 5).

ERICH LEINSDORF

WORLD WEEK

OF THE WEEK

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 (Tragic)—Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC7044]. The fantastic awakening of interest in Mahler's music in recent years (partly because his mammoth works never had a chance in pre-LP or pre-hifi days) has at last brought good stereo recordings of all his symphonies. This 6th is the last to make the stereo list. But it was worth the wait for as good a performance as Leinsdorf and the Bostonians give it. They are also the first to use the Critical Score recently approved by the International Mahler Society (it reverses the 2nd and 3rd movements in contrast to other editions, among other changes). Leinsdorf wrenches the martial first movements into vividly dramatic life, and infuses the rest of the symphony with an eloquence, grandeur, and passion that have not always been Leinsdorf's trademark. It is, in short, his best recording since the great Prokofieff 6th he did two years ago. (R.H.)

Wagner: Lohengrin (Complete)—Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf, with Konya, Amara, Gorr, Hines, etc. [RCA Victor LSC6710]. This 5-LP album is a real news-maker in several respects. It is the first complete Wagnerian recording made in the U.S.—and complete it is (including sections usually omitted in performances in both Europe and the U.S.). It also represents an important effort by a major U.S. company to reverse the trend of recording opera only in Europe (where costs are considerably lower). Unfortunately, the quality of the musical performance is disappointing. Conductor Leinsdorf lets things sag too often, and never gives the work the tension and inner propulsion it needs. And his cast is uneven, with only Sandor Konya in the title role being truly outstanding. The sound engineering, however, is a knockout—especially the "Entrance of the Knights" on side 9. Angel's Lohengrin is not a perfect set either, but its musical advantages outrank this new RCA one. (R.H.)

HOUSE BEAUTIFUL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 885,000

DEC 1966

Four famous musicians choose FAVORITE RECORDS TO GIVE

Because the records they like may inspire your own Christmas shopping, we asked four great musicians to recommend a few they would most like to share with friends. They modestly refrained from selecting their own work, but we have listed their most significant new recordings on page 187

ERICH LEINSDORF

Music Director, The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The whole idea of a gift is that it be something special. For this reason a multirecord set—say an opera—is a good choice for this special season.

A magnificent gift would be Die Götterdämmerung, a six-record set with Birgit Nilsson and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Georg Solti conducting. London 4604 (1604).

This year there should be much sentiment attached to the three-record set, Opening Nights at the Met, RCA Victor LM-6171 (not available in stereo). It features great stars in recordings of roles they sang on opening nights through 60 years at the old Metropolitan Opera House.

There is now speculation that Anton Bruckner may be the next "in" composer with the musical elite. An interesting gift would be the fine release—Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 by the Columbia Symphony, Bruno Walter conducting. Columbia M2L-290 (M2S-690).

Of course a safe gift is always the latest original-cast Broadway show album. This year it could be Mame, Columbia KOL-6600 (KOS-3000); or that sensational sleeper, Man of La Mancha, Kapp-4505 (S-4505).

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony, 2 records, RCA Victor, LM 7044 (LSC 7044). Wagner's Lohengrin, the first Wagner opera recorded in America. 5 records: RCA Victor LM-6710 (LSC 6710). Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Orchestra are also recording a series that will encompass all the major works of Prokofiev.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

JAN 29 1967

SOUND ADVICE

Symphony Recording Found Disappointing

By ROBERT E. BENSON

RCA Victor has a new recording of Anton Bruckner's best-known symphony, the "Symphony No. 4 in E Flat Major," sometimes called the "Romantic" symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA stereo LSC 2915, 5.79). It is disappointing in all respects.

Leinsdorf shows no particular affinity for Bruckner's music, offering a small-scaled reading, sensitive in some respects, but missing the Olympian heights of the score. Even if his interpretation were of greater interest the disc could not be recommended because of the substandard quality of the recorded sound. The orchestra sounds blurred and vague, with a distant pickup and a sad lack of ynamic range. The cause of Bruckner is ill-served by this unfortunate record.

London's earlier version with Istvan Kertesz and the London Symphony Orchestra and Angel's recording with Otto Klemperer and the Philharmonia Orchestra are definitely preferable to this new recording.

WORLD WEEK

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 (Tragic).—Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC7044]. The fantastic awakening of interest in Mahler's music in recent years (partly because his mammoth works never had a chance in pre-LP or pre-hifi days) has at last brought good stereo recordings of all his symphonies. This 6th is the last to make the stereo list. But it was worth the wait for as good a performance as Leinsdorf and the Bostonians give it. They are also the first to use the Critical Score recently approved by the International Mahler Society (it reverses the 2nd and 3rd movements in contrast to other editions, among other changes). Leinsdorf wrenches the martial first movements into vividly dramatic life, and infuses the rest of the symphony with an eloquence, grandeur, and passion that have not always been Leinsdorf's trademark. It is, in short, his best recording since the great Prokofieff 6th he did two years ago. (R.H.)

Wagner: Lohengrin (Complete)—Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf, with Konya, Amara, Gorr, Hines, etc. [RCA Victor LSC6710]. This 5-LP album is a real news-maker in several respects. It is the first complete Wagnerian recording made in the U.S.—and complete it is (including sections usually omitted in performances in both Europe and the U.S.). It also represents an important effort by a major U.S. company to reverse the trend of recording opera only in Europe (where costs are considerably lower). Unfortunately, the quality of the musical performance is disappointing. Conductor Leinsdorf lets things sag too often, and never gives the work the tension and inner propulsion it needs. And his cast is uneven, with only Sandor Konya in the title role being truly outstanding. The sound engineering, however, is a knockout—especially the "Entrance of the Knights" on side 9. Angel's Lohengrin is not a perfect set either, but its musical advantages outrank this new RCA one. (R.H.)

ERICH LEINSDORF

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 25 1967

Post Grammy Night Presentations

BOSTON'S GRAMMY—Richard Mohr (left), recording producer at RCA Victor presents Grammy awards to Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the orchestra's music director Erich Leinsdorf (right). The awards were received by Silverstein for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and by Leinsdorf for his recording with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mahler's Symphony No. 6. The Chamber Music Players won the Grammy for their first RCA Victor record in the category of Best Chamber Music Performances. The symphony's Grammy, awarded to the conductor, is for Best Orchestral Performance.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 718,221 SUN. 699,943

MAR 3 1967

Grammy Honors

CLASSICAL MUSIC

In the classical categories, strangely unfamiliar locally, Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony were honored for the Best Engineered Recording, in Wagner's "Lohengrin," and the Best Orchestral Performance, in Mahler's "Lohengrin," and the Best Orchestral Performance, in Mahler's Symphony No. 6. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players provided the Best Chamber Music Performance, according to the NARAS voters.

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 27,000

MAR 12 1967

ANOTHER GRAMMY award for Erich Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra received a Grammy for the best performance by an Orchestra for the recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 6.

Since his appointment as Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra have received two other awards: in 1963 Best Classical Performance by an Orchestra (Bartok Concerto for Orchestra); 1964 Best Performance - Orchestra (Mahler Symphony No. 5).

157

San Francisco
Examiner-Chronicle
SUN. 750,000

APR 9 1967

Music

The Well-Adjusted Orchestra

By Robert Commanday

WHAT HAS FOUR or more strings, any amount of wind and no definition? The chamber orchestra.

These opportune ensembles have become as numerous as Vivaldi concertos, while appearing and vanishing at will. It is just their convenient capacity to adapt, to follow a musical Parkinson's Law that has made the chamber orchestra the primary medium of the era.

This week, as an example, the San Francisco Symphony, behaving like Alice after she nibbled on the toadstool, shrinks to a chamber orchestra for two special programs. On Wednesday, Josef Krips will conduct the small version known as the San Francisco Symphony Chamber Orchestra in a benefit for flood-damaged Italian art at 9 p.m. in the Palace of the Legion of Honor. On Friday, the same group, give or take a few players, will perform an all-Mozart program in the biggest chamber in town, the Opera House.

The San Francisco SYMPHONY Chamber Orchestra must not be confused with the San Francisco Chamber Orchestra, an ad hoc group of Symphony and other players that performs occasionally under William Jackson and Edgar Braun.

The term "chamber orchestra" defies definition precisely because variability is its very nature. Writers on the subject usually conclude on some conveniently generalized description. "A chamber orchestra is an orchestra small enough to be heard in a drawing room or a very small concert hall without any inconvenience due to the limited space," wrote Louis Fleury in Cobbett's Cyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music. To this might be added that in size and instrumentation, the chamber orchestra conforms to whatever may be the music's requirements — Parkinson's Law again.

BOSTON SYMPHONY RE-ENACTS MOZART WITH ERICH LEINSDORF PLAYING RATCHET (STANDING LEFT)

Although much of the music played by today's chamber orchestras is pre-nineteenth century, the term is strictly of this century. It originated as part of the reaction against the ponderous Romantic orchestral style. Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Opus 9, for 15 players, dates from 1906.

Clearing Fogs

With the new styles of the modern era, the romantic orchestral fogs were cleared away, the textures were opened up for a new counterpoint and rhythm facilitated by the conveniently economical small orchestra. Stravinsky, Webern, Milhaud and Hindemith led the way to create the new literature and virtually every composer since has contributed to it. Even Richard Strauss put aside his red plush orchestra to compose a couple of works for the salon genre, including the "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" Suite of 1918 which will be on Maestro Krips' Wednesday benefit program.

With the great revival of Baroque and early classic music and the scholar-sparked enthusiasm for "authentic" performance, the chamber orchestra idea took firm hold. When the recording market skyrocketed with the LP, it boomed right along. For recording, even of some symphonic works, the small orchestra, under proper engineering, has proven as effective as the grosspapa and much more economical of course.

There is a fine but notable distinction between the twentieth century chamber orchestra playing pre-Romantic music and the actual 18th century orchestra. The former is specially constituted to meet the needs of pre-existent music. The prototype on the other hand was THE orchestra of its time, playing music that was written with only its sound and physical layout in mind.

Balance by Ear

There is everything to be said for respecting this original sound image, the sensitive balance of an orchestra and musical style built around a central keyboard instrument. It is essential for certain watchwork textures like those of the Bach Cantatas which work best with one or two performers on a part.

There is no point in kidding ourselves with literalness, however, by holding to the actual numbers that served in the composers' own orchestras. Today's instruments speak much more boldly and brightly (not only the winds, but the string family with modern bridges, strings and bows). Balance has to be worked out by ear, not by historical recipe.

The average good 18th century orchestra normally carried no more than 25 players (the Esterhazy Court provided Haydn with 23. Salzburg had 25). Still, the composers would have used more and did when given the chance. Mozart had only 25 players for the 1787 premiere of "Don Giovanni" in Prague (3 first and 3 second violins, and 2 each of the violas, cellos and basses), but there's no more virtue to do it with that complement today than with an all-male cast.

Mozart admired the big orchestras like the one at Naples, and admired the famous Mannheim Orchestra of 45 players in a letter to his father in 1777. In London, 1791, Haydn happily "adjusted" to the 50-piece orchestra which played his "Salomon" symphonies.

In today's enthusiasm for chamber orchestras and authentic performance, it is a mistake to forget that there were also big orchestras in the 18th century. Certain Vivaldi works were played with 40 violins. In 1687, Lully's Te Deum was played with 150 performers in Paris, and Corelli directed played with 150 performers Rome. The Westminster Abbey 1784 performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given with 275 singers and 250 players. Some of the fairly large major opera orchestras included Hamburg with 53 players in 1710 and the Paris Royal Academy with 47 in 1714. Mozart had 60 players for his 1770 performance of "Mitridate" in Milan.

It is also well to keep the original orchestra seating plans in mind as well as their size and instrumentation. Many classical symphonies are played to better advantage with first and second violin sections seated opposed to each other (the seconds on the conductor's right), as they were until 20th century orchestras gradually conformed to the modern homogenizing arrangement. The day will come when some enterprising symphony conductor will alter his basic seating arrangement in mid-concert for classic repertoire to bring out the original charm of the dialogue relationship between the violins that the composers worked for.

See Page 29

Chamber Groups

Continued from Page 28

It might be well not to get wholly carried away with re-enacting old performance situations and always play Mozart with a chamber orchestra when the specifics of the chamber in question demand, and the fine talents of the back-stand players justify using the bigger ensemble. The present practice of cutting down to a Salzburg Festival Orchestra every time Mozart comes to bat does provide a smooth, finely honed performance and a pleasurable contrast on the programs, but it's not the only answer. In the case of the piano concertos for example, there is, after all, a nine-foot grand on the platform to balance against not, an 18th century pianoforte.

The chamber-sized group encourages refined, delicate performances. There's more pleasure in it for the individual player who is not just a "soldier for Strauss" but actually more of a soloist.

The San Francisco Symphony does well to move in this direction. If there are signs that the traditional big symphony orchestra as we know it may be outdistanced and frozen-in-grade, there are also many evidences that chamber orchestras, flexible, individualistic and mobile, may be the principal instrument of the future.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, trying to preserve its symphonic image, the "Ormandy sound," made an major error a few years back in fighting the trend. The Philadelphia Orchestra Association forbade its musicians to play in any outside ensembles larger than a sextet, a move directed against its concertmaster's private chamber orchestra. Ansel Brusilow promptly resigned, and together with many fine players from the Philadelphia and other orchestras, has been living happily ever after making music in their thriving chamber orchestra.

The San Francisco Symphony is electing to join the trend. The results offer wonderful possibilities for its Chamber Orchestra in the surrounding communities which cannot accommodate the full symphonic complement on their stages and are interested in new orchestral sounds and styles. The day will also come when this San Francisco Symphony Chamber Orchestra will be "at home" in San Francisco in a proper chamber.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1967

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS. Works by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter, Piston. RCA Victor LM-6167 (M); LSC-6167 (S).

This album is a very unusual packaging of music and spoken word. It is a gem of a recording that is heartily recommended to all lovers of superlatively performed chamber music. In addition to six sides of a fascinating cross section of the classic and contemporary, there is a large and handsome booklet containing some delightful program notes by Peter Ustinov. What they may lack in scholarship they make up for in literary style. For a bonus there is an additional ten-inch disc of commentary, discussion and musical examples presided over by Ustinov, with a guest appearance by Erich Leinsdorf. As fascinating as all this is, the performances themselves are what make this album outstanding. The Irving Fine String Trio is a highlight. This intensely moving work is proof that serial music can be directly communicative and have high emotional content. In addition, the recorded sound is unusually good.—Adamson

NEW JERSEY MUSIC AND ARTS
CALDWELL, N. J.
CIR. N. AVAIL.

MAY 1966

POULENC: CONCERTO FOR ORGAN, STRINGS AND TIMPANI; Berj Zamkochian, organ. STRAVINSKY: JEU DE CARTES; Munch, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor). The Concerto is more like a tone poem, reminiscent of the composer's "Stabat Mater" in the instrumental portions. The organ is written for, loudly and heavily. It is an overwrought concerto, but never without Poulenc's singing line, his basic seriousness and the melody.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1966

Ⓢ Ⓜ TCHAIKOVSKY: Romeo and Juliet—Overture-Fantasia; Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTROLA VICS 1197 $3.00, VIC 1197 $2.50.

Performance: Highly dramatic
Recording: Vintage 1956

I was surprised to find no other inexpensive stereo version of Francesca da Rimini available, which automatically makes this Munch-Boston Symphony performance especially desirable, for it is highly dramatic and brilliantly played. The Romeo and Juliet is somewhat more hectic in pacing and less full-bodied in sound than the later Munch reading on RCA Victor LSC/LM 2565, but the disc as a whole represents good value for its price. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,400

JAN 1967

TCHAIKOVSKY: Romeo and Juliet; Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola ⓑ VIC 1197, $2.50; VICS 1197, $3.00 [from RCA Victor LM 2043, 1957].

Munch whips up Tchaikovsky's two popular overture-fantasies with all his customary vigor and unabashed extroversion—and this is, of course, only just and right for such juicy music. The conductor favors a lean orchestral tone which cuts down on the calorie content of the big tunes somewhat; but if we must have a slightly dietetic Romeo, Munch's proteins are preferable to maestro X's saccharine. The Boston Orchestra plays with its wonted brilliance, especially in Francesca—a deceptively tricky score, by the way, and not at all easy to bring off. RCA's fine engineering nicely details this music.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 6 1967

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

TCHAIKOVSKY: PIANO CONCERTO NO. 1

Mischa Dichter / Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM-2954 (M); LSC-2954 (S)

Dichter's recording debut is impressive and exciting. The 21-year-old Tchaikovsky silver medal winner is clearly a major new talent. The fine Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf's expert direction adds to a dynamic reading of this popular concerto.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
CATHOLIC
W. 88,423

MAY 19 1966

★ ★ ★

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6 in b, Op. 74 ('Pathetique'). London Symphony, Antal Dorati (Mercury stereo SR 90312, mono MG 50312).

*Same. Boston Symphony, Charles Munch (RCA stereo or mono 2683).

Both performances are good, and either can be recommended if you are looking for an accurate, hard-hitting 'Pathetique' that does not drown itself in spurious emotionality. On first hearing, I thought Dorati put more vigor than Munch into the first movement development, but further comparison shows that the two conductors have very similar views of the music. The differences are slight enough to be almost imperceptible.

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 23 1966

RCA Inks, Records Moscow Contest Winner Jane Marsh

NEW YORK — Jane Marsh, 24-year-old California-born soprano who two weeks ago won first prize in the first voice competition of the Tchaikovsky International Music Contest in Moscow, has been signed to an exclusive contract by RCA Victor Records.

Shown greeting soprano Jane Marsh as she arrived at Kennedy Airport from Moscow where she was judged winner of first prize in the International Tchaikovsky Music Contest are (from left) Roger Hall, Manager of Red Seal Artists and Repertoire for RCA Victor Records, Bud Palmer, Commissioner, Department of Public Events for the City of New York, and Norman Racusin, Division VP and Operations Manager for RCA Victor.

Announcement was made by George R. Marek, VP and General Manager, the RCA Victor Division. "We became aware last fall when Miss Marsh first sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that she possessed a talent capable of making her a star of the first magnitude. Her conquest in the Tchaikovsky competition proved this and we are proud this artist will record exclusively for the RCA Victor Red Seal label," stated Marek.

Her initial recording for RCA will be live recordings of performances at Tanglewood on July 24 and Aug. 13. Included will be works she sang in the Tchaikovsky competition — Tatiana's Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," an aria from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," "O Patria Mia" from Verdi's "Aida," and "Salce, Salce" from Verdi's "Othello." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Russians Demonstrative

Miss Marsh said at a press conference held immediately after she returned to the states last week that the Russians had been extremely demonstrative in their affection for her and this had made the prize even more meaningful. "If they like you, they tell you," she stated "and that's marvelous."

An engaging and articulate girl, Miss Marsh, also allowed that her experience as a swimmer and horsewomen had stood her in good stead in the competition because "durability" is an important fact in the three rounds of auditions required to win.

Also last week, Miss Marsh received the Handel Medallion in an honorary reception tossed by New York Mayor John Lindsay. Veronica Tyler and Simon Estes, other prize winners at the competition were honored as well.

Pianist Van Cliburn, also an exclusive RCA Victor recording artist, is the only other Ameriman ever to win a first prize in the prestigious Moscow competition.

The Houston Post
D. 267,620 SUN. 289,009

JAN 15 1967

Records

Crossed Fiddle Bows Over Bartok

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

This week it's crossed fiddle bows over the Bartok Second Violin Concerto. Two recordings of this expansive masterwork have recently been issued, one by Yehudi Menuhin with Antal Dorati and the New Philharmonic Orchestra (Angel Stereo S-36360), the other by Joseph Silverstein with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (Victor, Stereo LSC-2852).

Juxtaposed, they reveal interesting facets of the art of the violinist, the conductor and the recording engineer. Menuhin's version is longer (by four minutes) and therefore a more leisurely interpretation. From the soloist's point of view, it brings greater elan, more Old World flavor along with that silvery tone that belongs with the name of Menuhin. It allows the ear to focus upon the tiniest details of Menuhin's phrasing in relation to his vibrato. This in itself is a fascinating study.

However, Silverstein carries the day in terms of technique and in his concept of the concerto's larger design. A former member of the Houston Symphony and now concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, Silverstein gives the work a sense of propulsion and excitement absent in the Angel recording. Also, he skates right through its more difficult pages with perfect aplomb, where this is not always the case with Menuhin.

The Angel engineers have given their recording livelier presence, but the orchestra tends to sound tubby under Dorati's hand. This is best illustrated in the opening harp passage, which is infinitely more faithful to the score in Leinsdorf's interpretation. Also, the extremes of bass and treble stand out more clearly in the latter.

Side Two of the Angel recording contains six of Bartok's 44 Duos for Two Violins along with the concerto's third movement. Victor's engineers have inconsiderately divided the third movement between the two sides in order to fit in a stunning collaboration on the Stravinsky Violin Concerto by Silverstein and Leinsdorf.

This in itself is worth owning because it is a truly mature interpretation, pungent and rhythmic in the best Stravinskian tradition, yet full-bodied in its harmonic realization and with polyphonic lines that are beautifully knit together. Bravo!

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAR 4 1967

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

BRUCKNER: SYMPHONY NO. 4

Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2915 (M); LSC 2915 (S)

Another excellent pressing of Bruckner's most popular symphony. Leinsdorf leads the Boston in a performance that accents the nobility and character of the music, while permitting its sensuous qualities.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

APR 9 1967

SOUND ADVICE

Previn Performance Of Walton Superb

By ROBERT E. BENSON

Sir William Walton began writing his "Symphony No. 1" when only thirty. He had already been acclaimed for his "Facade" and the oratorio "Belshazzar's Feast." In 1934 the first performance of the complete work was given, with Sir Hamilton Harty conducting.

The "Symphony No. 1" is a grand, romantic symphony, replete with vigorous brass fanfares and orchestral climaxes. It is almost a sure-fire audience pleaser.

RCA Victor has issued the first stereophonic recording of this important symphony, with Andre Previn directing the London Symphony Orchestra (RCA stereo LSC 2927, $5.78). This is unquestionably Previn's finest recording, after his only moderate success in earlier recordings of music of Rachmaninoff, Shostakovitch and Tchaikovsky.

It bodes well for his forthcoming series of the symphonies of Vaughan Williams, now being recorded. His approach is impetuous and vigorous, and he achieves a marvelous rapport with the excellent orchestra. Sound addicts will revel in the magnificent recorded sound, one of RCA's top sonic efforts.

A considerably lower standard of reproduction and performance are found on another new RCA LP with Erich Leinsdorf directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in prosaic interpretations of the "Symphony No. 3 in F" and "Tragic Overture" of Brahms (RCA stereo LSC 2936, $5.79). These are adequate performances, but not of the standard of the top versions, and the recorded sound is blurred and over-resonant.

Another new RCA disc features music of Franz Schubert, excerpts from "Rosamunde" and "The Magic Harp" performed by the Orchestra and Chorus of Naples conducted by Denis Vaughan (RCA stereo LSC 2937, $5.79). Included are the overture to "The Magic Harp," usually known as the "Rosamunde" overture, two ballet excerpts, the Entr'acte in B Flat and the brief but lovely Romance from "Rosamunde," the latter exquisitely sung by soprano Lucia Popp.

From "The Magic Harp" there is the Larghetto, the Chorus of Genii, Overture to Act III, Melodrama and Final Chorus.

Vaughan offers relaxed, flowing performances, the orchestra is fine and the recorded sound excellent, although not of the standard of the Walton symphony mentioned above. For those who want highlights from two of Schubert's most engrossing scores this new record will prove entirely satisfactory.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

JAN 8 1967

The Record Player

BRAND NEW recordings recent and notable: Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor. Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. Victor 2917. Entirely all right, this is simply not on a par with the earlier one Rubinstein made with Reiner and the Chicago Symphony.

Strauss; "don Quixote." Pierre Fournier with Berlin Philharmonic under Karajan. DGG 139009.

Flawless, filled with poetry and brilliance in the orchestra, this also has fabled solo playing from Fournier.

Prokofieff: Piano Concertos 1 and 2. John Browning with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. Victor 2897.

This makes three of the five Prokofieff concertos that Browning has done with Leinsdorf, though the third is on the Capitol label. You must make your own choice between this and the Graffman-Szell reviewed recently, though the pairing in the case is No. 1 with No. 3. Both works are here played with immense bite and all appropriate relaxation, which is not much—Paul Hume.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

AUG 1966

BARTOK: Concerto for Orchestra. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor FTC 2130. The Bostonians gave the world premiere of this music, on December 1, [illegible] the orchestra plays it today with a [illegible] of pride and affection—deservedly, for the score is surely one of the classics of twentieth-century music. An experienced theatre conductor such as Leinsdorf is just the sort of man to bring out the drama of the work and carry a [illegible]ing

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS

[illegible] Series" on RCA with a recording of the Third Symphony and the "Scythian" Suite (Victor LSC 2934). (The series includes the Sixth Symphony and the Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2, with John Browning). The Third uses [illegible] Prokofiev's [illegible] (for example, the fury of the scherzo) the symphonic form shapes a new work. The performance is exciting.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1967

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS. Works by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter, Piston. RCA Victor LM-6167 (M); LSC-6167 (S).

This album is a very unusual packaging of music and spoken word. It is a gem of a recording that is heartily recommended to all lovers of superlatively performed chamber music. In addition to six sides of a fascinating cross section of the classic and contemporary, there is a large and handsome booklet containing some delightful program notes by Peter Ustinov. What they may lack in scholarship they make up for in literary style. For a bonus there is an additional ten-inch disc of commentary, discussion and musical examples presided over by Ustinov, with a guest appearance by Erich Leinsdorf. As fascinating as all this is, the performances themselves are what make this album outstanding. The Irving Fine String Trio is a highlight. This intensely moving work is proof that serial music can be directly communicative and have high emotional content. In addition, the recorded sound is unusually good.—Adamson

NEW JERSEY MUSIC AND ARTS
CALDWELL, N. J.
CIR. N. AVAIL.

MAY 1966

POULENC: CONCERTO FOR ORGAN, STRINGS AND TIMPANI; Berj Zamkochian, organ. STRAVINSKY: JEU DE CARTES; Munch, Boston Symphony (RCA Victor). The Concerto is more like a tone poem, reminiscent of the composer's "Stabat Mater" in the instrumental portions. The organ is written for, loudly and heavily. It is an overwrought concerto, but never without Poulenc's singing line, his basic seriousness and the melody.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1966

Ⓢ Ⓜ TCHAIKOVSKY: Romeo and Juliet—Overture-Fantasia; Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch cond. RCA VICTROLA VICS 1197 $3.00, VIC 1197 $2.50.

Performance: Highly dramatic
Recording: Vintage 1956

I was surprised to find no other inexpensive stereo version of Francesca da Rimini available, which automatically makes this Munch-Boston Symphony performance especially desirable, for it is highly dramatic and brilliantly played. The Romeo and Juliet is somewhat more hectic in pacing and less full-bodied in sound than the later Munch reading on RCA Victor LSC/LM 2565, but the disc as a whole represents good value for its price. D. H.

HIGH FIDELITY
TRADE NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,400

JAN 1967

TCHAIKOVSKY: Romeo and Juliet; Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, cond. RCA Victrola Ⓢ VIC 1197, $2.50; VICS 1197, $3.00 [from RCA Victor LM 2043, 1957].

Munch whips up Tchaikovsky's two popular overture-fantasies with all his customary vigor and unabashed extroversion—and this is, of course, only just and right for such juicy music. The conductor favors a lean orchestral tone which cuts down on the calorie content of the big tunes somewhat; but if we must have a slightly dietetic Romeo, Munch's proteins are preferable to maestro X's saccharine. The Boston Orchestra plays with its wonted brilliance, especially in Francesca—a deceptively tricky score, by the way, and not at all easy to bring off. RCA's fine engineering nicely details this music.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 6 1967

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

TCHAIKOVSKY: PIANO CONCERTO NO. 1

Mischa Dichter / Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM-2954 (M); LSC-2954 (S)

Dichter's recording debut is impressive and exciting. The 21-year-old Tchaikovsky silver medal winner is clearly a major new talent. The fine Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf's expert direction adds to a dynamic reading of this popular concerto.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
CATHOLIC
W. 88,423

MAY 19 1966

★ ★ ★

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6 in b, Op. 74 ('Pathetique'). London Symphony, Antal Dorati (Mercury stereo SR 90312, mono MG 50312).

*Same. Boston Symphony, Charles Munch (RCA stereo or mono 2683).

Both performances are good, and either can be recommended if you are looking for an accurate, hard-hitting 'Pathetique' that does not drown itself in spurious emotionality. On first hearing, I thought Dorati put more vigor than Munch into the first movement development, but further comparison shows that the two conductors have very similar views of the music. The differences are slight enough to be almost imperceptible.

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 23 1966

RCA Inks, Records Moscow Contest Winner Jane Marsh

NEW YORK — Jane Marsh, 24-year-old California-born soprano who two weeks ago won first prize in the first voice competition of the Tchaikovsky International Music Contest in Moscow, has been signed to an exclusive contract by RCA Victor Records.

Shown greeting soprano Jane Marsh as she arrived at Kennedy Airport from Moscow where she was judged winner of first prize in the International Tchaikovsky Music Contest are (from left) Roger Hall, Manager of Red Seal Artists and Repertoire for RCA Victor Records, Bud Palmer, Commissioner, Department of Public Events for the City of New York, and Norman Racusin, Division VP and Operations Manager for RCA Victor.

Announcement was made by George R. Marek, VP and General Manager, the RCA Victor Division. "We became aware last fall when Miss Marsh first sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that she possessed a talent capable of making her a star of the first magnitude. Her conquest in the Tchaikovsky competition proved this and we are proud this artist will record exclusively for the RCA Victor Red Seal label," stated Marek.

Her initial recording for RCA will be live recordings of performances at Tanglewood on July 24 and Aug. 13. Included will be works she sang in the Tchaikovsky competition — Tatiana's Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," an aria from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," "O Patria Mia" from Verdi's "Aida," and "Salce, Salce" from Verdi's "Othello." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Russians Demonstrative

Miss Marsh said at a press conference held immediately after she returned to the states last week that the Russians had been extremely demonstrative in their affection for her and this had made the prize even more meaningful. "If they like you, they tell you," she stated "and that's marvelous."

An engaging and articulate girl, Miss Marsh, also allowed that her experience as a swimmer and horsewomen had stood her in good stead in the competition because "durability" is an important fact in the three rounds of auditions required to win.

Also last week, Miss Marsh received the Handel Medallion in an honorary reception tossed by New York Mayor John Lindsay. Veronica Tyler and Simon Estes, other prize winners at the competition were honored as well.

Pianist Van Cliburn, also an exclusive RCA Victor recording artist, is the only other Ameriman ever to win a first prize in the prestigious Moscow competition.

The Houston Post
D. 267,620 SUN. 289,009

JAN 15 1967

Records

Crossed Fiddle Bows Over Bartok

By CARL CUNNINGHAM

This week it's crossed fiddle bows over the Bartok Second Violin Concerto. Two recordings of this expansive masterwork have recently been issued, one by Yehudi Menuhin with Antal Dorati and the New Philharmonic Orchestra (Angel Stereo S-36360), the other by Joseph Silverstein with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (Victor, Stereo LSC-2852).

Juxtaposed, they reveal interesting facets of the art of the violinist, the conductor and the recording engineer. Menuhin's version is longer (by four minutes) and therefore a more leisurely interpretation. From the soloist's point of view, it brings greater elan, more Old World flavor along with that silvery tone that belongs with the name of Menuhin. It allows the ear to focus upon the tiniest details of Menuhin's phrasing in relation to his vibrato. This in itself is a fascinating study.

However, Silverstein carries the day in terms of technique and in his concept of the concerto's larger design. A former member of the Houston Symphony and now concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, Silverstein gives the work a sense of propulsion and excitement absent in the Angel recording. Also, he skates right through its more difficult pages with perfect aplomb, where this is not always the case with Menuhin.

The Angel engineers have given their recording liveller presence, but the orchestra tends to sound tubby under Dorati's hand. This is best illustrated in the opening harp passage, which is infinitely more faithful to the score in Leinsdorf's interpretation. Also, the extremes of bass and treble stand out more clearly in the latter.

Side Two of the Angel recording contains six of Bartok's 44 Duos for Two Violins along with the concerto's third movement. Victor's engineers have inconsiderately divided the third movement between the two sides in order to fit in a stunning collaboration on the Stravinsky Violin Concerto by Silverstein and Leinsdorf.

This in itself is worth owning because it is a truly mature interpretation, pungent and rhythmic in the best Stravinskian tradition, yet full-bodied in its harmonic realization and with polyphonic lines that are beautifully knit together. Bravo!

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAR 4 1967

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

BRUCKNER: SYMPHONY NO. 4

Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 2915 (M); LSC 2915 (S)

Another excellent pressing of Bruckner's most popular symphony. Leinsdorf leads the Boston in a performance that accents the nobility and character of the music, while permitting its sensuous qualities.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

JAN 8 1967

The Record Player

BRAND NEW recordings recent and notable: Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor. Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. Victor 2917. Entirely all right, this is simply not on a par with the earlier one Rubinstein made with Reiner and the Chicago Symphony.

Strauss; "don Quixote." Pierre Fournier with Berlin Philharmonic under Karajan. DGG 139009.

Flawless, filled with poetry and brilliance in the orchestra, this also has fabled solo playing from Fournier.

Prokofieff: Piano Concertos 1 and 2. John Browning with the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. Victor 2897.

This makes three of the five Prokofieff concertos that Browning has done with Leinsdorf, though the third is on the Capitol label. You must make your own choice between this and the Graffman-Szell reviewed recently, though the pairing in the case is No. 1 with No. 3. Both works are here played with immense bite and all appropriate relaxation, which is not much—Paul Hume.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

APR 9 1967

SOUND ADVICE

Previn Performance Of Walton Superb

By ROBERT E. BENSON

Sir William Walton began writing his "Symphony No. 1" when only thirty. He had already been acclaimed for his "Facade" and the oratorio "Belshazzar's Feast." In 1934 the first performance of the complete work was given, with Sir Hamilton Harty conducting.

The "Symphony No. 1" is a grand, romantic symphony, replete with vigorous brass fanfares and orchestral climaxes. It is almost a sure-fire audience pleaser.

RCA Victor has issued the first stereophonic recording of this important symphony, with Andre Previn directing the London Symphony Orchestra (RCA stereo LSC 2927, $5.78). This is unquestionably Previn's finest recording, after his only moderate success in earlier recordings of music of Rachmaninoff, Shostakovitch and Tchaikovsky.

It bodes well for his forthcoming series of the symphonies of Vaughan Williams, now being recorded. His approach is impetuous and vigorous, and he achieves a marvelous rapport with the excellent orchestra. Sound addicts will revel in the magnificent recorded sound, one of RCA's top sonic efforts.

A considerably lower standard of reproduction and performance are found on another new RCA LP with Erich Leinsdorf directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in prosaic interpretations of the "Symphony No. 3 in F" and "Tragic Overture" of Brahms (RCA stereo LSC 2936, $5.79). These are adequate performances, but not of the standard of the top versions, and the recorded sound is blurred and over-resonant.

Another new RCA disc features music of Franz Schubert, excerpts from "Rosamunde" and "The Magic Harp' performed by the Orchestra and Chorus of Naples conducted by Denis Vaughan (RCA stereo LSC 2937, $5.79). Included are the overture to "The Magic Harp," usually known as the "Rosamunde" overture, two ballet excerpts, the Entr'acte in B Flat and the brief but lovely Romance from "Rosamunde," the latter exquisitely sung by soprano Lucia Popp.

From "The Magic Harp" there is the Larghetto, the Chorus of Genii, Overture to Act III, Melodrama and Final Chorus.

Vaughan offers relaxed, flowing performances, the orchestra is fine and the recorded sound excellent, although not of the standard of the Walton symphony mentioned above. For those who want highlights from two of Schubert's most engrossing scores this new record will prove entirely satisfactory.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

AUG 1966

BARTOK: Concerto for Orchestra. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor FTC 2130. The Bostonians gave the world premiere of this music, on December 1, 1944, and the orchestra plays it today with a sense of pride and affection—deservedly. For the score is surely one of the classics of twentieth-century music. An experienced theatre conductor such as Leinsdorf is just the sort of man to bring out the drama of the work and carry a sweeping

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, April [illegible]

[illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] continue their popular Series" on RCA with a recording of the Third Symphony and the "Scythian" Suite (Victor LSC 2934). (The series includes the Sixth Symphony and the Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2, with John Browning). The Third uses material from Prokofiev's opera "[illegible]" and [illegible] recalled at certain dramatic moments (for example, in the fury of the scherzo) the symphonic form shapes a new work. The performance is exciting.

159

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

JAN 28 1967

Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. [illegible] in [illegible] Browning, piano, with the [illegible] Orchestra conducted by [illegible] Leinsdorf. RCA Victor stereo LSC 289[illegible] mono LM 2897, $4.79.

Of the numerous "younger" pianists who have made a special province of Prokofievland, Browning is one who has claim to be a peer of the realm. For, in addition to the sharp rhythmic sense and the percussive strength required to articulate the composer's patterns, Browning has the richness and depth of sound to provide the necessary contrast. Add to this rather more emotional candor than [illegible] by some of his contemporaries, and the range of Browning's resources [illegible] clearly [illegible]. In these two works he has the advantage also of strong and sympathetic collaboration [illegible] Leinsdorf, who clearly sees the music Browning's way. The high quality of orchestral performance leaves nothing wanting for outstanding results.

The Cleveland Press
D. 370,759

SEP 23 1966

New Albums Herald Orchestra Season

By Jim Frankel

[illegible] The Prokofiev Piano Concertos No. [illegible] are rarely works which have not been recorded often. RCA Victor has issued an LP starring John Browning as soloist with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. The record is the latest in Victor's useful Prokofiev series.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

JAN 13 1967

MUSIC

NEW WORKS
Treat Worth the Travail

Seven years ago, the Ford Foundation gave Pianist Jacob Lateiner a $5,000 grant to commission a new work. "Being very lazy by nature," he explains, "I did not want to spend time learning a new piece that I could only play a few times because of its novelty. I wanted to strive for something, no matter how difficult it might be, that would be valuable decades from now." So Lateiner asked Elliott Carter, one of modern music's most original and complex composers, to write a piano concerto.

Carter completed the piece only a year ago, and then Lateiner, a deeply cerebral pianist (TIME, Aug. 19), worked on it doggedly for nine months. He postponed last fall's scheduled première for two months so that he could practice it some more, at one point holed up in the Steinway warehouse in Boston for six hours a day. Finally, last week Carter's concerto was given its world première, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Lateiner's homework paid off. He played with a flair and a command that are rare in such a complex work, and though the concerto provoked a few shudders among antimodernists in the audience, it was a treat worth the travail.

Misguided Mass. In conception, the concerto is an extension of the ideas that Carter expounded in his 1959 String Quartet No. 2, in which the "individual behavior patterns" of each instrument clash and clamor for attention like so many egocentrics in a group-therapy session. Carter describes his Piano Concerto as a conflict between man and society: "The piano is born. Then the orchestra teaches it what to say. The piano learns. Then it learns the orchestra is wrong. They fight and the piano wins—not triumphantly, but with a few weak, sad notes—sort of Charlie Chaplin humorous." In the first movement, the piano lightheartedly followed the lead of the orchestra, then gradually swerved off on its own tangent, while the orchestra shouted its disapproval with great thunderclaps of dense, dissonant chords.

In the second and final movement, the orchestra passively receded, as the piano charged ahead impulsively in a passionate recitative, interrupted now and then by a concertino (three winds, four strings) that Carter likens to "Job's friends, who sympathize and comment." After one final free-for-all, the concerto ended with a quiet, reflective passage by the piano, signifying, says Carter, "the alienation of the individual from the misguided mass." The score rumbled and shook and shouted in constantly shifting tempos and atonalities and astonishingly original—and difficult—rhythms. Most striking was Carter's technique of "swamping"—building thick, eerie clouds of sound by simultaneously intertwining dozens of musical strands.

Carter, a professor of music at M.I.T., is one of America's outstanding contemporary composers, but as with most modernists, his works earn only a pittance. So he reasons: "Since you don't get any money, you might as well do things that amuse you. It takes me a long time to write a piece of music—anywhere from months to years—and simple ideas would bore me before I got through. Anyway, I want to invent something I haven't heard before."

HILTON FEINBERG

CARTER & LATEINER [illegible]
The piano wi[illegible]

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

SEPT 4 1966

RCA VICTOR is continuing its Prokofiev series with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The last release is a coupling of the "Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 10" and "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, Op. 16" played by John Browning (RCA stereo LSC 2897, $5.79). The performances are assuredly spectacular, and the recorded sound superior to that of most other records in Victor's Prokofiev series.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 35,000 S. 36,500

SEP 24 1966

DISC COURSE ON CLASSICS

Browning Brilliant In Prokoviev's Works

By Bert Willard
News-Press Staff Writer

From the time of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, we have heard of child prodigies and moppets who have talent to burn—and always the comparison has been with the genius of Mozart.

Such comparisons are hardly fair, it seems, for there is, and was, one Mozart. There will never be another.

But there are several composers, even of this contemporary era, who approach Mozart in profundity and musical talent—I say "approach" not equal.

OPERAS AT AGE 13

One of these is Seryozha (Sergei) Prokoviev who at the tender age of 13 had already written four operas, two sonatas, a symphony and numerous pieces for piano.

Sergei Sergeyevich in 1904 was presented by his proud mother, herself a musician of some ability, to a formidable jury of professors at the St. Petersburg Conservatory — this jury including Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounov and Liadov, all renowned composers in their own right.

Rimsky-Korsakoff recognized this budding talent immediately, and the world has been better for it. But that wasn't all for Sergei. After his acceptance at the Conservatory, Prokoviev had to take courses from Taneyev, Gliere, Anna Yosipova, Tcherepnin, Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakoff before his works were published or played.

Such was the academic training of a genius. And it led to world fame, not only as a composer but as a performer (Prokoviev was a first-rate pianist) and conductor.

ONE-MOVEMENT WORK

Now comes a brilliantly-recorded set of Prokoviev's Piano Concertos 1 and 2 (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2897) with John Browning, himself a prodigy of sorts, as the piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The First Piano Concerto, Op. 10, begun in 1911, was considered by the composer to be his "first more or less mature composition, both in conception and realization." Originally conceived as a concertino, the long one-movement work achieved almost instantaneous success, combining rhythmic drive with polytonal effects — one of the composer's trademarks.

There was some criticism of the First Concerto—superficiality, too much bravura, an excess of acrobatic tendencies—but that did not deter Prokoviev from striving for greater depth and maturity in the Second Concerto.

The Second, according to pianists who have played it, is a difficult work. It has a long cadenza in the first movement, one that demands the utmost from the performer; the scherzo is typically puckish and brilliant, the intermezzo is on the dissonant and angular side, and the finale, with its savagery and Slavic feeling, brings the work to a brilliant climax.

In Browning's capable hands, nothing is missing. The intent of the composer is felt in every passage. A student of Rosina Lhevinne, young Browning has indicated in past recordings his musicianship—and with the backing of the Boston Symphony, he comes through with an impeccable performance.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 146,403 SAT. 134,613

NOV 26 1966

[redacted]

Leinsdorf did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a season ago is the utterly stunning collaboration with John Browning on the Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2 RCA Victor LSC-2897 (also Mono).

No. 1 is full of driving rhythms, amply expansive tunes, and much brilliant display, and the hand-in-glove pertinent touches throughout. The Symphony is tremendously dashing and exciting.

No. 2 is more introspective, but Browning does not stress the somewhat morbid character of its lyricism. It has an enormously difficult and extended cadenza in the first movement, a motoric drive and steely strength in the second, and plenty of delightfully impertinent touches throughut. There is still some extrovert display, and a real explosion at the Coda.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAY 1966

Stereotape Reviews

KODÁLY: Suite from "Háry János"; Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, "The Peacock"; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2216, $7.95.

T IN Háry János Leinsdorf is a little sober for my taste; I prefer the London Symphony's lighter performance under Kertesz, also available on tape (Ampex/London 80159). Kertesz also has the advantage of what seems to me to be a better coupling—the Galanta Dances and two arias from Háry. My feeling about the Peacock Variations is that it is Movie music—with a capital M but movie music none the less. Still it is indeed a hardy man who can resist the BSO's blazing execution of either work; in this respect its Háry far surpasses the London Symphony's. And Leinsdorf's Toni Koves-Steiner is a superior cimbalist. The RCA Victor sound is excellent. —W.B.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUN 1966

S ● KODÁLY: Háry János—Suite; Peacock Variations. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2859 $5.79, LM 2859* $4.79.

Performance: Stiff-necked
Recording: Splendiferous
Stereo Quality: A-1

S ● KODÁLY: Háry János—Suite; Marosszék Dances; Galánta Dances. Budapest Philharmonic Orchestra, János Ferencsik cond. QUALITON SLPX 1194* $5.98, LPX 1194 $5.98.

Performance: Wholly authentic
Recording: Somewhat diffuse

The two performances of Háry János tell the tale here: Leinsdorf is all spit and polish, like a Prussian drillmaster. The sound is beautiful, the vital impulse nil. The Hungarians may suffer from rather diffuse sonics, but the easy humor and high spirits of their performance go to the head like the finest Tokay wine. The same wonderful, easy-breathing vitality informs their readings of the two sets of Kodály dances. They compare well in every way to those of the Czech Philharmonic playing Dvořák, Smetana, or Janáček; it's in the blood of these players, and the spirit comes through in every bar.

I have had a more than passing acquaintance with Kodály's 1938-39 Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, The Peacock, for I remember well Kodály's own conducting of the piece with the CBS Symphony before World War II, and I supervised Antal Dorati's Mercury recording with the Chicago Symphony in 1954.

This lovely and [illegible] colored score sparkles with all the finesse and virtuosity that the Boston Symphony can bring to it, as well as the superbly detailed RCA Victor sound. But would that Leinsdorf could have let the music breathe a little more naturally, which it does on the more crudely played and recorded DGG disc with Gyorgy Lehel and the Hungarian Radio Symphony.

If I were to buy the RCA disc, it would surely be for the Peacock Variations; but the imported Qualiton disc—diffuse sound and all—I'd recommend without reservation, just as an example of the right style for this music, especially the Galánta and Marosszék dances. D. H.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

AUG 1966

S DUKE ELLINGTON: The Duke at Tanglewood. Duke Ellington (piano); John Lamb (bass); Louis Bellson (drums); Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler cond. Caravan; Sophisticated Lady; Satin Doll; and nine others. RCA VICTOR FTC 2214 $7.95.

Performance: Ill-advised
Recording: Fair
Stereo Quality: Fair
Speed and Playing Time: 7½ ips; 26'

There are several reasons why this album is an artistic failure. One is the careless arranging by Richard Hayman for the Boston Pops Orchestra, which backs Ellington. One wonders why Hayman didn't do something with these fine Ellington standards, instead of just grinding them out like dull dance-band arrangements with strings added. Had Hayman perhaps written orchestral settings in which Ellington and his rhythm section performed as "soloists," he might have produced something exciting. As for the Duke's piano playing, he didn't have a chance; he had nothing to work with.

But the biggest disaster here is the orchestra's performance. This album proves for the hundredth time the helplessness of most symphonic players to deal with other musical idioms. One can almost hear their condescension. Listen to the incredible stiffness of the brass on I'm Beginning to See the Light (on such phrases as "Used to ramble through the park/ Shadow-boxing in the dark," etc.). In Love Scene the lines for French horns all sound like hunting calls. In short, most of these players don't know what they're doing in the context of this music. Ellington's drummer, Louis Bellson, does his best to limber up the orchestra, but to no avail. Their attempt to "swing" is embarrassing.

The album, apparently recorded outdoors, has a remote but echoey sound. And you have to sit through all the applause of the live performance, too.

If you like Duke Ellington, and have a feeling for his musical significance, pass up this album, for none of his flavor comes through. M. A.

BRONXVILLE, N. Y.
REVIEW PRESS-REPORTER
W. 3,500

JAN 19 1967

Symphony Concert In Mount Vernon

John Browning, pianist, will be soloist in the third concert of the 1966 - 1967 season of the Philharmonic Symphony of Westchester at Wood Auditorium on Saturday, Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

John Barnett is musical director and conductor of the symphony.

Mr. Browning will be featured in Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G Major. The orchestra will also be heard in Bach - Walton Suite from the Ballet "The Wise Virgins" and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major.

Mr. Browning made his professional debut at the age of 10, playing Mozart's Coronation Concerto in a special concert with members of the Denver Symphony. In the 10 years since he made his New York debut with the New York Philharmonic, in Febraruy, 1956, as winner of the Leventritt Award, he has become an international star, who appears yearly with the major American orchestras.

In 1962 he had the distinction of creating the world premiere of Samuel Barber's Pulitzer Prize Winning First Piano Concerto as soloist with the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, during the gala opening week of Lincoln Center.

His performance at the world premiere won for the Concerto an immediate success and later that year he gave it its Belgian and English premieres as well as playing it with the Brussels Philharmonic and Philharmonic Orchestra of London.

In the spring and early summer of 1965, he made an 11-week tour of the Soviet Union and Western Europe as soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra, directed by George Szell. Sponsored by the U.S. State Department, the tour covered key cities in the Soviet Union, Sweden, Poland, Germany, France, Czechoslovakia and England.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 144,948 SUN. 155,094

OCT 16 1966

[redacted]

Kodaly's melodic and [illegible] Suite from "Hary Janos" gets the benefit of a splendid performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, in an RCA Victor album. The program also includes Kodaly's Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, "The Peacock."

159

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

JAN 28 1967

Prokofiev: [illegible] Browning, piano, with the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra conducted by [illegible] Leinsdorf. RCA Victor stereo LSC 2897, [illegible]; mono, LM 2897, $4.79.

Of the numerous "younger" pianists who have made a special province of Prokofievland, Browning is one who has claim to be a peer of the realm. For, in addition to the sharp rhythmic sense and the percussive strength required to articulate the composer's patterns, Browning has the richness and depth of sound to provide the necessary contrast. Add to this rather more emotional candor than is considered good form by some of his contemporaries, and the range of Browning's resources is clearly beyond the usual. In these two works he has the advantage also of strong and sympathetic collaboration from Leinsdorf, who clearly sees the music Browning's way. The high quality of orchestral performance leaves nothing wanting for outstanding results.

The Cleveland Press
D. 370,759
SEP 23 1966

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

JAN 13 1967

New Albums Herald Orchestra Season

By Jim Frankel

The Prokofiev Piano Concertos No. 1 and No. 2 are early works which have not been recorded often. RCA Victor has just issued an LP starring John Browning as soloist with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. The record is the latest in Victor's useful Prokofiev series.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 35,000 S. 36,500

SEP 24 1966

MUSIC

NEW WORKS

Treat Worth the Travail

Seven years ago, the Ford Foundation gave Pianist Jacob Lateiner a $5,000 grant to commission a new work. "Being very lazy by nature," he explains, "I did not want to spend time learning a new piece that I could only play a few times because of its novelty. I wanted to strive for something, no matter how difficult it might be, that would be valuable decades from now." So Lateiner asked Elliott Carter, one of modern music's most original and complex composers, to write a piano concerto.

Carter completed the piece only a year ago, and then Lateiner, a deeply cerebral pianist (TIME, Aug. 19), worked on it doggedly for nine months. He postponed last fall's scheduled première for two months so that he could practice it some more, at one point holed up in the Steinway warehouse in Boston for six hours a day. Finally, last week Carter's concerto was given its world première, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Lateiner's homework paid off. He played with a flair and a command that are rare in such a complex work, and though the concerto provoked a few shudders among anti-modernists in the audience, it was a treat worth the travail.

Misguided Mass. In conception, the concerto is an extension of the ideas that Carter expounded in his 1959 String Quartet No. 2, in which the "individual behavior patterns" of each instrument clash and clamor for attention like so many egocentrics in a group-therapy session. Carter describes his Piano Concerto as a conflict between man and society: "The piano is born. Then the orchestra teaches it what to say. The piano learns. Then it learns the orchestra is wrong. They fight and the piano wins—not triumphantly, but with a few weak, sad notes—sort of Charlie Chaplin humorous." In the first movement, the piano lightheartedly followed the lead of the orchestra, then gradually swerved off on its own tangent, while the orchestra shouted its disapproval with great thunderclaps of dense, dissonant chords.

In the second and final movement, the orchestra passively receded, as the piano charged ahead impulsively in a passionate recitative, interrupted now and then by a concertino (three winds, four strings) that Carter likens to "Job's friends, who sympathize and comment." After one final free-for-all, the concerto ended with a quiet, reflective passage by the piano, signifying, says Carter, "the alienation of the individual from the misguided mass." The score rumbled and shook and shouted in constantly shifting tempos and atonalities and astonishingly original—and difficult—rhythms. Most striking was Carter's technique of "swamping"—building thick, eerie clouds of sound by simultaneously intertwining dozens of musical strands.

Carter, a professor of music at M.I.T., is one of America's outstanding contemporary composers, but as with most modernists, his works earn only a pittance. So he reasons: "Since you don't get any money, you might as well do things that amuse you. It takes me a long time to write a piece of music—anywhere from months to years—and simple ideas would bore me before I got through. Anyway, I want to invent something I haven't heard before."

MILTON FEINBERG

CARTER & LATEINER IN BOSTON
The piano wins—but sadly.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

SEPT 4 1966

RCA VICTOR is continuing its Prokofiev series with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The last release is a coupling of the "Piano Concerto No. 1, Op. 10" and "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, Op. 16" played by John Browning (RCA stereo LSC 2897, $5.79). The performances are assuredly spectacular, and the recorded sound superior to that of most other records in Victor's Prokofiev series.

DISC COURSE ON CLASSICS

Browning Brilliant In Prokoviev's Works

By Bert Willard
News-Press Staff Writer

From the time of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, we have heard of child prodigies and moppets who have talent to burn—and always the comparison has been with the genius of Mozart.

Such comparisons are hardly fair, it seems, for there is, and was, one Mozart. There will never be another.

But there are several composers, even of this contemporary era, who approach Mozart in profundity and musical talent—I say "approach" not equal.

OPERAS AT AGE 13

One of these is Seryozha (Sergei) Prokoviev who at the tender age of 13 had already written four operas, two sonatas, a symphony and numerous pieces for piano.

Sergei Sergeyevich in 1904 was presented by his proud mother, herself a musician of some ability, to a formidable jury of professors at the St. Petersburg Conservatory — this jury including Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounov and Liadov, all renowned composers in their own right.

Rimsky-Korsakoff recognized this budding talent immediately, and the world has been better for it. But that wasn't all for Sergei. After his acceptance at the Conservatory, Prokoviev had to take courses from Taneyev, Gliere, Anna Yosipova, Tchereppnin, Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakoff before his works were published or played.

Such was the academic training of a genius. And it led to world fame, not only as a composer but as a performer (Prokoviev was a first-rate pianist) and conductor.

ONE-MOVEMENT WORK

Now comes a brilliantly-recorded set of Prokoviev's Piano Concertos 1 and 2 (RCA Victor LM-LSC-2897) with John Browning, himself a prodigy of sorts, as the piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The First Piano Concerto, Op. 10, begun in 1911, was considered by the composer to be his "first more or less mature composition, both in conception and realization." Originally conceived as a concertino, the long one-movement work achieved almost instantaneous success, combining rhythmic drive with polytonal effects — one of the composer's trademarks.

There was some criticism of the First Concerto—superficiality, too much bravura, an excess of acrobatic tendencies—but that did not deter Prokoviev from striving for greater depth and maturity in the Second Concerto.

The Second, according to pianists who have played it, is a difficult work. It has a long cadenza in the first movement, one that demands the utmost from the performer; the scherzo is typically puckish and brilliant, the intermezzo is on the dissonant and angular side, and the finale, with its savagery and Slavic feeling, brings the work to a brilliant climax.

In Browning's capable hands, nothing is missing. The intent of the composer is felt in every passage. A student of Rosina Lhevinne, young Browning has indicated in past recordings his musicianship—and with the backing of the Boston Symphony, he comes through with an impeccable performance.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 146,403 SAT. 134,613

NOV 26 1966

[redacted]

Leinsdorf did with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a season ago is the utterly stunning collaboration with John Browning on the Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2 RCA Victor LSC-2897 (also Mono).

No. 1 is full of driving rhythms, amply expansive tunes, and much brilliant display, and the hand-in-glove pertinent touches throughout. the Symphony is tremendously dashing and exciting.

No. 2 is more introspective, but Browning does not stress the somewhat morbid character of its lyricism. It has an enormously difficult and extended cadenza in the first movement, a motoric drive and steely strength in the second, and plenty of delightfully impertinent touches throughut. There is still some extrovert display, and a real explosion at the Coda.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAY 1966

Stereotape Reviews

KODÁLY: Suite from "Háry János"; Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, "The Peacock"; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Four Track 7½ ips. Stereo Tape, RCA Victor FTC-2216, $7.95.

TIN Háry János Leinsdorf is a little sober for my taste; I prefer the London Symphony's lighter performance under Kertesz, also available on tape (Ampex/London 80159). Kertesz also has the advantage of what seems to me to be a better coupling—the Galanta Dances and two arias from Háry. My feeling about the Peacock Variations is that it is Movie music—with a capital M but movie music none the less. Still it is indeed a hardy man who can resist the BSO's blazing execution of either work; in this respect its Háry far surpasses the London Symphony's. And Leinsdorf's Toni Koves-Steiner is a superior cimbalist. The RCA Victor sound is excellent. —W.B.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

JUN 1966

Ⓢ ● KODÁLY: Háry János—Suite; Peacock Variations. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2859 $5.79, LM 2859* $4.79.

Performance: Stiff-necked
Recording: Splendiferous
Stereo Quality: A-1

Ⓢ Ⓜ KODÁLY: Háry János—Suite; Marosszék Dances; Galánta Dances. Budapest Philharmonic Orchestra, János Ferencsik cond. QUALITON SLPX 1194* $5.98, LPX 1194 $5.98.

Performance: Wholly authentic
Recording: Somewhat diffuse

The two performances of Háry János tell the tale here: Leinsdorf is all spit and polish, like a Prussian drillmaster. The sound is beautiful, the vital impulse nil. The Hungarians may suffer from rather diffuse sonics, but the easy humor and high spirits of their performance go to the head like the finest Tokay wine. The same wonderful, easy-breathing vitality informs their readings of the two sets of Kodály dances. They compare well in every way to those of the Czech Philharmonic playing Dvořák, Smetana, or Janáček; it's in the blood of these players, and the spirit comes through in every bar.

I have had a more than passing acquaintance with Kodály's 1938-39 Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, The Peacock, for I remember well Kodály's own conducting of the piece with the CBS Symphony before World War II, and I supervised Antal Dorati's Mercury recording with the Chicago Symphony in 1954.

This lovely and prismatically colored score sparkles with all the finesse and virtuosity that the Boston Symphony can bring to it, as well as the superbly detailed RCA Victor sound. But would that Leinsdorf could have let the music breathe a little more naturally, which it does on the more crudely played and recorded DGG disc with Gyorgy Lehel and the Hungarian Radio Symphony.

If I were to buy the RCA disc, it would surely be for the Peacock Variations; but the imported Qualiton disc—diffuse sound and all—I'd recommend without reservation, just as an example of the right style for this music, especially the Galánta and Marosszék dances. D. H.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

AUG 1966

Ⓢ DUKE ELLINGTON: The Duke at Tanglewood. Duke Ellington (piano); John Lamb (bass); Louis Bellson (drums); Boston Pops Orchestra. Arthur Fiedler cond. Caravan; Sophisticated Lady; Satin Doll; and nine others. RCA VICTOR FTC 2214 $7.95.

Performance: Ill-advised
Recording: Fair
Stereo Quality: Fair
Speed and Playing Time: 7½ ips; 26'

There are several reasons why this album is an artistic failure. One is the careless arranging by Richard Hayman for the Boston Pops Orchestra, which backs Ellington. One wonders why Hayman didn't do something with these fine Ellington standards, instead of just grinding them out like dull dance-band arrangements with strings added. Had Hayman perhaps written orchestral settings in which Ellington and his rhythm section performed as "soloists," he might have produced something exciting. As for the Duke's piano playing, he didn't have a chance; he had nothing to work with.

But the biggest disaster here is the orchestra's performance. This album proves for the hundredth time the helplessness of most symphonic players to deal with other musical idioms. One can almost hear their condescension. Listen to the incredible stiffness of the brass on I'm Beginning to See the Light (on such phrases as "Used to ramble through the park/ Shadow-boxing in the dark," etc.). In Love Scene the lines for French horns all sound like hunting calls. In short, most of these players don't know what they're doing in the context of this music. Ellington's drummer, Louis Bellson, does his best to limber up the orchestra, but to no avail. Their attempt to "swing" is embarrassing.

The album, apparently recorded outdoors, has a remote but echoey sound. And you have to sit through all the applause of the live performance, too.

If you like Duke Ellington, and have a feeling for his musical significance, pass up this album, for none of his flavor comes through. M. A.

BRONXVILLE, N. Y.
REVIEW PRESS-REPORTER
W. 3,500

JAN 19 1967

Symphony Concert In Mount Vernon

John Browning, pianist, will be soloist in the third concert of the 1966 - 1967 season of the Philharmonic Symphony of Westchester at Wood Auditorium on Saturday, Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

John Barnett is musical director and conductor of the symphony.

Mr. Browning will be featured in Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G Major. The orchestra will also be heard in Bach - Walton Suite from the Ballet "The Wise Virgins" and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major.

Mr. Browning made his professional debut at the age of 10, playing Mozart's Coronation Concerto in a special concert with members of the Denver Symphony. In the 10 years since he made his New York debut with the New York Philharmonic, in Febraruy, 1956, as winner of the Leventritt Award, he has become an international star, who appears yearly with the major American orchestras.

In 1962 he had the distinction of creating the world premiere of Samuel Barber's Pulitzer Prize Winning First Piano Concerto as soloist with the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, during the gala opening week of Lincoln Center.

His performance at the world premiere won for the Concerto an immediate success and later that year he gave it its Belgian and English premieres as well as playing it with the Brussels Philharmonic and Philharmonic Orchestra of London.

In the spring and early summer of 1965, he made an 11-week tour of the Soviet Union and Western Europe as soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra, directed by George Szell. Sponsored by the U.S. State Department, the tour covered key cities in the Soviet Union, Sweden, Poland, Germany, France, Czechoslovakia and England.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 144,948 SUN. 155,094

OCT 16 1966

wax works
With The Classics

Kodaly's melodic and lively Suite from "Hary Janos" gets the benefit of a splendid performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, in an RCA Victor album. The program also includes Kodaly's Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, "The Peacock."

THE GRAMOPHONE
OCTOBER 1966
207

MAHLER. Symphony No. 6 in A minor. BERG Der Wein†. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Item marked † with Phyllis Curtin (soprano). RCA-Victor (M) RE5542-3 (S) SER5542-3 (two 12 in., 64s. 10d. plus 12s. 4d. PT).
Symphony No. 6: VSO, Adler (12/62) (R) (M) LSU3059-60

Since the deletion of the Holland Festival recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, the Charles Adler version has held the field in solitary glory. 'Glory' is not too strong a word to apply to Adler's enterprise, or to his really fine performance, considering that he was working with a less than top-class orchestra, and with insufficient rehearsal time. But now his record is inevitably eclipsed by this new RCA-Victor issue, which benefits from a superior professionalism in performance and orchestral playing, a far higher standard of engineering, a first-ever stereo version, and (for those who like value for money) a whole side of Alban Berg into the bargain. Furthermore, the version used is Mahler's final revision, published by the International Mahler Society in 1963 (four years after Adler's death).

Leinsdorf's performance is characteristic—in the quicker music he is ruthlessly extrovert in his concentration on sheer physical excitement, and in the slow music he is extremely sensitive to every nuance of the dynamics and phrasing. This is undoubtedly a very exciting performance, with a beautifully presented slow movement; the only question is, does he really get down into the inner meaning and feeling of the music? To some extent the music can speak for itself, it may be said; but in my opinion Leinsdorf's quickish tempi often leave it unable to speak more than half what it has to say, and sometimes less than that. In his first movement, I miss the dogged, sullen tramping character of the march-rhythms, which Adler brings out so powerfully; and in the Scherzo the tremendous sense of brutal menace, which Adler reveals with his extremely deliberate tempo, is removed entirely by the tearaway speed at which Leinsdorf takes it. Also his account of the fragile trio-section lacks the extreme delicacy of Adler, particularly in the coda; Adler is superb in bringing out the almost unbearable pathos of this passage, whereas with Leinsdorf one would never guess that it was pathetic at all.

The slow movement, as I have said, is beautifully presented: Leinsdorf, like Adler, takes it very slowly, well below Mahler's marking of Andante moderato, but the effect, in both cases, is most beautiful and moving. And in the finale, Leinsdorf comes into his own. His driving tempo for the main Allegro energico and his fine control of the whole structure prevent this vast movement from ever bogging down. Yet even so, Adler's greater breadth achieves the same effect and gives much more mighty stature to the music. Incidentally, I was surprised that a glaring too-early horn entry in the Leinsdorf finale (bar 565) had been allowed to stand and not be re-taken. All in all, this performance, exciting as it is, will only serve until a really great one appears—one that gives the music the full space it

OVER

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1966

Again, Mahler Symphonies by Leinsdorf and Bernstein

IN MANY WAYS Mahler's Sixth and Seventh Symphonies, vastly different though they may be as pieces of music, have parallel histories. Both have been somewhat neglected in the concert hall, although they have had their vigorous partisans among conductors (Mitropoulos and Steinberg come to mind). Both, however, achieved two recordings before their present stereo versions came into circulation. The late F. Charles Adler—who, whether or not one likes his performances, is deserving of highest praise for his pioneering efforts—started the ball rolling by recording the Sixth with the Wiener Symphoniker for his enterprising SPA label (unfortunately, no longer in existence). A little later came Eduard Flipse's Rotterdam Philharmonic version on Epic. These two recordings may now, however, be considered as superseded. Leinsdorf's is the first stereo Sixth, and the first to use the new Critical Edition.

There are two major points of controversy in this Critical Edition. They concern (1) the order of movements and (2) the hammer-strokes in the Finale. Leinsdorf has followed the lead of editor Erwin Ratz in these matters, and so they must be discussed.

In the first published edition of the Sixth (C. F. Kahnt, 1906) the Scherzo was placed second, the Andante third. This order was reversed in the second edition (1908). Ratz insists that the composer was "influenced" (by whom?) to make that change. Mahler, he continues, "very soon realized that the basic plan was thereby disrupted, and accordingly restored the original sequence." However, Ratz says, these instructions were never carried out by the publisher. The point seems to be moot. We might almost say that, since Mahler has authorized both versions, which one to choose becomes a matter of taste! Certainly the Scherzo-Andante order has its points. The Scherzo continues the demonic impetus of the first movement, while the serene Andante gives us a much-needed breathing space before the turmoil of the Finale.

As to the third hammer-stroke in the Finale, Ratz states that it was Mahler's final intention to delete it. I consider this questionable, for the "program" of the Finale certainly calls for the fateful three strokes. If Alma Mahler's evidence is to be accepted (not always a wise thing to do!) we may believe that the three hammer-strokes were played in descending dynamic order at the première in June, 1906. Richard Strauss did not comprehend this: "I can't understand why Mahler deprives himself of such a wonderful effect in the last movement—why, he wastes his greatest strength at the beginning and then becomes weaker and weaker!" Alma, however, defended her husband: "He [Strauss] never understood Mahler. Here, as always, his theatrical nature betrayed itself. That Mahler had to make the first blow the strongest, the second weaker, and the third (the death-blow to the expiring hero) the weakest, is clear to anyone who has the MAHLER: Symphony No. 6 in A minor; BERG: Le vin; Phyllis Curtin (soprano, in the latter); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-7044, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo LSC-7044, $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night"); New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Columbia set M2L-339, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo M2S-739, $11.58.

which left the listener as spent as [illegible] the George-Baudelaire instance, these

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

NOV 1966

Mahler: Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural, LM 7044, [illegible])

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

BY MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

needs to make its overpowering effect.

The stereo recording is a fine one, with a fullness of sound that is rather lacking on the mono (even by mono standards), but in both, the brass is not sufficiently in the picture: in particular, quite a number of the many fortissimo trumpet counterpoints do not cut through the texture as they always do in the concert hall. The bells and cowbells, which are often such an embarrassment, are treated very discreetly here—perhaps a little too discreetly, since they are at times almost inaudible.

On the fourth side, Berg's concert aria Der Wein is given an impassioned, almost hysterical performance, to which Phyllis Curtin's extremely vibrant voice, always dead in the centre of the note, contributes much. The balance is excellent, keeping Berg's complex and fascinating textures well to the fore, without covering the voice. Actually, the work becomes Le Vin in this performance, since Leinsdorf and Miss Curtin have restored Baudelaire's original text in place of the poor German translation. I can't say I care for the change myself: the heavy Germanic declamation of Berg's vocal line hardly suits the French language, let alone the subtle prosody of Baudelaire.

With regard to the Mahler Symphony, there are two important textual points. In the new Mahler Society edition used by Leinsdorf, the second and third movements are switched around: scherzo second, slow movement third. Apparently Mahler originally had them this way round, then changed them on the advice of friends, for publication, and later restored the original order. This may be so, but it is clear he was in some doubt as to the most satisfying order, and he might well have changed his mind again if he had lived. I know I am not alone amongst Mahlerians in preferring the order in the original publication. If the slow movement is placed third, it seems too late for the work to move on to such an idyllic plane after the long, grim first movement and the long, grim scherzo; whereas the bright ending of the first movement allows for such an idyll to follow immediately and be contradicted, in the traditional way, by the Scherzo, returning to the original mood of the symphony. Also certain E flat passages in the A minor first movement foreshadow the mood of the E flat slow movement; and the final climax of the Scherzo is a sustained pungent chord which is used to open the finale.

The other textual point concerns the famous three hammer-blows in the finale. Apparently, Mahler asked for the third one (which he called the 'death-blow') to be removed, for superstitious reasons; and it is left out in this score and performance. Personally I feel that too much has been made of this matter, since no one has ever hit on a way of producing the doom-like kind of noise Mahler specified at these points. The sound of the first two, in this recording, is merely that of a rather loud thwack being added to the percussive effects; and its inclusion or omission the third time (or any of the other times for that matter) is really immaterial to the impact of the music.

D.C.

Mahler Symphonies
einsdorf and Bernstein

ahler's Sixth and s, vastly different s pieces of music, Both have been the concert hall, d their vigorous ctors (Mitropoulos o mind). Both, recordings before ersions came into . Charles Adler—s likes his perform-highest praise for -started the ball e Sixth with the r his enterprising ely, no longer in ter came Eduard lharmonic version cording may now, d as superseded. stereo Sixth, and w Critical Edition. or points of con-al Edition. They of movements and es in the Finale. the lead of editor atters, and so they ed edition of the 1906) the Scherzo he Andante third. ed in the second insists that the ced" (by whom?) Mahler, he con-ized that the basic plan was thereby disrupted, and accordingly restored the original sequence." However, Ratz says, these instructions were never carried out by the publisher. The point seems to be moot. We might almost say that, since Mahler has authorized both versions, which one to choose becomes a matter of taste! Certainly the Scherzo-Andante order has its points. The Scherzo continues the demonic impetus of the first movement, while the serene Andante gives us a much-needed breathing space before the turmoil of the Finale.

As to the third hammer-stroke in the Finale, Ratz states that it was Mahler's final intention to delete it. I consider this questionable, for the "program" of the Finale certainly calls for the fateful three strokes. If Alma Mahler's evidence is to be accepted (not always a wise thing to do!) we may believe that the three hammer-strokes were played in descending dynamic order at the première in June, 1906. Richard Strauss did not comprehend this: "I can't understand why Mahler deprives himself of such a wonderful effect in the last movement—why, he wastes his greatest strength at the beginning and then becomes weaker and weaker!" Alma, however, defended her husband: "He [Strauss] never understood Mahler. Here, as always, his theatrical nature betrayed itself. That Mahler had to make the first blow the strongest, the second weaker, and the third (the death-blow to the expiring hero) the weakest, is clear to anyone who has the

No. 6 in A minor; Phyllis Curtin (so-Boston Symphony d by Erich Leins-set LM-7044, four o LSC-7044, $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night"); New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Columbia set M2L-339, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo M2S-739, $11.58.

the George-Baudelaire instance, these

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

NOV 1966

Mahler, Symphony No. 6; Berg, Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural LM 7044, [illegible])

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his work. The "definitive" version is the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts of his symphonies by the are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

160

THE GRAMOPHONE
OCTOBER 1966

MAHLER. Symphony No. 6 in A minor. BERG Der Wein†. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Item marked † with Phyllis Curtin (soprano). RCA-Victor (M) RE5542-3 (S) SER5542-3 (two 12 in., 64s. 10d. plus 12s. 4d. PT).

Symphony No. 6: VSO, Adler (12/62) (R) (M) LSU3059-60

Since the deletion of the Holland Festival recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, the Charles Adler version has held the field in solitary glory. 'Glory' is not too strong a word to apply to Adler's enterprise, or to his really fine performance, considering that he was working with a less than top-class orchestra, and with insufficient rehearsal time. But now his record is inevitably eclipsed by this new RCA-Victor issue, which benefits from a superior professionalism in performance and orchestral playing, a far higher standard of engineering, a first-ever stereo version, and (for those who like value for money) a whole side of Alban Berg into the bargain. Furthermore, the version used is Mahler's final revision, published by the International Mahler Society in 1963 (four years after Adler's death).

Leinsdorf's performance is characteristic—in the quicker music he is ruthlessly extrovert in his concentration on sheer physical excitement, and in the slow music he is extremely sensitive to every nuance of the dynamics and phrasing. This is undoubtedly a very exciting performance, with a beautifully presented slow movement; the only question is, does he really get down into the inner meaning and feeling of the music? To some extent the music can speak for itself, it may be said; but in my opinion Leinsdorf's quickish tempi often leave it unable to speak more than half what it has to say, and sometimes less than that. In his first movement, I miss the dogged, sullen tramping character of the march-rhythms, which Adler brings out so powerfully; and in the Scherzo the tremendous sense of brutal menace, which Adler reveals with his extremely deliberate tempo, is removed entirely by the tearaway speed at which Leinsdorf takes it. Also his account of the fragile trio-section lacks the extreme delicacy of Adler, particularly in the coda; Adler is superb in bringing out the almost unbearable pathos of this passage, whereas with Leinsdorf one would never guess that it was pathetic at all.

The slow movement, as I have said, is beautifully presented: Leinsdorf, like Adler, takes it very slowly, well below Mahler's marking of Andante moderato, but the effect, in both cases, is most beautiful and moving. And in the finale, Leinsdorf comes into his own. His driving tempo for the main Allegro energico and his fine control of the whole structure prevent this vast movement from ever bogging down. Yet even so, Adler's greater breadth achieves the same effect and gives much more mighty stature to the music. Incidentally, I was surprised that a glaring too-early horn entry in the Leinsdorf finale (bar 565) had been allowed to stand and not be re-taken. All in all, this performance, exciting as it is, will only serve until a really great one appears—one that gives the music the full space it

OVER

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1966

Again, Mahler Symphonies by Leinsdorf and Bernstein

IN MANY WAYS Mahler's Sixth and Seventh Symphonies, vastly different though they may be as pieces of music, have parallel histories. Both have been somewhat neglected in the concert hall, although they have had their vigorous partisans among conductors (Mitropoulos and Steinberg come to mind). Both, however, achieved two recordings before their present stereo versions came into circulation. The late F. Charles Adler—who, whether or not one likes his performances, is deserving of highest praise for his pioneering efforts—started the ball rolling by recording the Sixth with the Wiener Symphoniker for his enterprising SPA label (unfortunately, no longer in existence). A little later came Eduard Flipse's Rotterdam Philharmonic version on Epic. These two recordings may now, however, be considered as superseded. Leinsdorf's is the first stereo Sixth, and the first to use the new Critical Edition.

There are two major points of controversy in this Critical Edition. They concern (1) the order of movements and (2) the hammer-strokes in the Finale. Leinsdorf has followed the lead of editor Erwin Ratz in these matters, and so they must be discussed.

In the first published edition of the Sixth (C. F. Kahnt, 1906) the Scherzo was placed second, the Andante third. This order was reversed in the second edition (1908). Ratz insists that the composer was "influenced" (by whom?) to make that change. Mahler, he continues, "very soon realized that the basic plan was thereby disrupted, and accordingly restored the original sequence." However, Ratz says, these instructions were never carried out by the publisher. The point seems to be moot. We might almost say that, since Mahler has authorized both versions, which one to choose becomes a matter of taste! Certainly the Scherzo-Andante order has its points. The Scherzo continues the demonic impetus of the first movement, while the serene Andante gives us a much-needed breathing space before the turmoil of the Finale.

As to the third hammer-stroke in the Finale, Ratz states that it was Mahler's final intention to delete it. I consider this questionable, for the "program" of the Finale certainly calls for the fateful three strokes. If Alma Mahler's evidence is to be accepted (not always a wise thing to do!) we may believe that the three hammer-strokes were played in descending dynamic order at the première in June, 1906. Richard Strauss did not comprehend this: "I can't understand why Mahler deprives himself of such a wonderful effect in the last movement—why, he wastes his greatest strength at the beginning and then becomes weaker and weaker!" Alma, however, defended her husband: "He [Strauss] never understood Mahler. Here, as always, his theatrical nature betrayed itself. That Mahler had to make the first blow the strongest, the second weaker, and the third (the death-blow to the expiring hero) the weakest, is clear to anyone who has the MAHLER: Symphony No. 6 in A minor; BERG: Le vin; Phyllis Curtin (soprano, in the latter); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-7044, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo LSC-7044, $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night"); New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Columbia set M2L-339, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo M2S-739, $11.58.

which left the listener as spent as [illegible] the George-Baudelaire instance, these

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

NOV 1966

Mahler: Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural LM 7044, [illegible])

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to the "definitive" version of his find the "definitive" version Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscrips of his symphonies by the are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

needs to make its overpowering effect.

The stereo recording is a fine one, with a fullness of sound that is rather lacking on the mono (even by mono standards), but in both, the brass is not sufficiently in the picture: in particular, quite a number of the many fortissimo trumpet counterpoints do not cut through the texture as they always do in the concert hall. The bells and cowbells, which are often such an embarrassment, are treated very discreetly here—perhaps a little too discreetly, since they are at times almost inaudible.

On the fourth side, Berg's concert aria Der Wein is given an impassioned, almost hysterical performance, to which Phyllis Curtin's extremely vibrant voice, always dead in the centre of the note, contributes much. The balance is excellent, keeping Berg's complex and fascinating textures well to the fore, without covering the voice. Actually, the work becomes Le Vin in this performance, since Leinsdorf and Miss Curtin have restored Baudelaire's original text in place of the poor German translation. I can't say I care for the change myself: the heavy Germanic declamation of Berg's vocal line hardly suits the French language, let alone the subtle prosody of Baudelaire.

With regard to the Mahler Symphony, there are two important textual points. In the new Mahler Society edition used by Leinsdorf, the second and third movements are switched around: scherzo second, slow movement third. Apparently Mahler originally had them this way round, then changed them on the advice of friends, for publication, and later restored the original order. This may be so, but it is clear he was in some doubt as to the most satisfying order, and he might well have changed his mind again if he had lived. I know I am not alone amongst Mahlerians in preferring the order in the original publication. If the slow movement is placed third, it seems too late for the work to move on to such an idyllic plane after the long, grim first movement and the long, grim scherzo; whereas the bright ending of the first movement allows for such an idyll to follow immediately and be contradicted, in the traditional way, by the Scherzo, returning to the original mood of the symphony. Also certain E flat passages in the A minor first movement foreshadow the mood of the E flat slow movement; and the final climax of the Scherzo is a sustained pungent chord which is used to open the finale.

The other textual point concerns the famous three hammer-blows in the finale. Apparently, Mahler asked for the third one (which he called the 'death-blow') to be removed, for superstitious reasons; and it is left out in this score and performance. Personally I feel that too much has been made of this matter, since no one has ever hit on a way of producing the doom-like kind of noise Mahler specified at these points. The sound of the first two, in this recording, is merely that of a rather loud thwack being added to the percussive effects; and its inclusion or omission the third time (or any of the other times for that matter) is really immaterial to the impact of the music.

D.C.

Mahler Symphonies
einsdorf and Bernstein

Mahler's Sixth and s, vastly different s pieces of music, Both have been the concert hall, ad their vigorous ctors (Mitropoulos to mind). Both, recordings before ersions came into . Charles Adler—e likes his perform- highest praise for started the ball he Sixth with the or his enterprising tely, no longer in ter came Eduard ilharmonic version cordings may now, d as superseded. stereo Sixth, and w Critical Edition. ior points of con- al Edition. They of movements and es in the Finale. the lead of editor matters, and so they ed edition of the 1906) the Scherzo the Andante third. sed in the second insists that the aced" (by whom?) Mahler, he con- lized that the basic plan was thereby disrupted, and accordingly restored the original sequence." However, Ratz says, these instructions were never carried out by the publisher. The point seems to be moot. We might almost say that, since Mahler has authorized both versions, which one to choose becomes a matter of taste! Certainly the Scherzo-Andante order has its points. The Scherzo continues the demonic impetus of the first movement, while the serene Andante gives us a much-needed breathing space before the turmoil of the Finale.

As to the third hammer-stroke in the Finale, Ratz states that it was Mahler's final intention to delete it. I consider this questionable, for the "program" of the Finale certainly calls for the fateful three strokes. If Alma Mahler's evidence is to be accepted (not always a wise thing to do!) we may believe that the three hammer-strokes were played in descending dynamic order at the première in June, 1906. Richard Strauss did not comprehend this: "I can't understand why Mahler deprives himself of such a wonderful effect in the last movement—why, he wastes his greatest strength at the beginning and then becomes weaker and weaker!" Alma, however, defended her husband: "He [Strauss] never understood Mahler. Here, as always, his theatrical nature betrayed itself. That Mahler had to make the first blow the strongest, the second weaker, and the third (the death-blow to the expiring hero) the weakest, is clear to anyone who has the

, No. 6 in A minor; Phyllis Curtin (so- Boston Symphony d by Erich Leins- set LM-7044, four o LSC-7044, $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night"); New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Columbia set M2L-339, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo M2S-739, $11.58.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

NOV 1966

Mahler, Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural, LM-7044, $9.58).

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

BY MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts of his symphonies by the are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

THE GRAMOPHONE
OCTOBER 1966
207

MAHLER. Symphony No. 6 in A minor. BERG Der Wein†. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; † with Phyllis

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
OCT 1966

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ment of No. 4 (half a bar before letter I), he clearly but unobtrusively separates the important legato high E of the unison strings (first note of the ensuing motive) from the preceding tremolo, instead of just letting them run together as if they were tied, as is usually the case. Needless to say, he does not fail to articulate the repeated legato notes in the ineffable Trio of No. 2. There are a few miscalculations of detail, as I shall relate, but not an extraneous idiosyncrasy anywhere.

Akeo Watanabe

One of the most impressive things about Watanabe's orchestra is its consistent beauty of tone, together with its sonority. And the players certainly display a manifest flair and relish for what they are doing here. Attacks are not invariably so razor-sharp as they might be, though generally excellent; otherwise, the ensemble is infallibly good. Triplets, used by Sibelius more frequently than by almost any other composer since classical times, are punctilious. Watanabe pays close attention to all phrase markings, particularly stresses.

The sense of power which this orchestra can generate is furthered by Watanabe's direct approach in things like the Poco a poco un pochissimo stretto which concludes No. 3, taking in its savage stride such virtuoso horn work as we get at cue 19. The strings have a marvelous lightness without losing body, even when, as in No. 6, they are subdivided into as many as nine parts for considerable stretches. Especially good are the first 27 bars of this work (in the Dorian mode, rather than D minor), scored entirely for violins in four parts plus violas, and the enchanting flautato string passage in the second movement. In the Andante of No. 2, their ppp in the F sharp major passage is really ethereal.

The strings are never allowed to blanket single wind lines—a common failing in Sibelius recordings. All the woodwinds, especially the bassoons, come through superbly, whether singly or en masse. The brasses have solidity, and a real bite whenever required. In the solo brass department, I could only wish that the beginning of the first climactic trombone solo in No. 7 had rung out more clearly, for seldom has a solo pronouncement been more impressively led up to than in this Sibelian peroration.

All dynamic markings are scrupulously followed, and the resulting balance is good, with the possible exception of two special categories. I think that Sibelius's timp markings often need to be compensated upward to some extent, an example being the high point in the Largo movement of No. 4 (after letter G). Karajan, for example, compensates the mere "forte" which is prescribed for the timpani at this climactic point, where "ff" and "fff" markings are otherwise thrown about profusely, and the resulting effect, in his recording, seems to me to convey the true sense of the music. I would also have liked a more viable harp sound in No. 6. Sibelius uses the harp only in the First and Sixth Symphonies—quite differently in each case.

I still cannot accept the use of glockenspiel (for Glocken) in the Finale of No. 4, and Watanabe makes the further mistake of not playing this movement in strict time to the end. (He makes his first ritardando just before T, and the spell is thereupon broken.) This Allegro was played absolutely correctly by Szell in Cleveland last season, but not by anyone on records to date. In No. 5, the Misterioso passage of the Finale is played in a ppp of incredible lightness-cum-clarity. I would have liked more broadening out for the ensuing allargando.

In the playful third movement of No. 6, the passage with the persistent dotted rests and the fragmented flute theme is performed with such delicate precision, and yet with such a saucy spirit, that it has never sounded more curiously like whole struc... from ever bogging down. ... Adler's greater breadth achieves the same effect and gives much more mighty stature to the music. Incidentally, I was surprised that a glaring too-early horn entry in the Leinsdorf finale (bar 565) had been allowed to stand and not be re-taken. All in all, this performance, exciting as it is, will only serve until a really great one appears—one that gives the music the full space it

(Continued on page 120)

OVER

Reviews

...IKA NEWLIN

...test understanding of the symphony." ...ever, in the published score of 1906, ... the second and third hammer-strokes ... marked fortissimo! Jack Diether—...se album notes are informative and ...ulating—believes, apparently, that ... deletion "could have been prompted ...ly by Mahler's superstitious fear."

This may well be, but I still believe ...t the third stroke is necessary in order ...ound off the drama of the piece. It is ...o an important formal device. As I ...pointed out long ago in my Bruckner-Mahler-Schoenberg, each of the hammer-strokes not only marks a major emotional climax, but also points up an important moment in the form. (Specifically, the third hammer-stroke comes at that critical point in the coda where A major, which seemed for a while about to win out over the somber A minor as it did in the first movement, finally disappears from view with a vigorous statement of Mahler's ...ateful "motto" theme—an A major triad ...inking to an A minor one.)

What is not controversial about the hammer-strokes is that here—as in every other performance I have ever heard—they are simply not loud enough. Mahler battled with this problem even at the first performance, and every other conductor has done so since then. Here I should like to risk a statement: this is one case in which, because what Mahler obviously wanted could not be achieved by the means available to him, we would be justified in electronically enhancing the sound so as to gain the desired physical and psychological effect. It must be as shocking as a blow in the pit of the stomach!

The present performance of the Sixth Symphony sets a very high standard indeed. While not quite so overwhelming as some I have heard in concert (I recall in particular one under Mitropoulos which left the listener as spent as Mahler's defeated "tragic hero"!), it certainly conveys the tragic grandeur of the work.

On the other hand, this performance of Berg's Der Wein (I deliberately use the German title!) seems to me an unfortunate example of what happens when one tries to be more authentic than the composer. The trouble seems to have begun with Hans F. Redlich's discussion of the aria in his Berg biography. He comments: "It is a pity that Berg, whose knowledge of French seems to have been only elementary, became acquainted with Baudelaire's poems in Stefan George's translations, in which the poetical climate is radically changed. Baudelaire's elegant obscenities are often transposed to a lower key of severe solemnity, and some of the lines are deliberately rendered inaccurately. . . So great is the discrepancy between Baudelaire's original and George's translation that Berg's work is 'one big Ossia,' to quote a caustic remark by T. W. Adorno." Whether influenced by this statement, or by other considerations, Leinsdorf and Phyllis Curtin decided to do the work in French! But surely this misses the point that Berg's setting was originally designed for and inspired by George's translation (though a melodic line adapted to the French—and thus, of necessity, radically altered—is printed in the score). Of course George deliberately re-interpreted certain lines of the original; but the fact is that Berg set George's version, and therefore this is what we should hear. In my judgment, any claim that a performance in French is "more authentic" would be specious.

I may cite here a parallel case from my own experience. As is well known, the verses which Schoenberg set in Pierrot Lunaire are Otto Erich Hartleben's German translations of French poems by Albert Giraud. Naturally enough, as in the George-Baudelaire instance, these

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500
OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000
NOV 1966

Mahler, Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural LM 7044, $9.58).

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399
NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

BY MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his work. The "definitive" version is the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscrips of his symphonies by the ... are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

THE GRAMO...
OCTOBER

MAHLER. Symphony
BERG Der Weint. 1
Orchestra conduct dorf. Item marke
Curtin (soprano)

translations are by no means literal; in fact, they even contain mistakes. Now, at the time when Schoenberg made his famous first recording of Pierrot Lunaire, I had prepared English translations of these German poems. Schoenberg liked them, and wanted them published with the records. But there was a catch: because, I believe, of copyright problems at the time (World War II was still in progress), Columbia Records advised me that translations from the German would not be acceptable but that I should re-translate from the French "originals". Schoenberg was incensed at this idea. The German verses, he said, were—mistakes and all—what he had set; therefore, I should concern myself with these alone. In fact, I should not even look at the French verses! (The upshot of all this was that no translations at all were published with the album; instead, brief summaries by Nicolas Slonimsky were included.)

What would Schoenberg have said to the "Frenchification" of Berg? I can imagine! In any case, for those who want to hear the German text (and the original melodic line) of Berg's lush, rather decadent aria—a worthy predecessor of "Lulu"—I recommend the only other available recording: Bethany Beardslee's (with Robert Craft, in Columbia album M2L-271/M2S-620, including also the "Lulu" Suite, the Chamber Concerto, the three orchestrated movements of the Lyric Suite, and the Seven Early Songs).

In other words, by all means do acquire the Leinsdorf album—not for the sake of Berg, however, but for the sake of Mahler!

▼

IT IS ASTONISHING to have, within a comparatively short time, two new major recordings of the Seventh Symphony! (See the June ARG for my review of Maurice Abravanel's on Vanguard [7]1141/2.) Arnold Schoenberg, ever a firm adherent of this work, would have been delighted. His spirited defense of the Seventh against the onslaughts of New York Times critic Olin Downes, after the historic Mitropoulos performance in December of 1948, is not to be forgotten. It is good, too, to recall what Schoenberg felt as he wrote to Mahler in 1909, when he first heard this Symphony:". . . a perfect repose based on artistic harmony. Something that moves me without just ruthlessly shifting my center of gravity; something that draws me tranquilly and pleasantly to itself—an attraction such as guides the planets, letting them travel along their own courses, influencing these, yes, but so evenly, so entirely according to plan, that there is no longer any jarring, any violence."

I quote this Schoenbergian "purple passage" with design, for it seems to me that just this quality of "perfect repose based on artistic harmony" is what I missed in Leonard Bernstein's performance. (Admittedly, such a happy state is difficult to attain in this problematic Symphony!) He often overstresses detail, thereby destroying balance. A typical example occurs in the second theme of the first movement—a lyrical effusion which can easily become over-sentimental. Mahler has marked a number of key-notes of this melody with fermate. However, as his footnote clearly states, the fermate "do not indicate a long hold, but simply a slight extension. Also, 'drangend' (pressing forward) is merely a direction for phrasing and is to be carried out very discreetly." (Italics mine) Bernstein evidently did not read the footnote, or did not care to observe it. As a result, all these little nuances are vastly overemphasized, and the passage has a strangely seasick sound. (Abravanel also has his troubles with this theme, which he tends to drag; this is in contradiction to Mahler's direction "Mit grossem Schwung", which clearly indicates that this music should move.)

The whole first movement, in Bernstein's version, has a shriller, more blaring sound than in Abravanel's. There creeps into Bernstein's performance of this movement, at times, a certain almost hysterical quality which I do not think the composer intended. Bernstein really lets himself go in the Finale—obviously delighting in the din of the final bell-[illegible]e (cue no. 293 in the Critical Edition [illegible]). To me, he [illegible] the vulgarity of the movement more than is [illegible] to the music. Incidentally, I was surprised that a glaring too-early horn entry in the Leinsdorf finale (bar 565) had been allowed to stand and not be re-taken. All in all, this performance, exciting as it is, will only serve until a really great one appears—one that gives the music the full space it necessary; but perhaps that is the only thing to do with it. (I cannot agree with annotator Jack Diether that this Rondo-Finale is one of Mahler's "most original triumphs". I still find it the weakest of his Finales.)

(Continued on page 120)

OVER

INFORMATION OBSCURED

(Continued from page 116)

Certain instrumental details come out more clearly in Bernstein's version than in Abravanel's. (For instance, in the first Nachtmusik the Rute, a bundle of rushes used to switch the bass drum, can scarcely be heard in Abravanel's version but comes out strongly in Bernstein's.) Yet I cannot rid myself of the feeling that Bernstein, striving mightily to identify with Mahler, too often finds his love for the composer unrequited by its object! Abravanel, by not trying so hard to make Mahler's points for him, frequently may achieve the more convincing result.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

INSTRUMENTALIST
EAVANSTON, ILL.
MONTHLY 15,000

NOV 1966

Mahler, Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; RCA Victor LSC 7044, box of two discs, $11.58 (monaural LM 7044, $9.58).

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

by MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his work. The "definitive" version is being prepared by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts of his symphonies by the way are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

THE GRAMOPHONE
OCTOBER 1966

MAHLER. Symphony No. 6 in A minor.
BERG Der Wein†. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Item marked † with Phyllis Curtin (soprano). RCA-Victor Ⓜ RE5542-3 Ⓢ SER5542-3 (two 12 in., 64s. 10d. plus 12s. 4d. PT).
Symphony No. 6:
VSO, Adler (12/62) (R) Ⓜ LSU3059-60

Since the deletion of the Holland Festival recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, the Charles Adler version has held the field in solitary glory. 'Glory' is not too strong a word to apply to Adler's enterprise, or to his really fine performance, considering that he was working with a less than top-class orchestra, and with insufficient rehearsal time. But now his record is inevitably eclipsed by this new RCA-Victor issue, which benefits from a superior professionalism in performance and orchestral playing, a far higher standard of engineering, a first-ever stereo version, and (for those who like value for money) a whole side of Alban Berg into the bargain. Furthermore, the version used is Mahler's final revision, published by the International Mahler Society in 1963 (four years after Adler's death).

Leinsdorf's performance is characteristic—in the quicker music he is ruthlessly extrovert in his concentration on sheer physical excitement, and in the slow music he is extremely sensitive to every nuance of the dynamics and phrasing. This is undoubtedly a very exciting performance, with a beautifully presented slow movement; the only question is, does he really get down into the inner meaning and feeling of the music? To some extent the music can speak for itself, it may be said; but in my opinion Leinsdorf's quickish tempi often leave it unable to speak more than half what it has to say, and sometimes less than that. In his first movement, I miss the dogged, sullen tramping character of the march-rhythms, which Adler brings out so powerfully; and in the Scherzo the tremendous sense of brutal menace, which Adler reveals with his extremely deliberate tempo, is removed entirely by the tearaway speed at which Leinsdorf takes it. Also his account of the fragile trio-section lacks the extreme delicacy of Adler, particularly in the coda; Adler is superb in bringing out the almost unbearable pathos of this passage, whereas with Leinsdorf one would never guess that it was pathetic at all.

The slow movement, as I have said, is beautifully presented: Leinsdorf, like Adler, takes it very slowly, well below Mahler's marking of Andante moderato, but the effect, in both cases, is most beautiful and moving. And in the finale, Leinsdorf comes into his own. His driving tempo for the main Allegro energico and his fine control of the whole structure prevent this vast movement from ever bogging down. Yet even so, Adler's greater breadth achieves the same effect and gives much more mighty stature to the music. Incidentally, I was surprised that a glaring too-early horn entry in the Leinsdorf finale (bar 565) had been allowed to stand and not be re-taken. All in all, this performance, exciting as it is, will only serve until a really great one appears—one that gives the music the full space it

OVER

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1966

Again, Mahler Symphonies by Leinsdorf and Bernstein

IN MANY WAYS Mahler's Sixth and Seventh Symphonies, vastly different though they may be as pieces of music, have parallel histories. Both have been somewhat neglected in the concert hall, although they have had their vigorous partisans among conductors (Mitropoulos and Steinberg come to mind). Both, however, achieved two recordings before their present stereo versions came into circulation. The late F. Charles Adler—who, whether or not one likes his performances, is deserving of highest praise for his pioneering efforts—started the ball rolling by recording the Sixth with the Wiener Symphoniker for his enterprising SPA label (unfortunately, no longer in existence). A little later came Eduard Flipse's Rotterdam Philharmonic version on Epic. These two recordings may now, however, be considered as superseded. Leinsdorf's is the first stereo Sixth, and the first to use the new Critical Edition.

There are two major points of controversy in this Critical Edition. They concern (1) the order of movements and (2) the hammer-strokes in the Finale. Leinsdorf has followed the lead of editor Erwin Ratz in these matters, and so they must be discussed.

In the first published edition of the Sixth (C. F. Kahnt, 1906) the Scherzo was placed second, the Andante third. This order was reversed in the second edition (1908). Ratz insists that the composer was "influenced" (by whom?) to make that change. Mahler, he continues, "very soon realized that the basic plan was thereby disrupted, and accordingly restored the original sequence." However, Ratz says, these instructions were never carried out by the publisher. The point seems to be moot. We might almost say that, since Mahler has authorized both versions, which one to choose becomes a matter of taste! Certainly the Scherzo-Andante order has its points. The Scherzo continues the demonic impetus of the first movement, while the serene Andante gives us a much-needed breathing space before the turmoil of the Finale.

As to the third hammer-stroke in the Finale, Ratz states that it was Mahler's final intention to delete it. I consider this questionable, for the "program" of the Finale certainly calls for the fateful three strokes. If Alma Mahler's evidence is to be accepted (not always a wise thing to do!) we may believe that the three hammer-strokes were played in descending dynamic order at the première in June, 1906. Richard Strauss did not comprehend this: "I can't understand why Mahler deprives himself of such a wonderful effect in the last movement—why, he wastes his greatest strength at the beginning and then becomes weaker and weaker!" Alma, however, defended her husband: "He [Strauss] never understood Mahler. Here, as always, his theatrical nature betrayed itself. That Mahler had to make the first blow the strongest, the second weaker, and the third (the death-blow to the expiring hero) the weakest, is clear to anyone who has the MAHLER: Symphony No. 6 in A minor; BERG: Le vin; Phyllis Curtin (soprano, in the latter); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-7044, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo LSC-7044, $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 7 in E minor ("Song of the Night"); New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Columbia set M2L-339, four sides, $9.58, or Stereo M2S-739, $11.58.

160

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,500

OCT 24 1966

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general "background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

THE MAILMAN AND DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain,
Plodding to work on
mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun
float up to front doors
in black-draped raincoat,
hooded helmet
flare like a wimple,
and deliver the mail
through a driven,
coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters,
as if the envelopes were
sealed with quietude,
a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

The Leinsdorf recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony presents a vigorous, well-paced performance, that effectively underlines its tragic effect. Recordings of the Sixth are few, and because of its clarity and its consistency of interpretation this is probably the best available.

The symphony takes three sides; the fourth side contains Berg's 'Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist. Her performance is splendid, but Leinsdorf's decision to use the original French text instead of the German translation was a mistake of pedantry. The sound of a language becomes so integral a part of a composer's concept, that if he has worked with a translation the original does not fit the music. This is particularly true of French, whose melody is so different from languages with stronger stress. An English translation could have come closer to Berg's intended effect than the French original does.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 15,399

NOV 12 1966

Many Orchestras Record Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now, and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements — making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.) Performance of his symphonies — which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments — are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

161
The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012
FEB 5 1967

ERIE DAILY TIMES
ERIE, PA.
D. 55,227
OCT 27 1966

New England Newsclip Agency
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
HORNELL TRIBUNE
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

New Flood of Fine Mahler Record

By Paul Hume

FOR WEEKS we have been flooded with superb new recordings of the great works of Mahler, until now we are at the almost unbelievable point of having truly memorable recordings of nearly every note he wrote.

We are almost as well supplied with the symphonic catalog of Bruckner, lacking only a great account of his Second Symphony. In any such complete documenting of a composer on records, there are bound to be duplications. But with both Mahler and Bruckner, they have not yet reached the point where either the composer or the public seems to suffer from overexposure.

Two new recordings of the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner have come out simultaneously. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony on Victor 2918, putting the symphony on a single disc. Eugen Jochum conducts the music with the Berlin Philharmonic on DGG 39134/35, spreading the symphony over three sides and adding the Bavarian Radio Chorus in five motets on the fourth side.

The sound is excellent in both sets, the Bostonians playing with a brighter texture and more determined drive than the Berliners. In the long run, I prefer the somewhat more spacious pace and mellower tone of the Berlin ensemble, but if you want your Bruckner not quite so enlarged, you will prefer the single Victor disc, with its correspondingly lower cost. The motets, however, are a valuable addition to the literature on records. Do not miss them by without a hearing.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
APR 8 1967

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900
DEC 1966

Record Review

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 in A Minor
Berg: Le Vin (text by Baudelaire)
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; RCA Victor LSC-7044 (stereo) and LM-7044: two records

The Sixth is the least recorded of Mahler's symphonies; indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that this is the first time it has been recorded well. Mr. Leinsdorf has been at pains to establish the proper text of the work, and he has given it a magnificent and blazing performance. Mahler's Sixth is a strongly percussive work of super-Wagnerian grandeur; it seethes with emotional tension, and is colored by such exotic instruments as cowbells, chimes, tam-tam, and a special kind of semi-musical hammer devised by Mahler himself. Leinsdorf gives the work a driving forcefulness without depriving it of its spacious exaltation. If anything can establish Mahler's Sixth in the repertory, this recording is it.

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts four RCA Victor recording sessions, including Mahler's "Symphony No. 3" with Shirley Verrett, upper left, and the Elliott Carter "Piano Concerto" with soloist Jacob Lateiner. The maestro goes over a point with violinist Itzhak Perlman while pressing Sibelius' "Violin Concerto," and listens to a playback of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tenor Carlo Bergonzi and soprano Leontyne Price. The Verdi work was recorded with the RCA Italiana Orchestra, while Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony was the orchestra in the other sessions.

Researchers Seek 'Definitive' Works by Gustav Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements—making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.)

Performance of his symphonies—which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments—are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

Here are a few of the more recent ones:

Mahler's Fourth Symphony (written in 1900) is played by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, on Columbia. Mahler's symphonies reflect pessimism, spiritual conflict, philosophical seeking. They are scaled large—can be bombastic or noble, occasionally sentimental and sometimes use folk tunes.

The Fourth is the most joyful, using sleigh bells and a first movement melody a listener long remembers. In the fourth movement, which is more solemn, soprano Judith Raskin sings.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony was performed in the United States by Dimitri Mitropoulous in 1947 and 1955. Its third performance was by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. The symphony has recorded it (a first in America) for RCA. (two LPs).

The Sixth is said to express the idea of ultimate tragic destiny—with a four-note fate motif placed in march time, to depict man marching to his destiny. But the first movement is far from gloomy; it ends joyfully and contains a beautiful lyric theme.

Mahler's Symphony No. 7 is called "Song of the Night" (not by the composer) because listeners have pictured its opening chords spreading a curtain of dark and its five movements each depicting an aspect of night, from the mysterious, sensuous first movement to fear of gobbins of the third and dawn breaking of the fifth.

Two recordings, both two LP sets, of the Seventh Symphony are out, both using the Gesellschaft's "critical edition."

One is by Maurice Abravanel and the Utah Symphony on Vanguard. This group's recording of the Eighth Symphony last year was widely hailed. The Eighth contains an enormous orchestra, two mixed choruses, boys chorus and eight soloists.

The New York Philharmonic's performance, under Leonard Bernstein, of the Eighth last season also was considered an "event" in the music world.

The Philharmonic has made an inspired recording of the Seventh, for Columbia.

Two versions of the Ninth are out also—both magnificent.

Sir John Barbirolli and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recorded Mahler's Ninth for Angel in a church outside Berlin, (two LPs). They used 17 hours of recording time.

The late Bruno Walter gave the Ninth its premiere in 1912—more than a year after Mahler died. Columbia has issued his 1961 recording of it, in Los Angeles with the Columbia Symphony (18 hours of recording time). With Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," which is a somber song cycle or symphony for voices (tenor Ernst Hafliger and mezzo Mildred Miller here), it forms the three-LP set, "Bruno Walter's Mahler."

Side four, which follows the symphony, is a rare and interesting recording of a conductor at work. Walter is rehearsing for the recording of the Ninth—which he considered Mahler's most important work. He makes complicated explanations gently and the orchestra plays a difficult section again and again.

Walter was assistant to Mahler—a much respected conductor—for many years.

Mahler made an outline and preliminary sketches for five movements of a 10th Symphony.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
NOV 6 1966

Sampling Records

Mahler 6th, 7th Symphoines Available in Excellent Stereo

By LOUISE NICHOLAS

WITH NEW recordings of Mahler's 6th and 7th Symphonies, all 10 are now available in stereo performances of excellence, and mostly outstanding brilliance.

Symphony No. 7, with its prevailingly nocturnal air and its directness of melodic inspiration, as well as its wealth of quotation from Mahler's own earlier songs and symphonies, as well as from other sources (including Schumann's "Traumerei"), is the more immediately appealing of the two symphonies. Leonard Bernstein directs the New York Philharmonic in a wondrously controlled, yet marvelously intense performance which keeps these kaleidoscopically changing moods and tempi knit into a compelling whole (Columbia M2S 739, also Mono).

Erich Leinsdorf's performance of Symphony No. 6, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor LSC-7044, also Mono) is similarly impressive, but the work itself is more difficult to grasp, and more diffuse. It requires the largest orchestra of all Mahler's works, except the choral ones. The presentation which gave occasion for this recording was only the third in the United States, both the others having been given by Mitropo with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 and 1955.

The composer himself gave this work the subtitle "Tragic," and the idea of Man marching to his tragic destiny is inexorably pounded out in the first movement. Though the joyful second theme eventually wins out at the close of this movement, there is no such relief in the Finale, with its crushing "Blows-of-fate" pounded out by the special percussive instrument of Mahler's own devising known as the "Hammerschlag." There is a wonderfully idyllic third movement, but this provides only a too short interlude in the general atmosphere of tragedy.

The fourth record side is given over to Alban Berg's concert aria "Der Wein"—a 12-tone setting of free translations by Stefan George of three of the five poems entitled "Wine" in Baudelaire's "Flowers of Evil." Leinsdorf, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who is the vocalist here, have used the original French text. I am not sure this is a gain, for Miss Curtin sings with only a fair French accent, though she must be given credit for impressive command of this very difficult and demanding vocal line.

[illegible] Symphony — and RCA Victor as well — perform throughout on a very high level.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
NOV 26 1966

OFF THE RECORD

It's Fun to Try the New, But Standards Still Best

By DURWOOD McALISTER

For anyone reviewing new record releases there is an overwhelming temptation to concentrate on recordings of "new" works, unusual arrangements or "new" performers.

But, however worthy may be the new offerings, the best of any month's releases usually are those of old standards performed by the outstanding artists.

Durwood McAlister

Such is the case with recent symphonic releases, most notable of which is RCA Victor's album of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, performed by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The album (Stereo LSC 7044) does offer something "new" in that this is the first recording of the critical edition, International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. But no gimmick was needed. It is a giant of a symphony and its titanic forces are admirably realized by Leinsdorf. Completing the album is Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria with orchestra, sung here by Phillis Curtin.

WORCESTER TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,129 SUN. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

Records

[illegible] Cha[illegible] a three-record album of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston (RCA Victor). This set is a veritable treasury of good chamber music with a double bonus. There's a [illegible]ch record of commentary by Peter Ustinov and a most informative booklet on the music included in the package.

The group is rearranged; from a trio (on the one selection) to as many as nine on the Piston divertimento. All of it is easy, intimate listening and it's beautifully recorded in a close-up, cozy stereo sound.

161
The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012
FEB 5 1967

ERIE DAILY TIMES
ERIE, PA.
D. 55,227
OCT 27 1966

New England Newsclip Agency,
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
HORNELL TRIBUNE
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

New Flood of Fine Mahler Record

By Paul Hume

FOR WEEKS we have been flooded with superb new recordings of the great works of Mahler until now we are at the almost unbelievable point of having truly memorable recordings of nearly every note he wrote.

We are almost as well supplied with the symphonic catalog of Bruckner, lacking only a great account of his Second Symphony. In any such complete documenting of a composer on records, there are bound to be duplications. But with both Mahler and Bruckner, they have not yet reached the point where either the composer or the public seems to suffer from overexposure.

Two new recordings of the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner have come out simultaneously. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony on Victor 2915, putting the symphony on a single disc. Eugen Jochum conducts the music with the Berlin Philharmonic on DGG 39134/35, spreading the symphony over three sides and adding the Bavarian Radio Chorus in five motets on the fourth side.

The sound is excellent in both sets, the Bostonians playing with a brighter texture and more determined drive than the Berliners. In the long run, I prefer the somewhat more spacious pace and mellower tone of the Berlin ensemble, but if you want your Bruckner not quite so enlarged, you will prefer the single Victor disc, with its correspondingly lower cost. The motets, however, are choral beauties and a valuable addition to the literature on records. Do not pass them by without a hearing.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 50,000
APR 8 1967

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts four RCA Victor recording sessions, including Mahler's "Symphony No. 3" with Shirley Verrett, upper left, and the Elliott Carter "Piano Concerto" with soloist Jacob Lateiner. The maestro goes over a point with violinist Itzhak Perlman while pressing Sibelius' "Violin Concerto," and listens to a playback of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tenor Carlo Bergonzi and soprano Leontyne Price. The Verdi work was recorded with the RCA Italiana Orchestra, while Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony was the orchestra in the other sessions.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900
DEC 1966

Record Revie

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 in A M
Berg: Le Vin (text by Baudelaire)
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; RCA Victor LSC-7044 (stereo) and LM-7044: two records

The Sixth is the least recorded of Mahler's symphonies; indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that this is the first time it has been recorded well. Mr. Leinsdorf has been at pains to establish the proper text of the work, and he has given it a magnificent and blazing performance. Mahler's Sixth is a strongly percussive work of super-Wagnerian grandeur; it seethes with emotional tension, and is colored by such exotic instruments as cowbells, chimes, tam-tam, and a special kind of semi-musical hammer devised by Mahler himself. Leinsdorf gives the work a driving forcefulness without depriving it of its spacious exaltation. If anything can establish Mahler's Sixth in the repertory, this recording is it.

Researchers Seek 'Definitive' Works by Gustav Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements—making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.)

Performance of his symphonies—which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments—are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

Here are a few of the more recent ones:

Mahler's Fourth Symphony (written in 1900) is played by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, on Columbia. Mahler's symphonies reflect pessimism, spiritual conflict, philosophical seeking. They are scaled large—can be bombastic or noble, occasionally sentimental and sometimes use folk tunes.

The Fourth is the most joyful, using sleigh bells and a first movement melody a listener long remembers. In the fourth movement, which is more solemn, soprano Judith Raskin sings.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony was performed in the Unted States by Dimitri Mitropoulous in 1947 and 1955. Its third performance was by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. This symphony has recorded it (a first in America) for RCA. (two LPs).

The Sixth is said to express the idea of ultimate tragic destiny—with a four-note fate motif placed in march time, to depict man marching to his destiny. But the first movement is far from gloomy; it ends joyfully and contains a beautiful lyric theme.

Mahler's Symphony No. 7 is called "Song of the Night" (not by the composer) because listeners have pictured its opening chords spreading a curtain of dark and its five movements each depicting an aspect of night, from the mysterious, sensuous first movement to fear of gobbins of the third and dawn breaking of the fifth.

Two recordings, both two LP sets, of the Seventh Symphony are out, both using the Gesellschaft's "critical edition."

One is by Maurice Abravanel and the Utah Symphony on Vanguard. This group's recording of the Eighth Symphony last year was widely hailed. The Eighth contains an enormous orchestra, two mixed choruses, boys chorus and eight soloists.

The New York Philharmonic's performance, under Leonard Bernstein of the Eighth last season also was considered an "event" in the music world.

The Philharmonic has made an inspired recording of the Seventh, for Columbia.

Two versions of the Ninth are out also—both magnificent.

Sir John Barbirolli and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recorded Mahler's Ninth for Angel in a church outside Berlin, (two LPs). They used 17 hours of recording time.

The late Bruno Walter gave the Ninth its premiere in 1912—more than a year after Mahler died. Columbia has issued his 1961 recording of it, in Los Angeles with the Columbia Symphony (18 hours of recording time). With Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," which is a somber song cycle or symphony for voices (tenor Ernst Hafliger and mezzo Mildred Miller here), it forms the three-LP set, "Bruno Walter's Mahler."

Side four, which follows the symphony, is a rare and interesting recording of a conductor at work. Walter is rehearsing for the recording of the Ninth—which he considered Mahler's most important work. He makes complicated explanations gently and the orchestra plays a difficult section again and again.

Walter was assistant to Mahler—a much respected conductor—for many years.

Mahler made an outline and preliminary sketches for five movements of a 10th Symphony.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
NOV 26 1966

OFF THE RECORD

It's Fun to Try the New, But Standards Still Best

By DURWOOD McALISTER

For anyone reviewing new record releases there is an overwhelming temptation to concentrate on recordings of "new" works, unusual arrangements or "new" performers.

But, however worthy may be the new offerings, the best of any month's releases usually are those of old standards performed by the outstanding artists.

Durwood McAlister

Such is the case with recent symphonic releases, most notable of which is RCA Victor's album of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, performed by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The album (Stereo LSC 7044) does offer something "new" in that this is the first recording of the critical edition, International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. But no gimmick was needed. It is a giant of a symphony and its titanic forces are admirably realized by Leinsdorf. Completing the album is Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria with orchestra, sung here by Phillis Curtin.

WORCESTER TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,129 SUN. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

Records

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are heard in a three-record album of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston (RCA Victor). The set is a veritable treasury of good chamber music with a double bonus. There's a fetch record of commentary by Peter Ustinov and a most informative booklet on the music included in the package.

The group is rearranged; from a trio (on the Fine selection) to as many as nine on the Piston divertimento. All of it is easy, intimate listening and it's beautifully recorded in a close-up, cozy stereo sound.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
NOV 6 1966

Sampling Records

Mahler 6th, 7th Symphoines Available in Excellent Stereo

By LOUISE NICHOLAS

WITH NEW recordings of Mahler's 6th and 7th Symphonies, all 10 are now available in stereo performances of excellence, and mostly outstanding brilliance.

Symphony No. 7, with its prevailingly nocturnal air and its directness of melodic inspiration, as well as its wealth of quotation from Mahler's own earlier songs and symphonies, as well as from other sources (including Schumann's "Traumerei"), is the more immediately appealing of the two symphonies. Leonard Bernstein directs the New York Philharmonic in a wondrously controlled, yet marvelously intense performance which keeps these kaleidoscopically changing moods and tempi knit into a compelling whole (Columbia M2S 739, also Mono).

Erich Leinsdorf's performance of Symphony No. 6, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor LSC-7044, also Mono) is similarly impressive, but the work itself is more difficult to grasp, and more diffuse. It requires the largest orchestra of all Mahler's works, except the choral ones. The presentation which gave occasion for this recording was only the third in the United States, both the others having been given by Mitropo with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 and 1955.

The composer himself gave this work the subtitle "Tragic," and the idea of Man marching to his tragic destiny is inexorably pounded out in the first movement. Though the joyful second theme eventually wins out at the close of this movement, there is no such relief in the Finale, with its crushing "Blows-of-fate" pounded out by the special percussive instrument of Mahler's own devising known as the "Hammerschlag." There is a wonderfully idyllic third movement, but this provides only a too short interlude in the general atmosphere of tragedy.

The fourth record side is given over to Alban Berg's concert aria "Der Wein"—a 12-tone setting of free translations by Stefan George of three of the five poems entitled "Wine" in Baudelaire's "Flowers of Evil." Leinsdorf, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who is the vocalist here, have used the original French text. I am not sure this is a gain, for Miss Curtin sings with only a fair French accent, though she must be given credit for impressive command of this very difficult and demanding vocal line.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony — and RCA Victor as well — perform throughout on a very high level.

161
The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 441,306 SUN. 553,012
FEB 5 1967

ERIE DAILY TIMES
ERIE, PA.
D. 55,227
OCT 27 1966

New England Newsclip Agency,
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

New Flood of Fine Mahler Record

By Paul Hume

FOR WEEKS we have been flooded with superb new recordings of the great works of Mahler until now we are at the almost unbelievable point of having truly memorable recordings of nearly every note he wrote.

We are almost as well supplied with the symphonic catalog of Bruckner, lacking only a great account of his Second Symphony. In any such complete documenting of a composer on records, there are bound to be duplications. But with both Mahler and Bruckner, they have not yet reached the point where either the composer or the public seems to suffer from overexposure.

Two new recordings of the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner have come out simultaneously. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony on Victor 2915, putting the symphony on a single disc. Eugen Jochum conducts the music with the Berlin Philharmonic on DGG 39134/35, spreading the symphony over three sides and adding the Bavarian Radio Chorus in five motets on the fourth side.

The sound is excellent in both sets, the Bostonians playing with a brighter texture and more determined drive than the Berliners. In the long run, I prefer the somewhat more spacious pace and mellower tone of the Berlin ensemble, but if you want your Bruckner not quite so enlarged, you will prefer the single Victor disc, with its correspondingly lower cost. The motets, however, are choral beauties and a valuable addition to the literature on records. Do not pass them by without a hearing.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 50,000
APR 8 1967

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900
DEC 1966

Record Review

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 in A M
Berg: Le Vin (text by Baudelaire)
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; RCA Victor LSC-7044 (stereo) and LM-7044: two records

The Sixth is the least recorded of Mahler's symphonies; indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that this is the first time it has been recorded well. Mr. Leinsdorf has been at pains to establish the proper text of the work, and he has given it a magnificent and blazing performance. Mahler's Sixth is a strongly percussive work of super-Wagnerian grandeur; it seethes with emotional tension, and is colored by such exotic instruments as cowbells, chimes, tam-tam, and a special kind of semi-musical hammer devised by Mahler himself. Leinsdorf gives the work a driving forcefulness without depriving it of its spacious exaltation. If anything can establish Mahler's Sixth in the repertory, this recording is it.

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts four RCA Victor recording sessions, including Mahler's "Symphony No. 3" with Shirley Verrett, upper left, and the Elliott Carter "Piano Concerto" with soloist Jacob Lateiner. The maestro goes over a point with violinist Itzhak Perlman while pressing Sibelius' "Violin Concerto," and listens to a playback of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tenor Carlo Bergonzi and soprano Leontyne Price. The Verdi work was recorded with the RCA Italiana Orchestra, while Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony was the orchestra in the other sessions.

HOPKINS TRIBUNE
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

Researchers Seek 'Definitive' Works by Gustav Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements—making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.)

Performance of his symphonies—which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments—are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

Here are a few of the more recent ones:

Mahler's Fourth Symphony (written in 1900) is played by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, on Columbia. Mahler's symphonies reflect pessimism, spiritual conflict, philosophical seeking. They are scaled large—can be bombastic or noble, occasionally sentimental and sometimes use folk tunes.

The Fourth is the most joyful, using sleigh bells and a first movement melody a listener long remembers. In the fourth movement, which is more solemn, soprano Judith Raskin sings.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony was performed in the Unted States by Dimitri Mitropoulous in 1947 and 1955. Its third performance was by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. This symphony has recorded it (a first in America) for RCA. (two LPs).

The Sixth is said to express the idea of ultimate tragic destiny—with a four-note fate motif placed in march time, to depict man marching to his destiny. But the first movement is far from gloomy; it ends joyfully and contains a beautiful lyric theme.

Mahler's Symphony No. 7 is called "Song of the Night" (not by the composer) because listeners have pictured its opening chords spreading a curtain of dark and its five movements each depicting an aspe t of night, from the mysterious, sensuous first movement to fear of gobbins of the third and dawn breaking of the fifth.

Two recordings, both two LP sets, of the Seventh Symphony are out, both using the Gesellschaft's "critical edition."

One is by Maurice Abravanel and the Utah Symphony on Vanguard. This group's recording of the Eighth Symphony last year was widely hailed. The Eighth contains an enormous orchestra, two mixed choruses, boys chorus and eight soloists.

The New York Philharmonic's performance, under Leonard Bernstein, of the Eighth last season also was considered an "event" in the music world.

The Philharmonic has made an inspired recording of the Seventh, for Columbia.

Two versions of the Ninth are out also—both magnificent.

Sir John Barbirolli and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recorded Mahler's Ninth for Angel in a church outside Berlin, (two LPs). They used 17 hours of recording time.

The late Bruno Walter gave the Ninth its premiere in 1912—more than a year after Mahler died. Columbia has issued his 1961 recording of it, in Los Angeles with the Columbia Symphony (18 hours of recording time). With Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," which is a somber song cycle or symphony for voices (tenor Ernst Hafliger and mezzo Mildred Miller here), it forms the three-LP set, "Bruno Walter's Mahler."

Side four, which follows the symphony, is a rare and interesting recording of a conductor at work. Walter is rehearsing for the recording of the Ninth—which he considered Mahler's most important work. He makes complicated explanations gently and the orchestra plays a difficult section again and again.

Walter was assistant to Mahler—a much respected conductor—for many years.

Mahler made an outline and preliminary sketches for five movements of a 10th Symphony.

The Atlanta Constitution
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
NOV 26 1966

OFF THE RECORD

It's Fun to Try the New, But Standards Still Best

By DURWOOD McALISTER

For anyone reviewing new record releases there is an overwhelming temptation to concentrate on recordings of "new" works, unusual arrangements or "new" performers.

But, however worthy may be the new offerings, the best of any month's releases usually are those of old standards performed by the outstanding artists.

Durwood McAlister

Such is the case with recent symphonic releases, most notable of which is RCA Victor's album of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, performed by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The album (Stereo LSC 7044) does offer something "new" in that this is the first recording of the critical edition, International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. But no gimmick was needed. It is a giant of a symphony and its titanic forces are admirably realized by Leinsdorf. Completing the album is Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria with orchestra, sung here by Phillis Curtin.

WORCESTER TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,129 SUN. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

Records

THE BOSTON Symphony Chamber Players are heard in a three-record album of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston (RCA Victor). The set is a veritable treasury of good chamber music with a double bonus. There's a 10-inch record of commentary by Peter Ustinov and a most informative booklet on the music included in the package.

The group is rearranged; from a trio (on the Fine selection) to as many as nine on the Piston divertimento. All of it is easy, intimate listening and it's beautifully recorded in a close-up, cozy stereo sound.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
NOV 6 1966

Sampling Records

Mahler 6th, 7th Symphoines Available in Excellent Stereo

By LOUISE NICHOLAS

WITH NEW recordings of Mahler's 6th and 7th Symphonies, all 10 are now available in stereo performances of excellence, and mostly outstanding brilliance.

Symphony No. 7, with its prevailingly nocturnal air and its directness of melodic inspiration, as well as its wealth of quotation from Mahler's own earlier songs and symphonies, as well as from other sources (including Schumann's "Traumerei"), is the more immediately appealing of the two symphonies. Leonard Bernstein directs the New York Philharmonic in a wondrously controlled, yet marvelously intense performance which keeps these kaleidoscopically changing moods and tempi knit into a compelling whole (Columbia M2S 739, also Mono).

Erich Leinsdorf's performance of Symphony No. 6, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor LSC-7044, also Mono) is similarly impressive, but the work itself is more difficult to grasp, and more diffuse. It requires the largest orchestra of all Mahler's works, except the choral ones. The presentation which gave occasion for this recording was only the third in the United States, both the others having been given by Mitropo with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 and 1955.

The composer himself gave this work the subtitle "Tragic," and the idea of Man marching to his tragic destiny is inexorably pounded out in the first movement. Though the joyful second theme eventually wins out at the close of this movement, there is no such relief in the Finale, with its crushing "Blows-of-fate" pounded out by the special percussive instrument of Mahler's own devising known as the "Hammerschlag." There is a wonderfully idyllic third movement, but this provides only a too short interlude in the general atmosphere of tragedy.

The fourth record side is given over to Alban Berg's concert aria "Der Wein" a 12-tone setting of free translations by Stefan George of three of the five poems entitled "Wine" in Baudelaire's "Flowers of Evil." Leinsdorf, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who is the vocalist here, have used the original French text. I am not sure this is a gain, for Miss Curtin sings with only a fair French accent, though she must be given credit for impressive command of this very difficult and demanding vocal line.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony — and RCA Victor as well — perform throughout on a very high level.

161
The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012
FEB 5 1967

ERIE DAILY TIMES
ERIE, PA.
D. 55,227
OCT 27 1966

New England Newsclip Agency,
Box 2078, Boston 02106
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
HORNELL TRIBUNE
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

New Flood of Fine Mahler Record

By Paul Hume

FOR WEEKS we have been flooded with superb new recordings of the great works of Mahler until now we are at the almost unbelievable point of having truly memorable recordings of nearly every note he wrote.

We are almost as well supplied with the symphonic catalog of Bruckner, lacking only a great account of his Second Symphony. In any such complete documenting of a composer on records, there are bound to be duplications. But with both Mahler and Bruckner, they have not yet reached the point where either the composer or the public seems to suffer from overexposure.

Two new recordings of the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner have come out simultaneously. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony on Victor 2919, putting the symphony on a single disc. Eugen Jochum conducts the music with the Berlin Philharmonic on DGG 39134/35, spreading the symphony over three sides and adding the Bavarian Radio Chorus in five motets on the fourth side.

The sound is excellent in both sets, the Bostonians playing with a brighter texture and more determined drive than the Berliners. In the long run, I prefer the somewhat more spacious pace and mellower tone of the Berlin ensemble, but if you want your Bruckner not quite so enlarged, you will prefer the single Victor disc, with its correspondingly lower cost. The motets, however, are choral beauties and a valuable addition to the literature on records. Do not pass them by without a hearing.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
APR 8 1967

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts four RCA Victor recording sessions, including Mahler's "Symphony No. 3" with Shirley Verrett, upper left, and the Elliott Carter "Piano Concerto" with soloist Jacob Lateiner. The maestro goes over a point with violinist Itzhak Perlman while pressing Sibelius' "Violin Concerto," and listens to a playback of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tenor Carlo Bergonzi and soprano Leontyne Price. The Verdi work was recorded with the RCA Italiana Orchestra, while Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony was the orchestra in the other sessions.

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900
DEC 1966

Record Review

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 in A M
Berg: Le Vin (text by Baudelaire)

Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; RCA Victor LSC-7044 (stereo) and LM-7044: two records

The Sixth is the least recorded of Mahler's symphonies; indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that this is the first time it has been recorded well. Mr. Leinsdorf has been at pains to establish the proper text of the work, and he has given it a magnificent and blazing performance. Mahler's Sixth is a strongly percussive work of super-Wagnerian grandeur; it seethes with emotional tension, and is colored by such exotic instruments as cowbells, chimes, tam-tam, and a special kind of semi-musical hammer devised by Mahler himself. Leinsdorf gives the work a driving forcefulness without depriving it of its spacious exaltation. If anything can establish Mahler's Sixth in the repertory, this recording is it.

Researchers Seek 'Definitive' Works by Gustav Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements—making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.)

Performance of his symphonies—which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments—are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

Here are a few of the more recent ones:

Mahler's Fourth Symphony (written in 1900) is played by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, on Columbia. Mahler's symphonies reflect pessimism, spiritual conflict, philosophical seeking. They are scaled large—can be bombastic or noble, occasionally sentimental and sometimes use folk tunes.

The Fourth is the most joyful, using sleigh bells and a first movement melody a listener long remembers. In the fourth movement, which is more solemn, soprano Judith Raskin sings.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony was performed in the Unted States by Dimitri Mitropoulous in 1947 and 1955. Its third performance was by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. This symphony has recorded it (a first in America) for RCA. (two LPs).

The Sixth is said to express the idea of ultimate tragic destiny—with a four-note fate motif placed in march time, to depict man marching to his destiny. But the first movement is far from gloomy; it ends joyfully and contains a beautiful lyric theme.

Mahler's Symphony No. 7 is called "Song of the Night" (not by the composer) because listeners have pictured its opening chords spreading a curtain of dark and its five movements each depicting an aspect of night, from the mysterious, sensuous first movement to fear of gobbins of the third and dawn breaking of the fifth.

Two recordings, both two LP sets, of the Seventh Symphony are out, both using the Gesellschaft's "critical edition."

One is by Maurice Abravanel and the Utah Symphony on Vanguard. This group's recording of the Eighth Symphony last year was widely hailed. The Eighth contains an enormous orchestra, two mixed choruses, boys chorus and eight soloists.

The New York Philharmonic's performance, under Leonard Bernstein of the Eighth last season also was considered an "event" in the music world.

The Philharmonic has made an inspired recording of the Seventh, for Columbia.

Two versions of the Ninth are out also—both magnificent.

Sir John Barbirolli and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recorded Mahler's Ninth for Angel in a church outside Berlin, (two LPs). They used 17 hours of recording time.

The late Bruno Walter gave the Ninth its premiere in 1912—more than a year after Mahler died. Columbia has issued his 1961 recording of it, in Los Angeles with the Columbia Symphony (18 hours of recording time). With Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," which is a somber song cycle or symphony for voices (tenor Ernst Hafliger and mezzo Mildred Miller here), it forms the three-LP set, "Bruno Walter's Mahler."

Side four, which follows the symphony, is a rare and interesting recording of a conductor at work. Walter is rehearsing for the recording of the Ninth—which he considered Mahler's most important work. He makes complicated explanations gently and the orchestra plays a difficult section again and again.

Walter was assistant to Mahler—a much respected conductor—for many years.

Mahler made an outline and preliminary sketches for five movements of a 10th Symphony.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
NOV 26 1966

OFF THE RECORD

It's Fun to Try the New, But Standards Still Best

By DURWOOD McALISTER

For anyone reviewing new record releases there is an overwhelming temptation to concentrate on recordings of "new" works, unusual arrangements or "new" performers.

But, however worthy may be the new offerings, the best of any month's releases usually are those of old standards performed by the outstanding artists.

Durwood McAlister

Such is the case with recent symphonic releases, most notable of which is RCA Victor's album of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, performed by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The album (Stereo LSC 7044) does offer something "new" in that this is the first recording of the critical edition, International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. But no gimmick was needed. It is a giant of a symphony and its titanic forces are admirably realized by Leinsdorf. Completing the album is Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria with orchestra, sung here by Phillis Curtin.

WORCESTER TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,129 SUN. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

Records

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are heard in a three-record album of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston (RCA Victor). The set is a veritable treasury of good chamber music with a double bonus. There's a 10-inch record of commentary by Peter Ustinov and a most informative booklet on the music included in the package.

The group is rearranged; from a trio (on the Fine selection) to as many as nine on the Piston divertimento. All of it is easy, intimate listening and it's beautifully recorded in a close-up, cozy stereo sound.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
NOV 6 1966

Sampling Records

Mahler 6th, 7th Symphoines Available in Excellent Stereo

By LOUISE NICHOLAS

WITH NEW recordings of Mahler's 6th and 7th Symphonies, all 10 are now available in stereo performances of excellence, and mostly outstanding brilliance.

Symphony No. 7, with its prevailingly nocturnal air and its directness of melodic inspiration, as well as its wealth of quotation from Mahler's own earlier songs and symphonies, as well as from other sources (including Schumann's "Traumerei"), is the more immediately appealing of the two symphonies. Leonard Bernstein directs the New York Philharmonic in a wondrously controlled, yet marvelously intense performance which keeps these kaleidoscopically changing moods and tempi knit into a compelling whole (Columbia M2S 739, also Mono).

Erich Leinsdorf's performance of Symphony No. 6, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor LSC-7044, also Mono) is similarly impressive, but the work itself is more difficult to grasp, and more diffuse. It requires the largest orchestra of all Mahler's works, except the choral ones. The presentation which gave occasion for this recording was only the third in the United States, both the others having been given by Mitropo with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 and 1955.

The composer himself gave this work the subtitle "Tragic," and the idea of Man marching to his tragic destiny is inexorably pounded out in the first movement. Though the joyful second theme eventually wins out at the close of this movement, there is no such relief in the Finale, with its crushing "Blows-of-fate" pounded out by the special percussive instrument of Mahler's own devising known as the "Hammerschlag." There is a wonderfully idyllic third movement, but this provides only a too short interlude in the general atmosphere of tragedy.

The fourth record side is given over to Alban Berg's concert aria "Der Wein"—a 12-tone setting of free translations by Stefan George of three of the five poems entitled "Wine" in Baudelaire's "Flowers of Evil." Leinsdorf, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who is the vocalist here, have used the original French text. I am not sure this is a gain, for Miss Curtin sings with only a fair French accent, though she must be given credit for impressive command of this very difficult and demanding vocal line.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony — and RCA Victor as well — perform throughout on a very high level.

161
The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012
FEB 5 1967

ERIE DAILY TIMES
ERIE, PA.
D. 55,227
OCT 27 1966

New England Newsclip Agency,
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

New Flood of Fine Mahler Record

By Paul Hume

FOR WEEKS we have been flooded with superb new recordings of the great works of Mahler until now we are at the almost unbelievable point of having truly memorable recordings of nearly every note he wrote.

We are almost as well supplied with the symphonic catalog of Bruckner, lacking only a great account of his Second Symphony. In any such complete documenting of a composer on records, there are bound to be duplications. But with both Mahler and Bruckner, they have not yet reached the point where either the composer or the public seems to suffer from overexposure.

Two new recordings of the Fourth Symphony by Bruckner have come out simultaneously. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony on Victor 2915, putting the symphony on a single disc. Eugen Jochum conducts the music with the Berlin Philharmonic on DGG 39134/35, spreading the symphony over three sides and adding the Bavarian Radio Chorus in five motets on the fourth side.

The sound is excellent in both sets, the Bostonians playing with a brighter texture and more determined drive than the Berliners. In the long run, I prefer the somewhat more spacious pace and mellower tone of the Berlin ensemble, but if you want your Bruckner not quite so enlarged, you will prefer the single Victor disc, with its correspondingly lower cost. The motets, however, are choral beauties and a valuable addition to the literature on records. Do not pass them by without a hearing.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 50,000
APR 8 1967

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,900
DEC 1966

Record Review

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 in A M...
Berg: Le Vin (text by Baudelaire)

Erich Leinsdorf conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano; RCA Victor LSC-7044 (stereo) and LM-7044: two records

The Sixth is the least recorded of Mahler's symphonies; indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that this is the first time it has been recorded well. Mr. Leinsdorf has been at pains to establish the proper text of the work, and he has given it a magnificent and blazing performance. Mahler's Sixth is a strongly percussive work of super-Wagnerian grandeur; it seethes with emotional tension, and is colored by such exotic instruments as cowbells, chimes, tam-tam, and a special kind of semi-musical hammer devised by Mahler himself. Leinsdorf gives the work a driving forcefulness without depriving it of its spacious exaltation. If anything can establish Mahler's Sixth in the repertory, this recording is it.

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts four RCA Victor recording sessions, including Mahler's "Symphony No. 3" with Shirley Verrett, upper left, and the Elliott Carter "Piano Concerto" with soloist Jacob Lateiner. The maestro goes over a point with violinist Itzhak Perlman while pressing Sibelius' "Violin Concerto," and listens to a playback of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tenor Carlo Bergonzi and soprano Leontyne Price. The Verdi work was recorded with the RCA Italiana Orchestra, while Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony was the orchestra in the other sessions.

HORNELL TRIBUNE
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

Researchers Seek 'Definitive' Works by Gustav Mahler

By MARY CAMPBELL
AP Newsfeatures Writer

Gustav Mahler, influenced by Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner, was the last of the great 19th Century Romantics.

Now and for recent years, research is being done to find the "definitive" version of his symphonies by the Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft. (Unlike some composers' works which were "fixed up" by other hands in later editions, making the first edition the most true, Mahler's corrections on his manuscripts are his own improvements—making the latest to be marked the most true to the composer.)

Performance of his symphonies—which are difficult because some are long, use outsize orchestras, voices and unusual instruments—are hailed and so are releases of Mahler recordings.

Here are a few of the more recent ones:

Mahler's Fourth Symphony (written in 1900) is played by the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, on Columbia. Mahler's symphonies reflect pessimism, spiritual conflict, philosophical seeking. They are scaled large—can be bombastic or noble, occasionally sentimental and sometimes use folk tunes.

The Fourth is the most joyful, using sleigh bells and a first movement melody a listener long remembers. In the fourth movement, which is more solemn, soprano Judith Raskin sings.

Mahler's Sixth Symphony was performed in the Unted States by Dimitri Mitropoulous in 1947 and 1955. Its third performance was by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. This symphony has recorded it (a first in America) for RCA. (two LPs).

The Sixth is said to express the idea of ultimate tragic destiny—with a four-note fate motif placed in march time, to depict man marching to his destiny. But the first movement is far from gloomy; it ends joyfully and contains a beautiful lyric theme.

Mahler's Symphony No. 7 is called "Song of the Night" (not by the composer) because listeners have pictured its opening chords spreading a curtain of dark and its five movements each depicting an aspect of night, from the mysterious, sensuous first movement to fear of gobbins of the third and dawn breaking of the fifth.

Two recordings, both two LP sets, of the Seventh Symphony are out, both using the Gesellschaft's "critical edition."

One is by Maurice Abravanel and the Utah Symphony on Vanguard. This group's recording of the Eighth Symphony last year was widely hailed. The Eighth contains an enormous orchestra, two mixed choruses, boys chorus and eight soloists.

The New York Philharmonic's performance, under Leonard Bernstein, of the Eighth last season also was considered an "event" in the music world.

The Philharmonic has made an inspired recording of the Seventh, for Columbia.

Two versions of the Ninth are out also—both magnificent.

Sir John Barbirolli and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra recorded Mahler's Ninth for Angel in a church outside Berlin, (two LPs). They used 17 hours of recording time.

The late Bruno Walter gave the Ninth its premiere in 1912—more than a year after Mahler died. Columbia has issued his 1961 recording of it, in Los Angeles with the Columbia Symphony (18 hours of recording time). With Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," which is a somber song cycle or symphony for voices (tenor Ernst Hafliger and mezzo Mildred Miller here), it forms the three-LP set, "Bruno Walter's Mahler."

Side four, which follows the symphony, is a rare and interesting recording of a conductor at work. Walter is rehearsing for the recording of the Ninth—which he considered Mahler's most important work. He makes complicated explanations gently and the orchestra plays a difficult section again and again.

Walter was assistant to Mahler—a much respected conductor—for many years.

Mahler made an outline and preliminary sketches for five movements of a 10th Symphony.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
NOV 26 1966

OFF THE RECORD

It's Fun to Try the New, But Standards Still Best

By DURWOOD McALISTER

For anyone reviewing new record releases there is an overwhelming temptation to concentrate on recordings of "new" works, unusual arrangements or "new" performers.

But, however worthy may be the new offerings, the best of any month's releases usually are those of old standards performed by the outstanding artists.

Durwood McAlister

Such is the case with recent symphonic releases, most notable of which is RCA Victor's album of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, performed by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The album (Stereo LSC 7044) does offer something "new" in that this is the first recording of the critical edition, International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. But no gimmick was needed. It is a giant of a symphony and its titanic forces are admirably realized by Leinsdorf. Completing the album is Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria with orchestra, sung here by Phillis Curtin.

WORCESTER TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,129 SUN. 104,910
NOV 13 1966

Records

THE BOSTON Symphony Chamber Players are heard in a three-record album of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston (RCA Victor). The set is a veritable treasury of good chamber music with a double bonus. There's a 10-inch record of commentary by Peter Ustinov and a most informative booklet on the music included in the package.

The group is rearranged; from a trio (on the Fine selection) to as many as nine on the Piston divertimento. All of it is easy, intimate listening and it's beautifully recorded in a close-up, cozy stereo sound.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
NOV 6 1966

Sampling Records

Mahler 6th, 7th Symphoines Available in Excellent Stereo

By LOUISE NICHOLAS

WITH NEW recordings of Mahler's 6th and 7th Symphonies, all 10 are now available in stereo performances of excellence, and mostly outstanding brilliance.

Symphony No. 7, with its prevailingly nocturnal air and its directness of melodic inspiration, as well as its wealth of quotation from Mahler's own earlier songs and symphonies, as well as from other sources (including Schumann's "Traumerei"), is the more immediately appealing of the two symphonies. Leonard Bernstein directs the New York Philharmonic in a wondrously controlled, yet marvelously intense performance which keeps these kaleidoscopically changing moods and tempi knit into a compelling whole (Columbia M2S 739, also Mono).

Erich Leinsdorf's performance of Symphony No. 6, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor LSC-7044, also Mono) is similarly impressive, but the work itself is more difficult to grasp, and more diffuse. It requires the largest orchestra of all Mahler's works, except the choral ones. The presentation which gave occasion for this recording was only the third in the United States, both the others having been given by Mitropo with the New York Philharmonic in 1947 and 1955.

The composer himself gave this work the subtitle "Tragic," and the idea of Man marching to his tragic destiny is inexorably pounded out in the first movement. Though the joyful second theme eventually wins out at the close of this movement, there is no such relief in the Finale, with its crushing "Blows-of-fate" pounded out by the special percussive instrument of Mahler's own devising known as the "Hammerschlag." There is a wonderfully idyllic third movement, but this provides only a too short interlude in the general atmosphere of tragedy.

The fourth record side is given over to Alban Berg's concert aria "Der Wein"—a 12-tone setting of free translations by Stefan George of three of the five poems entitled "Wine" in Baudelaire's "Flowers of Evil." Leinsdorf, and Phyllis Curtin, soprano, who is the vocalist here, have used the original French text. I am not sure this is a gain, for Miss Curtin sings with only a fair French accent, though she must be given credit for impressive command of this very difficult and demanding vocal line.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony — and RCA Victor as well — perform throughout on a very high level.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 167,000

JUN 25 1966

men ... Few symphonies, and Mahler shines among them. The Sixth, ranked among his least popular, is also one of the least known. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, who gave us the finest version of the Fifth, now produce the first stereo Sixth, a "Critical Edition" Sixth with the movements in their original order. Unpopular?—I'd pick the Andante of this symphony, if necessary, to enlist Mahler converts. It is unnecessary, as he has become a best-selling hero; one's case rests in the music, where it began. Also in this stunning album: Phyllis Curtin expertly singing Berg's "Le Vin" in Baudelaire's French instead of the Stefan George translation (RCA Victor S-7044, M-same—2-12").

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday, July 31, 1966

MAHLER SIXTH SYMPHONY, played by Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

The Sixth Symphony of Gustav Mahler is one of the less noticed ones of the 10 he completed, possibly because, as its designation "Tragic" suggests, it was written under considerable stress, which is reflected in some heavy instrumentation that is more hysterical than musical. At the same time it has moments of surpassing beauty, and this recording is a very thoughtful one, and likely to please those who think they don't like Mahler.

Oakland Tribune
OAKLAND, CALIF.
D. 209,378 SUN. 232,450

SEP 11 1966

RECORDS

Classical

Mahler: Symphony No. 6; Berg's "Le Vin." Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Victor. Not one of the BSO's strongest technical efforts, but this Sixth is the only recording of the recently published critical edition by the International Mahler Society in Vienna. Soprano Phyllis Curtin sings the Berg 12-tone concert aria beautifully.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515

AUG 7 1966

RECORDS

A Revival of Gustav Mahler: On the Outside, Looking in?

Bruno Walter

ERICH LEINSDORF told a recent Tanglewood visitor that hearing the music of Gustav Mahler today is akin to reading the works of Franz Kafka—"the listener is outside, looking in." We cannot conceive Mahler's inner torment as the proper substance for music nor accept his vocabulary as valid for the contemporary world, but he compels us to listen nonetheless. Anton Bruckner, so often coupled with Mahler in the history books as post-Wagnerian, "was not a modern person at all, rather a childlike figure playing with musical blocks."

Mr. Leinsdorf's remarks on the Mahler-Bruckner revival quite possibly have little to do with the current revival of interest in the music composed by the two men, but they do contribute to understanding the Boston Symphony orchestra's recent recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony [RCA Victor LSC 7044] with Mr. Leinsdorf in charge. This is the turbulent "Hammerschlag," the one with a final tragic march so overpowering in its insistence on doom that Frau Mahler said it sent the composer into sobbing, hand-wringing paroxysms of grief at the dress rehearsal.

• • •

It is also a work of tight musical construction—tighter, perhaps, than any of the other Mahler symphonies. Mr. Leinsdorf uses the 1963 critical edition of the Vienna Mahler Gesellschaft—this is its first recording—which corrects many errors and, in accordance with the composer's presumed wishes, reverses the previous edition's order of the middle movements, putting the Scherzo before the Andante. The result points up thematic relations more sharply and lends more weight to the inexorable dynamism of the Finale.

For those of us with ears inevitably conditioned by Bruno Walter, the Leinsdorf drive and objectivity—reminiscent a little of Toscanini—comes as an astringent surprise on first hearing. The powerful, anti-idiomatic insistence on dry contour reflects few of the "Mahler-esque" sonorities. Repeated hearings increase my respect for what is essentially a modern, external approach asking only for acceptance on musical terms.

• • •

As in his earlier release of the Mahler Fifth, Mr. Leinsdorf supplies Alban Berg music for the final side. This time it is the impressionistic "Le Vin," with Phyllis Curtin as soloist and the original Baudelaire poems in place of Stefan George's German translations used by the composer.

Eugen Jochum is possible the nearest thing to an Anton Bruckner specialist active today, a fact pointed up by two recent releases. The first [Philips PHS-2-991] has the conductor joining his own Councertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam for a rich, sonorous, and affirmative performance of the Fifth symphony, followed by a joyful, urbane reading of Mozart's "Linz" symphony [No. 36] in C major, K. 425[. The coupling is explained by Bruckner's 13 years of service as cathedral organist in the Austrian city where Mozart wrote his symphony nearly a century earlier. The recording is of a live performance in the reverberant Bavarian abbey of Ottobeuren, commemorating its 1200th anniversary.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Foster's Democrat (e)
DOVER, N. H.
Circ. 11,700

JUL 16 1966

Discs That Repeat, Repeat in Your Ear

By JOHN CROSBY
HIGH CLASSICAL

There have been some excellent classical releases lately. "Stravinsky Conducts Pulcinello" (Columbia) is the complete score of his ballet with arias. Ormandy leads the Philadelphia Orchestra in Russian favorites in "March Slav" (Columbia). Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony in Mahler's 6th Symphony and Berg's La Vin with Phyllis Curtin the soloist in the latter work (RCA Victor). "Arthur Rubinstein/Chopin" (RCA Victor) features two old masters combining beautifully. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, who may be the world's best lieder singer, sings Schubert's "The Trout and Other Songs" (Angel).

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

JUN 4 1966

Record Reviews

[redacted] 7046

Boston Symphony conducted by Eric Leinsdorf.

Mahler's Sixth is a difficult symphony to hear. It is in C minor like Beethoven's Fifth and is filled with the strong feelings of man's destiny and unlike Beethoven, Mahler is convinced that all is doomed. This is the music of a confirmed fatalist and it is depressing to hear.

This is the first recording of the Sixth in America and, as far as I know, there have been a mere handful of performances by American orchestras. New York Philharmonic twice played the composition with Metropolos, conducting, Philadelphia and Boston are the only other orchestras to attempt it.

Phyllis Curtin sings the expressive and lovely "LeVin" songs by Berg with brilliance and accuracy. Berg had a preference for the voice with orchestra and his primary efforts are the result of this interest. The recording is a valuable addition to the Berg repertory.

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 234,733 SUN. 532,600

JUL 24 1966

Discology: Mahler

Sixth and Ninth: Failing to Achieve

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mahler's Sixth Symphony is available in a recording by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (R.C.A. Victor LM/LSC 7044, two records). It is a dark and powerful masterpiece, though an uneven one.

The Scherzo, in spite of some wonderful fancies (the F minor section at No. 81 and the shrill B flat fanfare for all the oboes just before the end), seems dry and contrived. Also as I came to know it better, I discovered with regret that the Andante does not wear well, though it, too, has lovely moments (the F flat in the first measure, the passage for descending strings that suggests Schoenberg's "Pelleas," the "misterioso" turn to C major).

The power in the Sixth is in the grim marches of the first and last movements, both, but especially the finale, extraordinary conceptions as rhetoric, as sound (especially the percussion), as form.

To the student of history, the Sixth is of special interest because it is the beginning of the modern Mahler, the one whose work had such impact on Schoenberg and Berg.

The performance is quite good. It is generally good as to tempo and sense of motion, though I question certain details (mm. 251, 280, 348, 374 in the first movement; the relations of speeds at the beginning and end of the finale, and the too abrupt slowing down before the second hammer stroke).

The effectiveness of the performance as a whole is limited by a failure to realize the details of dynamics and accentuation. There is not a real pianissimo throughout (imagine what the beginning of the Andante should be); the scherzo becomes terribly monotonous because of the absence of accents and sforzandi; certain dynamics are unaccountably reduced in scale (the first of many examples being the horn fortissimo at m. 203 in the first movement).

The playing is not the most exact and refined the Boston Symphony can do, and its most destructive moment, just as it was in the 10 concert performances I heard in 1964-65, is the last movement coda for trombones and tuba, which is simply not intelligible.

RCA has done a disappointing job recording the work. Woodwinds tend to be too far in the back, but they leap into sudden disproportionate prominence, for example, at No. 51 in the Andante. Neither the cowbells nor the hammer, both of which were marvellously right in Symphony Hall, make the proper effect on the recording.

The album is filled out with Alban Berg's concert aria, "Der Wein," done here to Baudelaire's original French as "Le Vin." The performance is terrible, mainly because of Phyllis Curtin's yelling (with poor French). It is also hard to make much sense of what is happening in the orchestra either. The (Columbia) is far from first-rate, but the difference is as between night and day just the same.

Columbia has put into one three-record album Bruno Walter's performances of Mahler's Symphony No. 9 and "Das Lied von der Erde" "Lied" was done with the New York Philharmonic which played well for Walter, and the Ninth with a specially assembled Californian orchestra.

The "Lied" soloists are the superb tenor Ernst Haefliger and the mezzo-soprano Mildred Miller who seems not to understand the humors of her first two songs at all, but who is very good in "Der Abshied."

As for Walter's Mahler, though it is always and automatically praised as "definitive," it is not for me. Its alleged historic authenticity is irrelevant in the face of the musical evidence, of the scores, that is, which are full of things that fail to happen in the soft-edged and dynamically false performances which are often poorly paced as well (the ponderous first movement of "Das Lied," the casually rattled through Adagio of the Ninth).

I suspect, too, that in his last years Walter was unable to control a work as hard as the Ninth technically, something that an extra record side devoted to Walter rehearsing tends to document.

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.
STAR
TW. 19,000

JUN 5 1966

Music In The Groove

By PAUL [redacted]

[redacted] great two - disc set by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf which features the first modern recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony in A Minor, surnamed "The Tragic." This masterpiece is the very essence of Mahler, that introspective genius so obsessed by the fear of death and yet indomitably proud and a perfectionist at all costs.

Calling for one of the largest orchestras in the modern repertory, its tonal coloring is breathtaking. Listen especially to the ironic Scherzo and the tremendous finale which epitomizes Mahler's struggle against adversity, ended by the massive "hammerblows of fate."

This is one of the most thrilling experiences in all symphonic music, and the consummate mastery of the Boston Symphony in bringing off this extraordinarily difficult work merits the highest praise.

[redacted]udes Alban Berg [redacted] with Phyllis Curtin, [redacted] soloist. Berg, disciple of Mahler, set three poems from Baudelaire's "Les Fleurs du Mal" in Stefan George's free German - translated texts to fascinatingly complex music. This prepared the way for his final masterpiece, the unfinished opera "Lulu" (only complete recording of which is on Columbia lp.) Miss Curtin, long one of our favorites, is outstanding in this superb recording.

In lighter, highly enjoyable, summery vein, Victor gives us "More Highlights from An Evening at The Pops" (LSC-2882) with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston "Pops" orchestra in the deliciously witty "Matinees Musicales" by Benjamin Britten. The album also includes lush orchestral arrangements of Cole Porter's great hits like "Wunderbar," "Night and Day," and "Love for Sale," and the sparkling Mendelssohn G. Minor Piano Concerto with Susan Starr, an admirably deft and communicative piano soloist. An ideal platter for these sunny days!

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

JUN 25 1966

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

MAHLER: SYMPHONY NO. 6/ BERG: LE VIN

Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf)/Phyllis Curtin. RCA Victor LM 7044 (M); LSC 7044 (S)

The Mahler No. 6 receives a forceful and broad interpretation which makes it a prize. Leinsdorf's tragic concept is prevalent throughuot. "Le Vin" is an expressive piece.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 364,362 SUN. 551,968

JUL 3 1966

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston symphony orchestra in a superb two record Victor album of Mahler's sixth symphony and Alban Berg's concert aria with orchestra, "Le Vin," (LM-7044).

The symphony, which takes three of the four sides, begins and ends in a tragic mood—of fate, not challenged and overcome as in the Beethoven fifth symphony, but felling the hero with death blows. Mahler himself, after the rehearsal for the premiere at Essen in 1906, was so affected by the music that he "walked up and down in the artists' room, sobbing, wringing his hands, unable to control himself," according to his wife.

Perhaps because of its heavy mood, the American premiere of the symphony did not arrive until late 1947, with the New York philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos. The Boston symphony performance on which this album is based was only the third full scale production in this country, in late 1964. It has the breadth and range of orchestral effects for which Mahler was famous, and certainly displays a large array of percussion instruments, including such items as the glockenspiel, xylophone, celesta, snare drums, cowbells, chimes and birch rod.

For all the size of the orchestra and the complicacations of the score, Leinsdorf keeps the music moving and displays his prowess at twining the strands.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin sings the three Baudelaire poems on wine from "Les Fleur du Mal," given orchestral settings by Berg in the late 1920's, as "Le Vin." It is a 12 tone work employing some jazz rhythms (and the saxophone), and the orchestral coloration is evocative, even if the melodies are hardly the sort to set one whistling.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 167,000

JUN 25 1966

... Few men [illegible] great symphonies, and Mahler shines among them. The Sixth, ranked among his least popular, is also one of the least known. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, who gave us the finest version of the Fifth, now produce the first stereo Sixth, a "Critical Edition" Sixth with the movements in their original order. Unpopular?—I'd pick the Andante of this symphony, if necessary, to enlist Mahler converts. It is unnecessary, as he has become a best-selling hero; one's case rests in the music, where it began. Also in this stunning album: Phyllis Curtin expertly singing Berg's "Le Vin" in Baudelaire's French instead of the Stefan George translation (RCA Victor S-7044, M-same—2-12").

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday, July 31, 1966

MAHLER SIXTH SYMPHONY, played by Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf.

The Sixth Symphony of Gustav Mahler is one of the less noticed ones of the 10 he completed, possibly because, as its designation "Tragic" suggests, it was written under considerable stress, which is reflected in some heavy instrumentation that is more hysterical than musical. At the same time it has moments of surpassing beauty, and this recording is a very thoughtful one, and likely to please those who think they don't like Mahler.

Oakland Tribune
OAKLAND, CALIF.
D. 209,378 SUN. 232,450

SEP 11 1966

RECORDS

Classical

Mahler: Symphony No. 6; Berg's "Le Vin." Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Victor. Not one of the BSO's strongest technical efforts, but this Sixth is the only recording of the recently published critical edition by the International Mahler Society in Vienna. Soprano Phyllis Curtin sings the Berg 12-tone concert aria beautifully.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-745 SUN. 1,178,515

AUG 7 1966

RECORDS

A Revival of Gustav Mahler: On the Outside, Looking in?

Bruno Walter

ERICH LEINSDORF told a recent Tanglewood visitor that hearing the music of Gustav Mahler today is akin to reading the works of Franz Kafka—"the listener is outside, looking in." We cannot conceive Mahler's inner torment as the proper substance for music nor accept his vocabulary as valid for the contemporary world, but he compels us to listen nonetheless. Anton Bruckner, so often coupled with Mahler in the history books as post-Wagnerian, "was not a modern person at all, rather a childlike figure playing with musical blocks."

Mr. Leinsdorf's remarks on the Mahler-Bruckner revival quite possibly have little to do with the current revival of interest in the music composed by the two men, but they do contribute to understanding the Boston Symphony orchestra's recent recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony [RCA Victor LSC 7044] with Mr. Leinsdorf in charge. This is the turbulent "Hammerschlag," the one with a final tragic march so overpowering in its insistence on doom that Frau Mahler said it sent the composer into sobbing, hand-wringing paroxysms of grief at the dress rehearsal.

• • •

It is also a work of tight musical construction—tighter, perhaps, than any of the other Mahler symphonies. Mr. Leinsdorf uses the 1963 critical edition of the Vienna Mahler Gesellschaft—this is its first recording—which corrects many errors and, in accordance with the composer's presumed wishes, reverses the previous edition's order of the middle movements, putting the Scherzo before the Andante. The result points up thematic relations more sharply and lends more weight to the inexorable dynamism of the Finale.

For those of us with ears inevitably conditioned by Bruno Walter, the Leinsdorf drive and objectivity—reminiscent a little of Toscanini—comes as an astringent surprise on first hearing. The powerful, anti-idiomatic insistence on dry contour reflects few of the "Mahler-esque" sonorities. Repeated hearings increase my respect for what is essentially a modern, external approach asking only for acceptance on musical terms.

• • •

As in his earlier release of the Mahler Fifth, Mr. Leinsdorf supplies Alban Berg music for the final side. This time it is the impressionistic "Le Vin," with Phyllis Curtin as soloist and the original Baudelaire poems in place of Stefan George's German translations used by the composer.

Eugen Jochum is possible the nearest thing to an Anton Bruckner specialist active today, a fact pointed up by two recent releases. The first [Philips PHS-2-991] has the conductor joining his own Councertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam for a rich, sonorous, and affirmative performance of the Fifth symphony, followed by a joyful, urbane reading of Mozart's "Linz" symphony [No. 36] in C major, K. 425[. The coupling is explained by Bruckner's 13 years of service as cathedral organist in the Austrian city where Mozart wrote his symphony nearly a century earlier. The recording is of a live performance in the reverberant Bavarian abbey of Ottobeuren, commemorating its 1200th anniversary.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Foster's Democrat (e)
DOVER, N. H.
Circ. 11,700

JUL 16 1966

Discs That Repeat, Repeat in Your Ear

By JOHN CROSBY

HIGH CLASSICAL

There have been some excellent classical releases lately. "Stravinsky Conducts Pulcinello" (Columbia) is the complete score of his ballet with arias. Ormandy leads the Philadelphia Orchestra in Russian favorites in "March Slav" (Columbia). Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony in Mahler's 6th Symphony and Berg's La Vin with Phyllis Curtin the soloist in the latter work (RCA Victor). "Arthur Rubinstein/Chopin" (RCA Victor) features two old masters combining beautifully. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, who may be the world's best lieder singer, sings Schubert's "The Trout and Other Songs" (Angel).

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

JUN 4 1966

Record Reviews

BERG Le Vin 7046

Boston Symphony conducted by Eric Leinsdorf.

Mahler's Sixth is a difficult symphony to hear. It is in C minor like Beethoven's Fifth and is filled with the strong feelings of man's destiny and unlike Beethoven, Mahler is convinced that all is doomed. This is the music of a confirmed fatalist and it is depressing to hear.

This is the first recording of the Sixth in America and, as far as I know, there have been a mere handful of performances by American orchestras. New York Philharmonic twice played the composition with Metropolos, conducting, Philadelphia and Boston are the only other orchestras to attempt it.

Phyllis Curtin sings the expressive and lovely "LeVin" songs by Berg with brilliance and accuracy. Berg had a preferance for the voice with orchestra and his primary efforts are the result of this interest. The recording is a valuable addition to the Berg repertory.

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.
STAR
TW. 19,000

JUN 5 1966

Music In The Groove

By PAUL H. LITTLE

From Victor, one of the year's great albums is the two - disc set by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf which features the first modern recording of the Mahler Sixth Symphony in A Minor, surnamed "The Tragic." This masterpiece is the very essence of Mahler, that introspective genius so obsessed by the fear of death and yet indomitably proud and a perfectionist at all costs.

Calling for one of the largest orchestras in the modern repertory, its tonal coloring is breathtaking. Listen especially to the ironic Scherzo and the tremendous finale which epitomizes Mahler's struggle against adversity, ended by the massive "hammerblows of fate."

This is one of the most thrilling experiences in all symphonic music, and the consummate mastery of the Boston Symphony in bringing off this extraordinarily difficult work merits the highest praise.

This album includes Alban Berg's "Le Vin" with Phyllis Curtin, soprano soloist. Berg, disciple of Mahler, set three poems from Baudelaire's "Les Fleurs du Mal" in Stefan George's free German - translated texts to fascinatingly complex music. This prepared the way for his final masterpiece, the unfinished opera "Lulu" (only complete recording of which is on Columbia lp.) Miss Curtin, long one of our favorites, is outstanding in this superb recording.

In lighter, highly enjoyable, summery vein, Victor gives us "More Highlights from An Evening at The Pops" (LSC-2882) with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston "Pops" orchestra in the deliciously witty "Matinees Musicales" by Benjamin Britten. The album also includes lush orchestral arrangements of Cole Porter's great hits like "Wunderbar," "Night and Day," and "Love for Sale," and the sparkling Mendelssohn G. Minor Piano Concerto with Susan Starr, an admirably deft and communicative piano soloist. An ideal platter for these sunny days!

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 234,733 SUN. 532,600

JUL 24 1966

Discology: Mahler

Sixth and Ninth: Failing to Achieve

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mahler's Sixth Symphony is available in a recording by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony (R.C.A. Victor LM/LSC 7044, two records). It is a dark and powerful masterpiece, though an uneven one.

The Scherzo, in spite of some wonderful fancies (the F minor section at No. 81 and the shrill B flat fanfare for all the oboes just before the end), seems dry and contrived. Also as I came to know it better, I discovered with regret that the Andante does not wear well, though it, too, has lovely moments (the F flat in the first measure, the passage for descending strings that suggests Schoenberg's "Pelleas," the "misterioso" turn to C major).

The power in the Sixth is in the grim marches of the first and last movements, both, but especially the finale, extraordinary conceptions as rhetoric, as sound (especially the percussion), as form.

To the student of history, the Sixth is of special interest because it is the beginning of the modern Mahler, the one whose work had such impact on Schoenberg and Berg.

The performance is quite good. It is generally good as to tempo and sense of motion, though I question certain details (mm. 251, 280, 348, 374 in the first movement; the relations of speeds at the beginning and end of the finale, and the too abrupt slowing down before the second hammer stroke).

The effectiveness of the performance as a whole is limited by a failure to realize the details of dynamics and accentuation. There is not a real pianissimo throughout (imagine what the beginning of the Andante should be); the scherzo becomes terribly monotonous because of the absence of accents and sforzandi; certain dynamics are unaccountably reduced in scale (the first of many examples being the horn fortissimo at m. 203 in the first movement).

The playing is not the most exact and refined the Boston Symphony can do, and its most destructive moment, just as it was in the 10 concert performances I heard in 1964-65, is the last movement coda for trombones and tuba, which is simply not intelligible.

RCA has done a disappointing job recording the work. Woodwinds tend to be too far in the back, but they leap into sudden disproportionate prominence, for example, at No. 51 in the Andante. Neither the cowbells nor the hammer, both of which were marvellously right in Symphony Hall, make the proper effect on the recording.

The album is filled out with Alban Berg's concert aria, "Der Wein," done here to Baudelaire's original French as "Le Vin." The performance is terrible, mainly because of Phyllis Curtin's yelling (with poor French). It is also hard to make much sense of what is happening in the orchestra either. The (Columbia) is far from first-rate, but the difference is as between night and day just the same.

Columbia has put into one three-record album Bruno Walter's performances of Mahler's Symphony No. 9 and "Das Lied von der Erde" "Lied" was done with the New York Philharmonic which played well for Walter, and the Ninth with a specially assembled Californian orchestra.

The "Lied" soloists are the superb tenor Ernst Haefliger and the mezzo-soprano Mildred Miller who seems not to understand the humors of her first two songs at all, but who is very good in "Der Abshied."

As for Walter's Mahler, though it is always and automatically praised as "definitive," it is not for me. Its alleged historic authenticity is irrelevant in the face of the musical evidence, of the scores, that is, which are full of things that fail to happen in the soft-edged and dynamically false performances which are often poorly paced as well (the ponderous first movement of "Das Lied," the casually rattled through Adagio of the Ninth).

I suspect, too, that in his last years Walter was unable to control a work as hard as the Ninth technically, something that an extra record side devoted to Walter rehearsing tends to document.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

JUN 25 1966

Mahler: Symphony No. 6

Boston Symphony Orchestra Erich Leinsdorf

Berg: Le Vin
Phyllis Curtin, Soprano

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

MAHLER: SYMPHONY NO. 6/ BERG: LE VIN

Boston Symphony Orch. (Leinsdorf)/Phyllis Curtin. RCA Victor LM 7044 (M); LSC 7044 (S)

The Mahler No. 6 receives a forceful and broad interpretation which makes it a prize. Leinsdorf's tragic concept is prevalent throughout. "Le Vin" is an expressive piece.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 364,7[illegible]

JUL [illegible] 1966

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston symphony orchestra in a superb two record Victor album of Mahler's sixth symphony and Alban Berg's concert aria with orchestra, "Le Vin" (LM-7044).

The symphony, which takes three of the four sides, begins and ends in a tragic mood—of fate, not challenged and overcome as in the Beethoven fifth symphony, but felling the hero with death blows. Mahler himself, after the rehearsal for the premiere at Essen in 1906, was so affected by the music that he "walked up and down in the artists' room, sobbing, wringing his hands, unable to control himself," according to his wife.

Perhaps because of its heavy mood, the American premiere of the symphony did not arrive until late 1947, with the New York philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos. The Boston symphony performance on which this album is based was only the third full scale production in this country, in late 1964. It has the breadth and range of orchestral effects for which Mahler was famous, and certainly displays a large array of percussion instruments, including such items as the glockenspiel, xylophone, celesta, snare drums, cowbells, chimes and birch rod.

For all the size of the orchestra and the complicacations of the score, Leinsdorf keeps the music moving and displays his prowess at twining the strands.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin sings the three Baudelaire poems on wine from "Les Fleur du Mal," given orchestral settings by Berg in the late 1920's, as "Le Vin." It is a 12 tone work employing some jazz rhythms (and the saxophone), and the orchestral coloration is evocative, even if the melodies are hardly the sort to set one whistling.

163

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, June 18, 1966

'Ultimate Destiny' in Music

Mahler's Symphony No. 6

By NELL LAWSON

The first recording of the "Critical Edition" of Mahler's rarely performed Symphony No. 6 in A Minor "concerned with expressing in music the concept of ultimate tragic destiny," comes from RCA Victor in a boxed, two-LP album, performed by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

The Critical Edition score, published in 1963 by C. F. Kahnt, researched by the International Mahler Society in Vienna, had its first American performance in 1964 by Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

It employs a large orchestra and expresses an epic emotional conflict, musically and spiritually, in the grand Shakespearian tragic manner, pre-ordained but with the vitality and will to take up the emotional struggle.

Bruno Walter, friend and colleague of the composer, said of the dissonant and power finale, "The crescendos and climaxes . . . resemble in their grim power the mountainous waves of a sea that will overwhelm and destroy the ship."

The album concludes with Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria for orchestra with soprano Phyllis Curtain in three lyrics from Baudelaires' "Les Fleurs du Mal." LSC-7044, stereo, mono also.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, July 23, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, July 23, 1966

Instrumental Recordings

Symphony Orchestras

By HOWARD HEALY

Mahler's Sixth Symphony has been released in a new album by RCA Victor with Eric Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and following a score with some important textual changes.

The most significant of these changes is that the scherzo movement now follows the andante, which in prior performances had been the other way around.

This symphony, of course, has a great deal of sound effects, too—cowbells and hammer blows, for example—that are tastefully controlled and effectively used in this performance.

There is a martial strain to this symphony, a foreboding pounding beat, and contrasting patches of slow, nostalgic and pastoral passages. It is, then, true Mahler, with many musical strains in it, from classical to modern."

This album, simply entitles Mahler: Symphony No. 6, also has Berg's Le Vin on one side with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 149,039 SUN. 197,387
SEP 4 1966

Music Off Records

MAHLER'S SYMPHONY No. 6 is one of his lesser known works, but unjustly so as the new RCA-Victor two-record LSC-7044 (stereo) demonstrates, especially in the fine-grained and powerful performance of the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. This is a "Fate" or "Tragic" symphony, with less of the folk element than usual in Mahler. But its march-like momentum becomes almost hypnotic, and if there is somewhat more restraint than usual in the sentiment, there is no loss of this great composer's true genius for the symphonic form. It should be heard.

Overside is Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria for soprano and orchestra with Phyllis Curtin bringing out the expressive range of this strange music.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 475,000
AUG 3 0 1966

The World of Music

By Robert Commanday

Each to His Own Music

THE BEGINNING of music criticism comes with a remark that is the easiest one for the listener to make: "I don't like such and such composer" (let's say, Sibelius or Schoenberg). The beginning of wisdom however, comes with the thought that maybe the phrase should be turned around: "Sibelius doesn't like me."

That's much more reasonable. After all, the music is there, finished, but with our fickle tastes and fancies, we listeners just come and go.

I leaped onto this quicksand after listening to a new recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, "Tragic," (Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, RCA Victor, LSC-7044) and wondering how others would react to it.

The Mahler, vividly interpreted by Leinsdorf, inundates the listener with wave upon wave of emotion, culminating finally in a powerful, almost physical impact. It would seem to be too much for anyone with a weak heart. The juxtapositions are compelling; bright scenes or nostalgic moments interrupted by black melancholy; phantoms and specters dance incongruously with jolly burghers; underlying all, Mahler's constant musical motives—the hammer blows of fate and man's march to a tragic destiny.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 66,826 SUN. 200,259
AUG 2 1 1966

'Tragic' Is Recorded By Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

THE complexities of a Mahler score are wonderfully set forth in a performance of his Symphony No. 6, in an interpretation of the most sensitive sort by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The RCA release is 7044 and it is paired with the concert aria with orchestra, "Le Vin," by Alban Berg. The same musicians have Phyllis Curtin, soprano, in the soloists role. These two records are truly enjoyable, with every facet of a musician's power.

The Sixth is called "The Tragic," a subtitle which Mahler himself used. It was Dimitri Mitropoulos who gave the first American performance of this work, at a New York Philharmonic concert in December of 1947. Leinsdorf uses the Critical Edition of the score, published in 1963 by C. F. Kahnt through research made possible by the International Gustav Mahler Society in Vienna. This is the first recording made from that score, just as the Leinsdorf performance in Boston in November 1964, was its first live performance. A main alteration is in the reversal of the order of the Andante and the Scherzo movement. It is a tremendous piece of writing, and the musicians never let us forget the magnitude of the impact it makes.

The Berg songs, settings of three of the five poems by Baudelaire, titled "Le Vin," are from his "Les Fleurs du Mal." Alban Berg set them originally in German, the translation by Stefan George. They are known as "Der Wein." Leinsdorf and Phyllis Curtin use the original French poetic text. The singing is sure and fearless in the difficult Berg idiom. Phyllis Curtin has the feeling for, and the vocal technique to display, this contemporary music.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 2,683,800
SEPT 3 0 1966

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 (Tragic). —Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC7044]. The fantastic awakening interest in Mahler's music in recent years (partly due to this mammoth works never had a chance in pre-LP or pre-hi-fi days) has at last brought good stereo recordings of all his symphonies. This 6th is the last to make the stereo list. But it was worth the wait for as good a performance as Leinsdorf and the Bostonians give it. They are also the first to use the Critical Score recently approved by the International Mahler Society (it reverses the 2nd and 3rd movements in contrast to other editions, among other changes). Leinsdorf wrenches the martial first movements into vividly dramatic life, and infuses the rest of the symphony with an eloquence, grandeur, and passion that have not always been Leinsdorf's trademark. It is, in short, his best recording since the great Prokofieff 6th he did two years ago. (R.H.)

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
AUG 1966

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6, in A minor
†Berg: Der Wein

Phyllis Curtin, soprano (in the Berg); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
● RCA VICTOR LM 7044. Two LP. $9.58.
●● RCA VICTOR LSC 7044. Two SD. $11.58.

Leinsdorf begins with one solid advantage over his two recorded rivals (Adler on SPA and Flipse on Epic): he has been able to use the Critical Edition of the work published in 1963 by the International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. The differences between this and the old editions are far less numerous than in the case of the Seventh Symphony, but they include one that is extremely important—the Scherzo has been restored to its original position before the Andante. According to the editor, Professor Erwin Ratz, Mahler put the Andante before the Scherzo in the second edition as a result of "outside influence" and soon regretted his decision. On purely musical grounds, the Symphony certainly presents a more convincing whole with the Scherzo second.

That, then, is one point in Leinsdorf's favor. One would have expected the quality of reproduction to be another, since both rival recordings are in mono only, and one of them, the Flipse, was made at a live performance. However, the boomy, unreal quality of the bass in the opening measures of the new version turns out to be an accurate foretaste of its over-all effect. The recording certainly has more clarity of detail than its predecessors, but it has no more body or warmth than the Epic and rather less than the SPA.

To some extent, this is probably a reflection on the actual orchestral playing. The Boston Symphony is billed as "The Aristocrat of Orchestras," and its playing here has all the qualities I associate with aristocracy: it is smooth, polished, emotionally null, effete, self-indulgent, and lacking in discipline. Ensemble is never really tight—even a comparatively easy passage like the horn and solo violin duet before figure 24 in the first movement is not perfectly together—and the conductor's grip on his tempos is flabby. The woodwinds play with some spirit, but the string tone is colorless and the brass section feeble throughout. As for the first trumpet, his braying vibrato and frenetic phrasing obtrude themselves time and again on the unwilling ear.

Leinsdorf's pacing of the Symphony is generally brisk, and he skates blithely over the dramatic opening pages of the Finale, where Adler produces an effect of stupendous, elemental conflict. As in the other recordings, the repeat of the first-movement exposition is omitted.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
SEPT 1966

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

© ® MAHLER: Symphony No. 6, in A Minor ("Tragic"). BERG: Concert Aria: Le Vin. Phyllis Curtin (soprano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 7044 two discs $11.58, LM 7044* $9.58.

Performance: Good Mahler
Recording: Impressive
Stereo Quality: First-rate

Composed in 1903-1904, Mahler's Sixth Symphony was not performed in America until 1947, when the late Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted it with the New York Philharmonic. As fate would have it, the Sixth is also the last of the Mahler symphonies to be recorded in stereo.

Like the Fifth and Seventh symphonies (and the first movement of the Eighth), this so-called Tragic Symphony finds Mahler preoccupied in the end movements with the most elaborate polyphonic procedures together with the communication of his musico-dramatic message. As with the Seventh, I find the less complex middle movements the most convincing—a darkly menacing scherzo and an intensely soulful slow movement cut out of the same cloth as the Kindertotenlieder (composed at about the same time). Except for this latter movement, the color strikes me as being predominantly iron-gray, with persistent and brutal rhythmic figures from a veritable army of percussion providing most of the contrast.

This symphony is a formidable chunk of listening, make no mistake about it, and Erich Leinsdorf's reading with the Boston Symphony makes a strong case for the score—if not with quite the hair-raising tension that I heard from Mitropoulos in 1947 and 1955. In accordance with the newly published critical edition by the International Gustav Mahler Society, the Scherzo is placed second rather than third in the order of movements, and the third hammer stroke in the finale is deleted. The recorded sound is altogether splendid in its kinetic force, transparency, and fine detail.

The fourth side of the album, containing a mere twelve minutes of playing time, is devoted to Alban Berg's masterpiece of sensuality and intellect—a setting for soprano and orchestra of three of the five verses of Baudelaire's sinister and poetic sequence Le Vin, composed in 1928-1929. Though sung originally in Stefan George's German translation as Der Wein, the music was published with both German and French texts, and in this second stereo recording Miss Curtin has chosen to use the French, whereas Bethany Beardslee sings the German in the Columbia album directed by Robert Craft (M2S 620, M2L 271). The Curtin-Leinsdorf collaboration is more sensuously atmospheric, though the French enunciation is not always clear. The Beardslee and Craft combination is considerably richer in textural detail, but the singer's voice is decidedly antiseptic by comparison. D. H.

163

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, June 18, 1966

'Ultimate Destiny' in Music

Mahler's Symphony No. 6

By NELL LAWSON

The first recording of the "Critical Edition" of Mahler's rarely performed Symphony No. 6 in A Minor "concerned with expressing in music the concept of ultimate tragic destiny," comes from RCA Victor in a boxed, two-LP album, performed by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

The Critical Edition score, published in 1963 by C. F. Kahnt, researched by the International Mahler Society in Vienna, had its first American performance in 1964 by Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

It employs a large orchestra and expresses an epic emotional conflict, musically and spiritually, in the grand Shakespearian tragic manner, pre-ordained but with the vitality and will to take up the emotional struggle.

Bruno Walter, friend and colleague of the composer, said of the dissonant and power finale, "The crescendos and climaxes . . . resemble in their grim power the mountainous waves of a sea that will overwhelm and destroy the ship."

The album concludes with Alban Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria for orchestra with soprano Phyllis Curtain in three lyrics from Baudelaires' "Les Fleurs du Mal." LSC-7044, stereo, mono also.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, July 23, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, July 23, 1966

Instrumental Recordings

Symphony Orchestras

By HOWARD HEALY

Mahler's Sixth Symphony has been released in a new album by RCA Victor with Eric Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and following a score with some important textual changes.

The most significant of these changes is that the scherzo movement now follows the andante, which in prior performances had been the other way around.

This symphony, of course, has a great deal of sound effects, too—cowbells and hammer blows, for example—that are tastefully controlled and effectively used in this performance.

There is a martial strain to this symphony, a foreboding pounding beat, and contrasting patches of slow, nostalgic and pastoral passages. It is, then, true Mahler, with many musical strains in it, from classical to modern."

This album, simply entitles Mahler: Symphony No. 6, also has Berg's Le Vin on one side with soprano Phyllis Curtin.

Richmond Times-Dispatch
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 149,039 SUN. 197,387
SEP 4 1966

Music Off Records

MAHLER'S SYMPHONY No. 6 is one of his lesser known works, but unjustly so as the new RCA-Victor two-record LSC-7044 (stereo) demonstrates, especially in the fine-grained and powerful performance of the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. This is a "Fate" or "Tragic" symphony, with less of the folk element than usual in Mahler. But its march-like momentum becomes almost hypnotic, and if there is somewhat more restraint than usual in the sentiment, there is no loss of this great composer's true genius for the symphonic form. It should be heard.

Overside is Berg's "Le Vin," a concert aria for soprano and orchestra with Phyllis Curtin bringing out the expressive range of this strange music.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 475,000
AUG 3 0 1966

The World of Music

By Robert Commanday

Each to His Own Music

THE BEGINNING of music criticism comes with a remark that is the easiest one for the listener to make: "I don't like such and such composer" (let's say, Sibelius or Schoenberg). The beginning of wisdom however, comes with the thought that maybe the phrase should be turned around: "Sibelius doesn't like me."

That's much more reasonable. After all, the music is there, finished, but with our fickle tastes and fancies, we listeners just come and go.

I leaped onto this quicksand after listening to a new recording of Mahler's Sixth Symphony, "Tragic," (Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, RCA Victor, LSC-7044) and wondering how others would react to it.

The Mahler, vividly interpreted by Leinsdorf, inundates the listener with wave upon wave of emotion, culminating finally in a powerful, almost physical impact. It would seem to be too much for anyone with a weak heart. The juxtapositions are compelling: bright scenes or nostalgic moments interrupted by black melancholy; phantoms and specters dance incongruously with jolly burghers; underlying all, Mahler's constant musical motives—the hammer blows of fate and man's march to a tragic destiny.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 66,826 SUN. 200,259
AUG 2 1 1966

'Tragic' Is Recorded By Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

THE complexities of a Mahler score are wonderfully set forth in a performance of his Symphony No. 6, in an interpretation of the most sensitive sort by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The RCA release is 7044 and it is paired with the concert aria with orchestra, "Le Vin," by Alban Berg. The same musicians have Phyllis Curtin, soprano, in the soloists role. These two records are truly enjoyable, with every facet of a musician's power.

The Sixth is called "The Tragic," a subtitle which Mahler himself used. It was Dimitri Mitropoulos who gave the first American performance of this work, at a New York Philharmonic concert in December of 1947. Leinsdorf uses the Critical Edition of the score, published in 1963 by C. F. Kahnt through research made possible by the International Gustav Mahler Society in Vienna. This is the first recording made from that score, just as the Leinsdorf performance in Boston in November 1964, was its first live performance. A main alteration is in the reversal of the order of the Andante and the Scherzo movement. It is a tremendous piece of writing, and the musicians never let us forget the magnitude of the impact it makes.

The Berg songs, settings of three of the five poems by Baudelaire, titled "Le Vin," are from his "Les Fleurs du Mal." Alban Berg set them originally in German, the translation by Stefan George. They are known as "Der Wein." Leinsdorf and Phyllis Curtin use the original French poetic text. The singing is sure and fearless in the difficult Berg idiom. Phyllis Curtin has the feeling for, and the vocal technique to display, this contemporary music.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 2,683,800
SEPT 3 0 1966

Mahler: Symphony No. 6 (Tragic). CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK —Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf [RCA Victor LSC7044]. The fantastic awakening of interest in Mahler's music in recent years (partly because his mammoth works never had a chance in pre-LP or pre-hi-fi days) has at last brought good stereo recordings of all his symphonies. This 6th is the last to make the stereo list. But it was worth the wait for as good a performance as Leinsdorf and the Bostonians give it. They are also the first to use the Critical Score recently approved by the International Mahler Society (it reverses the 2nd and 3rd movements in contrast to other editions, among other changes). Leinsdorf wrenches the martial first movements into vividly dramatic life, and infuses the rest of the symphony with an eloquence, grandeur, and passion that have not always been Leinsdorf's trademark. It is, in short, his best recording since the great Prokofieff 6th he did two years ago. (R.H.)

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
AUG 1966

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6, in A minor
†Berg: Der Wein

Phyllis Curtin, soprano (in the Berg); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond.
● RCA VICTOR LM 7044. Two LP. $9.58.
● ● RCA VICTOR LSC 7044. Two SD. $11.58.

Leinsdorf begins with one solid advantage over his two recorded rivals (Adler on SPA and Flipse on Epic): he has been able to use the Critical Edition of the work published in 1963 by the International Gustav Mahler Society of Vienna. The differences between this and the old editions are far less numerous than in the case of the Seventh Symphony, but they include one that is extremely important—the Scherzo has been restored to its original position before the Andante. According to the editor, Professor Erwin Ratz, Mahler put the Andante before the Scherzo in the second edition as a result of "outside influence" and soon regretted his decision. On purely musical grounds, the Symphony certainly presents a more convincing whole with the Scherzo second.

That, then, is one point in Leinsdorf's favor. One would have expected the quality of reproduction to be another, since both rival recordings are in mono only, and one of them, the Flipse, was made at a live performance. However, the boomy, unreal quality of the bass in the opening measures of the new version turns out to be an accurate foretaste of its over-all effect. The recording certainly has more clarity of detail than its predecessors, but it has no more body or warmth than the Epic and rather less than the SPA.

To some extent, this is probably a reflection on the actual orchestral playing. The Boston Symphony is billed as "The Aristocrat of Orchestras," and its playing here has all the qualities I associate with aristocracy: it is smooth, polished, emotionally null, effete, self-indulgent, and lacking in discipline. Ensemble is never really tight—even a comparatively easy passage like the horn and solo violin duet before figure 24 in the first movement is not perfectly together—and the conductor's grip on his tempos is flabby. The woodwinds play with some spirit, but the string tone is colorless and the brass section feeble throughout. As for the first trumpet, his braying vibrato and frenetic phrasing obtrude themselves time and again on the unwilling ear.

Leinsdorf's pacing of the Symphony is generally brisk, and he skates blithely over the dramatic opening pages of the Finale, where Adler produces an effect of stupendous, elemental conflict. As in the other recordings, the repeat of the first-movement exposition is omitted.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
SEPT 1966

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓒ Ⓜ MAHLER: Symphony No. 6, in A Minor ("Tragic"). BERG: Concert Aria: Le Vin. Phyllis Curtin (soprano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 7044 two discs $11.58, LM 7044* $9.58.

Performance: Good Mahler
Recording: Impressive
Stereo Quality: First-rate

Composed in 1903-1904, Mahler's Sixth Symphony was not performed in America until 1947, when the late Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted it with the New York Philharmonic. As fate would have it, the Sixth is also the last of the Mahler symphonies to be recorded in stereo.

Like the Fifth and Seventh symphonies (and the first movement of the Eighth), this so-called Tragic Symphony finds Mahler preoccupied in the end movements with the most elaborate polyphonic procedures together with the communication of his musico-dramatic message. As with the Seventh, I find the less complex middle movements the most convincing—a darkly menacing scherzo and an intensely soulful slow movement cut out of the same cloth as the Kindertotenlieder (composed at about the same time). Except for this latter movement, the color strikes me as being predominantly iron-gray, with persistent and brutal rhythmic figures from a veritable army of percussion providing most of the contrast.

This symphony is a formidable chunk of listening, make no mistake about it, and Erich Leinsdorf's reading with the Boston Symphony makes a strong case for the score—if not with quite the hair-raising tension that I heard from Mitropoulos in 1947 and 1955. In accordance with the newly published critical edition by the International Gustav Mahler Society, the Scherzo is placed second rather than third in the order of movements, and the third hammer stroke in the finale is deleted. The recorded sound is altogether splendid in its kinetic force, transparency, and fine detail.

The fourth side of the album, containing a mere twelve minutes of playing time, is devoted to Alban Berg's masterpiece of sensuality and intellect—a setting for soprano and orchestra of three of the five verses of Baudelaire's sinister and poetic sequence Le Vin, composed in 1928-1929. Though sung originally in Stefan George's German translation as Der Wein, the music was published with both German and French texts, and in this second stereo recording Miss Curtin has chosen to use the French, whereas Bethany Beardslee sings the German in the Columbia album directed by Robert Craft (M2S 620, M2L 271). The Curtin-Leinsdorf collaboration is more sensuously atmospheric, though the French enunciation is not always clear. The Beardslee and Craft combination is considerably richer in textural detail, but the singer's voice is decidedly antiseptic by comparison. D. H.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAR 1967

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ FINE: Symphony (1962); Serious Song: Lament for String Orchestra; Toccata Concertante. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Irving Fine and Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2829 $5.79, LM 2829 $4.79.

Performance: Generally excellent
Recording: Mostly first-rate
Stereo Quality: Very good

Irving Fine, a distinguished American composer, died in 1962 to the stunned disbelief of his friends and colleagues. He was approaching fifty, but was still fresh-faced, boyish, disarmingly modest and self-doubting. Yet he was serious about his work in a very special way. If career and success—in the Big Time sense—ever more than crossed his mind, he gave small evidence of it.

There was genuine talent and musicality behind Fine's work, and the fact that one was somehow certain of it was in itself rare during a period when the word "talent" itself had been downgraded as a romantic superstition, during an era in which chaff easily passed for wheat.

Quite apart from the pleasures to be derived from the sensitivity and refinement of his music, this admirable new release from Victor says—in just these three works by Irving Fine—what might otherwise be said in a volume about the last thirty years or so of American music. While he was more evidently gifted than many Americans who made more of a splash—composers who rose to positions of great power and prestige—he emerges, as I listen to his work on this recording, as a typical composer of his generation in that he was a composer in search of a Direction, of "meaningful" stylistic identity, and a composer who could never quite accept or settle on what his talent was all about.

That his principal point of stylistic departure was Stravinsky's neoclassicism is evident from Toccata Concertante (1948). The work is extraordinarily skillful and polished for a composer in his early thirties, and while the overlay of Stravinsky's neoclassic tonal vocabulary is unmistakable, something of Fine's own lyricism comes through.

With the advent of the Fifties and the overnight ascendancy of the twelve-tone revival, the concepts on which Fine had predicated his musical development had been sharply and puzzlingly reversed. Since he was a composer, not a quick-change artist, he couldn't make the flying leap onto the bandwagon. But, in his Symphony (1962)—the longest, most complex, "biggest" work on the disc—he was hard at work reconciling his earlier commitment to neoclassicism with a technique that was its apparent opposite. Struggle—control over internally warring impulses—is of itself the subject matter of this symphony, its chief expressive emanation. Fine's natural lyricism and his sensitivity are dimmed by the sharply angled chromatic shapes (some of them serially derived) that form his motivating materials.

Symphony (1962) and Toccata Concertante are separated by Serious Song (1959), "a lament for string orchestra." In this brief, eloquently beautiful piece, everything that Irving Fine's talent was all about is openly sung. The youthful influences are subdued; the lyrical sensitivity is now less sweet than rueful, but its commitment to the composer's muse is unmistakable. The craft is now more than impeccably neoclassical; it is idealistic.

In a touching tribute to his younger colleague printed on the jacket, Aaron Copland suggests that Fine had difficulty assimilating influences, even as he goes on to suggest that the tragedy of the premature termination of his work lies in the fact that we shall never know the outcome of his struggle to reconcile his own sensibilities with a musical system with which he was plainly uncomfortable. Perhaps Copland is right.

Symphony (1962) was taped from a live performance at Tanglewood, but both performance and recorded sound are far better than they have any business being under such conditions. The two shorter works, in which Leinsdorf takes over under carefully supervised engineering techniques, seem to me to be all one could ask in the way of performance, recorded sound, and stereo quality.

W. F.

Recordings by the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
under the direction of
ERICH LEINSDORF:

RCA VICTOR

BARTÓK	Concerto for Orchestra	LM-2643
	Violin Concerto (JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN)	LM-2852
BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica")	LM-2644
	Overture to "Leonore" No. 3	LM-2701
	Piano Concerto No. 4 (ARTUR RUBINSTEIN)	LM-2848
	Piano Concerto No. 5 (ARTUR RUBINSTEIN)	LM-2733
BERG	Excerpts from "Wozzeck" (PHYLLIS CURTIN)	LM-7031
	"Le Vin" (PHYLLIS CURTIN)	LM-7044
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 1	LM-2711
	Piano Concerto No. 1 (VAN CLIBURN)	LM-2724
	Symphony No. 2	LM-2809
RAVEL / DELLO JOIO	Piano Concerto in G / Fantasy and Variations (LORIN HOLLANDER)	LM-2667
FAURÉ	Elegy for Cello and Orchestra (SAMUEL MAYES)	LM-2703
KODÁLY	Suite from "Háry János" / Variations on a Hungarian Folk Song, "The Peacock"	LM-2859
MAHLER	Symphony No. 1	LM-2642
	Symphony No. 5	LM-7031
	Symphony No. 6	LM-7044
MENDELSSOHN	A Midsummer Night's Dream (Incidental music with chorus, soloists and speaker)	LM-2673
MENOTTI	The Death of the Bishop of Brindisi (With chorus and soloists)	LM-2785
MOZART	Symphony No. 41 and Eine kleine Nachtmusik	LM-2694
	Requiem Mass – KENNEDY MEMORIAL SERVICE	LM-7030
PROKOFIEV	Piano Concerto Nos. 1 and 2 (JOHN BROWNING)	LM-2897
	Symphony No. 5	LM-2707
	Symphony No. 6	LM-2834
	Symphony-Concerto (SAMUEL MAYES)	LM-2703
	Violin Concerto No. 1 (ERICK FRIEDMAN)	LM-2732
	Piano Concerto No. 5 (LORIN HOLLANDER)	LM-2732
RIMSKY-KORSAKOV	Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"	LM-2725
SCHOENBERG	"Gurre-Lieder," Excerpts (LILI CHOOKASIAN)	LM-2785
SCHULLER	Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee	LM-2879
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4	LM-2701
STRAUSS	"Ein Heldenleben"	LM-2641
	Excerpts from "Salome"; The Awakening of Helen from "The Egyptian Helen" (LEONTYNE PRICE)	LM-2849
STRAVINSKY	Agon	LM-2879
	Suite from The Firebird	LM-2725
	Violin Concerto (JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN)	LM-2852
TCHAIKOVSKY	Piano Concerto No. 1 (ARTUR RUBINSTEIN)	LM-2681
VERDI	Requiem (BIRGIT NILSSON, LILI CHOOKASIAN, CARLO BERGONZI, EZIO FLAGELLO, CHORUS PRO MUSICA)	LM-7040
WAGNER	Lohengrin (SANDOR KONYA, LUCINE AMARA, RITA GORR, WILLIAM DOOLEY, JEROME HINES, CALVIN MARSH, CHORUS PRO MUSICA) (MONAURAL AND STEREOPHONIC)	LM-6710

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

MAY 1967

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4, in E Flat ("Romantic")

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA VICTOR Ⓓ LM 2915, $4.79; LSC 2915, $5.79.

Sadly, in view of all the labor, expense, and artistry that have gone into making these two releases, it must be said that they have little effect on the current Bruckner Four situation. That situation is in itself a satisfactory one, since the Klemperer performance, on one beautifully recorded Angel disc, leaves little to be desired. Jochum's performance starts as though it were going to be a powerful contender, with lovely solo horn playing, firm dynamic and rhythmic control, and flawless engineering; but as the work proceeds, Jochum yields the palm to Klemperer in many matters of phrasing and balance and in over-all dramatic conception. Moreover, though this is ostensibly (like Klemperer's) a recording of the Original Version, Jochum has had the temerity not only to tamper with the timpani part at various places in the first movement but even to add cymbals to the climax of the slow movement. The five Motets presented on the fourth side are the first examples of Bruckner's smaller choral works to enter the American catalogue; they are quite well performed and recorded, and they are worth having, but they are not exciting enough to warrant a recommendation for the set as a whole.

There is little to take exception to in Leinsdorf's general view of the Symphony. The tempos are sensible, and they are served by playing that is often, and particularly in the slow movement, very beautiful. The opening of the work, however, betrays a certain lack of precision in dynamics, and the big chorale-like climax in the brasses at the peak of this movement is taken so softly as to be totally ineffective. Even if the performance were much better than it is, it would still be vitiated by a disastrous, though quite accountable, weakness in the recording: the trumpets are so backward that it is only if you know their parts or are following the score that you can even dimly hear them—and Bruckner climaxes without trumpet tone sound pretty ridiculous. I say an "accountable" weakness, because it is fairly obvious that the RCA engineers have been leaning over backwards to correct the excessive trumpet domination of the ensemble that has ruined some recent Boston Symphony recordings. Unfortunately, they have fallen flat on their backs; perhaps next time they will find the mean.

B.J.

165

The Hartford Times
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 132,266
NOV 12 1966

This Week's Scene in the Field of Recordings

A New Release from Chicago

"Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra" (RCA Victor VCM-6174; mono only).

This retrospective three-pocket album contains a number of striking examples of the late Koussevitsky's skill in eliciting from his orchestra some remarkable performances of trivial as well as of important music. An expansive, richly-textured performance of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5," an effervescent reading of Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," and a nobly-proportioned recording (except for a rather brisk "andante moderato" of the latter's "Symphony No. 4" are the outstanding parts of this album.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
. . . In Retrospect

Koussevitsky's life - long championing of contemporary American and European music is represented, unfortunately, by the turn-of-the-century American composer Arthur Foote's palely Brahmsian "Suite for Strings" and Dmitri Shostakovich's featherweight "Symphony No. 9," respectively.

His justly - celebrated recording of Roy Harris's "Symphony No. 3" would certainly have been a much more appropriate choice than the Foote, and the entire record side devoted to Shostakovich's symphony (deservedly unperformed nowadays) would better have been occupied by two Koussevitsky 20th century specialties: Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2."

This album also contains, as a bonus, a previously unreleased recording of Howard Hanson's utterly charming "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings," as well as a couple of additional fillers, Rachmaninoff's orchestration of his song "Vocalise" and "The Battle of Kershenetz" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh."

The job of remastering these 78 rpm originals recorded between 1938 and 1947 has, for the most part, been very successfully accomplished. A booklet containing background information on these individual recordings is included in the album.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 279,780 SAT. 292,741
NOV 5 1966

Disc Data

LISTENERS who remember the great Serge Koussevitsky's Boston Symphony broadcasts and his influence on contemporary musicians such as Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss and the Tanglewood music center in the Berkshires will welcome RCA Victor's boxed, three-LP album of performances by the Boston orchestra under the great late Russian.

Buffalo Philharmonic conductor Lukas Foss writes the sensitive and warm-hearted "Koussevitsky Reminiscence," also suggesting that this album promises to stretch the lifetime of some of Koussevitsky's favorite performances."

An interesting span of works includes Brahms Academic Festival Overture Op. 80 and Symphony No. 4 in E. Minor, Op. 98; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E. Minor, Op. 64; Rachmaninoff's Vocalese Op. 34, No. 14; Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Battle of Kershenetz (from the Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh).

Also Howard Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra with Georges Laurent, flute, Bernard Zighera, harp; Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings in E Op. 63, and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (1945. Mono VCM—6174).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 3078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
NOV 6 1966

Discology: Koussevitzky

A Flair for Dramatics

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

From his arrival in Boston in 1924 until his retirement in 1949, Serge Koussevitzky was a force of enormous consequence in American musical life.

Like Stokowski in Philadelphia and very few others, Reiner in Cincinnati being one, he took an interest in what his contemporaries and the younger men were writing.

And since his orchestra was the Boston Symphony, he placed at their disposal not just an orchestra but the weight of prestige that comes with recognition by the Establishment, and that can be an invaluable thing for a young artist.

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation continues through its commissions to do battle on behalf of new music. Tanglewood was the boldest stroke of Koussevitzky's imagination. And again like Stokowski, he built his orchestra into an instrument of unsurpassed virtuosity, an achievement his successor was able to undo in a very few years.

In so far as conducting concerns making an orchestra play beautifully, Koussevitzky was a great conductor. As an interpreter of music, he was often uncultivated and wilful, as much of an autocrat in music as in life, and as apt to be wrong-headed about brand-new "Appalachian Spring" as about a two-centuries old Bach concerto.

Unlike Stokowski, Koussevitzky was no sensationalist. He loved music passionately, and on the evidence of what he said and did and of what those who knew him report, he was a totally sincere musician. In his desire to share his excitement, he was led again and again into grotesquely vehement overstatement to which a frequent and equally unfortunate alternative was a glib uninflected rattling off of notes.

His sense of pace was unreliable. I began to listen to the Boston Symphony broadcasts in 1943, and I remember being shocked and amused at his unbelievably slow "Star-Spangled Banner" week after week.

Gradually I perceived that the same inability to find a tempo, coupled in larger works with a tendency toward violent jumps at every opportunity, disfigured his Beethoven, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky as much as they did the National Anthem.

RCA Victor has now issued a three-record album of Koussevitzky performances (VCM-6174, mono only), all with the Boston Symphony, and including Brahm's "Academic Festival" Overture (1947) and Fourth Symphony (1938-9), Tchaikovsky's Fifth (1944), the Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" (1945), "The Battle of Kershenetz" by Rimsky-Korsakoff (1939), Hanson's Serenade for flute, harp, and strings, with Georges Laurent and Bernard Zighera (1947, not previously issued), the Foote Suite for Strings (1940), and the Shostakovich Ninth (1946).

The Brahms Overture has surprisingly undistinguished playing of a jolty interpretation. In the Symphony, however, the playing is marvellous, though even then there was a tendency toward nasal blaring from the trumpets. The first two movements go well enough, a little hastily, but with slowing down at mm.95 and 339 in the first movement that are clumsy. The Scherzo is heavy and undistinguished. The Finale is absurd. The punctuation is so haphazard that it is all one can do to make out that a set of variations is being played. Though Brahms asks for a steady, unifying pace, the tempi vary wildly and so irrationally that any relation between the series of variations beginning with XVII and the beginning of the movement is blotted out.

In the Tchaikovsky, Koussevitzky simply makes his own piece. The new piece is often expressive and exciting, but it seems not to have struck Koussevitzky that it would have been worth seeing how the work could have been made expressive and exciting as written. It is a facile evasion of the problem of interpretation, and incredibly simple - minded. Again, the playing is beautiful, and Gillet's oboe solos are a special joy, here and elsewhere. The ability to play quietly, yet with great intensity, as the cellos do in the Adante, is a mark of high instrumental culture.

For the rest, the Rachmaninoff is gorgeous; the Hanson shows the remarkable Laurent a bit past his very best years; the Foote is violently overstated; the obnoxious little Shostakovich is trimly done.

There are better Koussevitzky recordings than these, interpretations in which his flair for drama required no anxious and vehement underlining or ones where the elegance he could command was not watered down into gabble.

I hope, therefore, that Victor will return to the catalogue such beautiful things as the Koussevitzky recordings of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite and "Mother Goose," the Musorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

COURIER-POST
CAMDEN, N. J.
D. 99,700 SUN. 99,295
NOV 12 1966

* * *

THE LATE Serge Koussevitzky, in a new musical anthology from RCA-Victor, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in selections ranging from Brahms to Shostakovich.

The three-record set, "TREASURY OF IMMORTAL PERFORMANCES," — (VCM-6174), includes pieces recorded between 1938 and 1947.

Although each work is a delight individually, the package (if listened to as a whole) is somewhat difficult to appreciate. This is due, for example, to the juxtaposition of the lyric beauty of Brahms with the almost harsh, modernistic ramblings of Shostakovich; or the classical vigor of Tchaikovsky with the haunting, almost metaphysical melodies of Foote.

* * *

INCLUDED in the album are Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" and "Symphony No. 4"; Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5"; "The Battle of Kershenetz"; Howard Hanson's "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra," and Arthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E" and "Symphony No. 9."

Koussevitsky, who numbered among his [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949. Despite its defects, this set is a fitting memorial.

Along with Lukas Foss' reminiscences of Serge Koussevitsky, the program booklet included with the album contains program notes on the music by Martin Bookspan, annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1924 to 1949. Despite its defects, this set is a fitting memorial.

Along with Lukas Foss' reminiscences of Serge Koussevitsky, the program booklet included with the album contains program notes on the music by Martin Bookspan, annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and recording data oneach selection.

The complete three-record Koussevitzky "Treasury" album is priced at two-thirds the regular price of the three Red Seal mono records—i.e., "three for the price of two."

SW

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
D. 57,500 S. 96,000
NOV 5 1966

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
D. 47,000
NOV 5 1966

Sights and Sounds

Recordings

RCA-Victor has issued a memorial album of performances by the Boston Symphony under its brilliant conductor of the 'thirties and 'forties, Serge Koussevitzky. Included in the three-disc set are fiery accounts of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Foote's seldom-heard Suite for Strings, and Shostakovich's humorous (and uncharacteristically brief) Ninth Symphony.

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, OHIO
D. 170,576 SUN. 193,287
NOV 6 1966

Serge Koussevitzky, who built the Boston Symphony to a position of world renown, is memorialized in a Treasury of Immortal Performances album. The sound lacks the sheen of more recent recordings, but the performances of several standard orchestral works amply demonstrate the genius of the conductor.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
NOV 12 1966

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

BRAHMS/TCHAIKOVSKY/SHOSTAKOVICH (3 LP's)

Boston Symphony (Koussevitzky)

Here are shining examples of the magnificence of style and sensitive conducting by the brillian Koussevitsky. Four of the works are available for the first time on LP's; one has never been published before. Reproduction qualities are excellent for the most part. The three-record set is a real treasure. Booklet is enclosed.

165

The Hartford Times
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 132,266
NOV 12 1966

This Week's Scene in the Field of Recordings

A New Release from Chicago

"Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra" (RCA Victor VCM-6174; mono only).

This retrospective three-pocket album contains a number of striking examples of the late Koussevitsky's skill in eliciting from his orchestra some remarkable performances of trivial as well as of important music. An expansive, richly-textured performance of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5," an effervescent reading of Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," and a nobly-proportioned recording (except for a rather brisk "andante moderato" of the latter's "Symphony No. 4" are the outstanding parts of this album.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
. . . In Retrospect

Koussevitsky's life - long championing of contemporary American and European music is represented, unfortunately, by the turn-of - the - century American composer Arthur Foote's palely Brahmsian "Suite for Strings" and Dmitri Shostakovich's featherweight "Symphony No. 9," respectively.

His justly - celebrated recording of Roy Harris's "Symphony No. 3" would certainly have been a much more appropriate choice than the Foote, and the entire record side devoted to Shostakovich's symphony (deservedly unperformed nowadays) would better have been occupied by two Koussevitsky 20th century specialties: Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2."

This album also contains, as a bonus, a previously unreleased recording of Howard Hanson's utterly charming "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings," as well as a couple of additional fillers, Rachmaninoff's orchestration of his song "Vocalise" and "The Battle of Kershenetz" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh."

The job of remastering these 78 rpm originals recorded between 1938 and 1947 has, for the most part, been very successfully accomplished. A booklet containing background information on these individual recordings is included in the album.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 279,780 SAT. 292,741
NOV 5 1966

Disc Data

LISTENERS who remember the great Serge Koussevitsky's Boston Symphony broadcasts and his influence on contemporary musicians such as Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss and the Tanglewood music center in the Berkshires will welcome RCA Victor's boxed, three-LP album of performances by the Boston orchestra under the great, late Russian.

Buffalo Philharmonic conductor Lukas Foss writes the sensitive and warm-hearted "Koussevitsky Reminiscence," also suggesting that this album promises to stretch the lifetime of some of Koussevitsky's favorite performances."

An interesting span of works includes Brahms Academic Festival Overture Op. 80 and Symphony No. 4 in E. Minor, Op. 98; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E. Minor, Op. 64; Rachmaninoff's Vocalese Op. 34, No. 14; Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Battle of Kershenetz (from the Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh).

Also Howard Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra with Georges Laurent, flute, Bernard Zighera, harp; Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings in E Op. 63, and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (1945. Mono VCM—6174).

* * *

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
D. 57,500 S. 96,000
NOV 5 1966

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
D. 47,000
NOV 5 1966

Sights and Sounds

Recordings

RCA-Victor has issued a memorial album of performances by the Boston Symphony under its brilliant conductor of the 'thirties and 'forties, Serge Koussevitzky. Included in the three-disc set are fiery accounts of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, Foote's seldom-heard Suite for Strings, and Shostakovitch's humorous (and uncharacteristically brief) Ninth Symphony.

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, OHIO
D. 170,576 SUN. 193,287
NOV 6 1966

Serge Koussevitzky, who built the Boston Symphony to a position of world renown, is memorialized in a Treasury of Immortal Performances album. The sound lacks the sheen of more recent recordings, but the performances of several standard orchestral works amply demonstrate the genius of the conductor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
NOV 6 1966

Discology: Koussevitzky

A Flair for Dramatics

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

From his arrival in Boston in 1924 until his retirement in 1949, Serge Koussevitzky was a force of enormous consequence in American musical life.

Like Stokowski in Philadelphia and very few others, Reiner in Cincinnati being one, he took an interest in what his contemporaries and the younger men were writing.

And since his orchestra was the Boston Symphony, he placed at their disposal not just an orchestra but the weight of prestige that comes with recognition by the Establishment, and that can be an invaluable thing for a young artist.

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation continues through its commissions to do battle on behalf of new music. Tanglewood was the boldest stroke of Koussevitzky's imagination. And again like Stokowski, he built his orchestra into an instrument of unsurpassed virtuosity, an achievement his successor was able to undo in a very few years.

In so far as conducting concerns making an orchestra play beautifully, Koussevitzky was a great conductor. As an interpreter of music, he was often uncultivated and wilful, as much of an autocrat in music as in life, and as apt to be wrong-headed about brand-new "Appalachian Spring" as about a two-centuries old Bach concerto.

Unlike Stokowski, Koussevitzky was no sensationalist. He loved music passionately, and on the evidence of what he said and did and of what those who knew him report, he was a totally sincere musician. In his desire to share his excitement, he was led again and again into grotesquely vehement overstatement to which a frequent and equally unfortunate alternative was a glib uninflected rattling off of notes.

His sense of pace was unreliable. I began to listen to the Boston Symphony broadcasts in 1943, and I remember being shocked and amused at his unbelievably slow "Star-Spangled Banner" week after week.

Gradually I perceived that the same inability to find a tempo, coupled in larger works with a tendency toward violent jumps at every opportunity, disfigured his Beethoven, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky as much as they did the National Anthem.

RCA Victor has now issued a three-record album of Koussevitzky performances (VCM-6174, mono only), all with the Boston Symphony, and including Brahm's "Academic Festival" Overture (1947) and Fourth Symphony (1938-9), Tchaikovsky's Fifth (1944), the Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" (1945), "The Battle of Kershenetz" by Rimsky-Korsakoff (1939), Hanson's Serenade for flute, harp, and strings, with Georges Laurent and Bernard Zighera (1947, not previously issued), the Foote Suite for Strings (1940), and the Shostakovich Ninth (1946).

The Brahms Overture has surprisingly undistinguished playing of a jolty interpretation. In the Symphony, however, the playing is marvellous, though even then there was a tendency toward nasal blaring from the trumpets. The first two movements go well enough, a little hastily, but with slowing down at mm.95 and 339 in the first movement that are clumsy. The Scherzo is heavy and undistinguished. The Finale is absurd. The punctuation is so haphazard that it is all one can do to make out that a set of variations is being played. Though Brahms asks for a steady, unifying pace, the tempi vary wildly and so irrationally that any relation between the series of variations beginning with XVII and the beginning of the movement is blotted out.

In the Tchaikovsky, Koussevitzky simply makes his own piece. The new piece is often expressive and exciting, but it seems not to have struck Koussevitzky that it would have been worth seeing how the work could have been made expressive and exciting as written. It is a facile evasion of the problem of interpretation, and incredibly simple - minded. Again, the playing is beautiful, and Gillet's oboe solos are a special joy, here and elsewhere. The ability to play quietly, yet with great intensity, as the cellos do in the Adante, is a mark of high instrumental culture.

For the rest, the Rachmaninoff is gorgeous; the Hanson shows the remarkable Laurent a bit past his very best years; the Foote is violently overstated; the obnoxious little Shostakovich is trimly done.

There are better Koussevitzky recordings than these, interpretations in which his flair for drama required no anxious and vehement underlining or ones where the elegance he could command was not watered down into gabble.

I hope, therefore, that Victor will return to the catalogue such beautiful things as the Koussevitzky recordings of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite and "Mother Goose," the Musorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
NOV 12 1966

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

BRAHMS/TCHAIKOVSKY/SHOSTAKOVICH (3 LP's)

Boston Symphony (Koussevitzky)

Here are shining examples of the magnificence of style and sensitive conducting by the brillian Koussevitsky. Four of the works are available for the first time on LP's; one has never been published before. Reproduction qualities are excellent for the most part. The three-record set is a real treasure. Booklet is enclosed.

COURIER-POST
CAMDEN, N. J.
D. 99,700 SUN. 99,295
NOV 12 1966

* * *

THE LATE Serge Koussevitzky, in a new musical anthology from RCA-Victor, leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in selections ranging from Brahms to Shostakovich.

The three-record set, "TREASURY OF IMMORTAL PERFORMANCES," — (VCM-6174), includes pieces recorded between 1938 and 1947.

Although each work is a delight individually, the package (if listened to as a whole) is somewhat difficult to appreciate. This is due, for example, to the juxtaposition of the lyric beauty of Brahms with the almost harsh, modernistic ramblings of Shostakovich; or the classical vigor of Tchaikovsky with the haunting, almost metaphysical melodies of Foote.

* * *

INCLUDED in the album are Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" and "Symphony No. 4"; Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5"; "The Battle of Kershenetz"; Howard Hanson's "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra," and Arthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E" and "Symphony No. 9."

Koussevitsky, who numbered among his students Leonard Bernstein, was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949. Despite its defects, this set is a fitting memorial.

Along with Lukas Foss' reminiscences of Serge Koussevitsky, the program booklet included wtih the album contains program notes on the music by Martin Bookspan, annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1924 to 1949. Despite its defects, this set is a fitting memorial.

Along with Lukas Foss' reminiscences of Serge Koussevitsky, the program booklet included with the album contains program notes on the music by Martin Bookspan, annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and recording data oneach selection.

The complete three-record Koussevitzky "Treasury" album is priced at two-thirds the regular price of the three Red Seal mono records—i.e., "three for the price of two."

SW

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

NOV 6 1966

Prize Winner

Rudolf Buchbinder, Austrian pianist, will play on Henri Temianka's "Let's Talk Music" tonight at Royce Hall.

Classical Records: Koussevitzky

BY WALTER ARLEN

Since its founding in 1881, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed several golden eras. The longest came during the tenure of Serge Koussevitzky, for 25 years its music director and conductor. When he retired in 1949, the ensemble had been copiously recorded on 78s. The LP process was not then perfected.

A few of the more memorable, technically superior, discs reissued since Koussevitzky's death in 1951 have not been available for some time. RCA Victor now fills the gap with a "Treasury of Immortal Performances" album of three records (VCM-6174) containing long-playing monaural reprints of the "Academic Festival" Overture and the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9, and Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise," Rimski-Korsakoff's "Battle of Kershnetz," Hanson's Serenade for flute, harp, strings, and the Suite for strings by Foote.

Dates of the recordings range from 1938 to 1947, but the quality seems uniform.

Superb Sound

Very notable is the quality of the orchestra. Whoever has forgotten, or never knew, what the Boston Symphony was in its "Russian period" under Koussevitzky, will be surprised by the superb sound: the unsurpassed richness of the strings, the magnificent glow of the brasses, the incisiveness of the woodwinds, the rich, ripe—but never cloying, never flashy — texture in the tutti.

Koussevitzky's way with some scores may seem a bit dated. We have become unused to so much rubato in Tchaikovsky, so much majestic liberty in Brahms, so much "schmaltz" in Rachmaninoff. Equally rare today is the vision, the conception, the big line the conductor conveys, the perfection for which he searched.

Monteux Recording

A bonus in the handsome album is an illustrated booklet with a lively homage by Lukas Foss, who was the Boston Symphony's pianist during Koussevitzky's last years at the orchestra's helm; and a historically interesting discussion by Martin Bookspan of Koussevitzky's relation to the music in the album (he presented the American premiere of Shostakovich's Ninth, for example. A survey of American compositions commissioned by Koussevitzky would make another important documentary recording).

One of the booklet's photographs shows Koussevitzky with his successor, Charles Munch, and his predecessor, the late Pierre Monteux. This brings us to RCA's previous unreleased Victrola recording of Monteux conducting the London Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, and "Fidelio" and "King Stephan" Overtures (VIC-1170; stereo VICS-1170). The London Symphony is not the Boston (which Monteux headed 1918-1924), but the grand old Monteux's Beethoven is special in any case. Few conductors have endowed him with so much warmth and appeal.

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 237,192 SUN. 262,441

NOV 13 1966

Records in Review

By JOHN ARDOIN, Music Editor of The News

Boston Then and Now

From RCA Victor come two new albums of three LPs each devoted to the Boston Symphony. The first, in the company's "Treasury of Immortal Performances" series, deals with the memorable years of the orchestra under conductor Serge Koussevitzky, and it fills a long void in the catalogue and in the recorded history of music in America. (VCM-6174).

Koussevitzky followed Monteux and preceded Charles Munch as master of the BSO. He held the post for 25 years (1924-1949) and died in 1951 at the age of 77. He arrived at the helm of the orchestra during a period of struggle by the American composer for recognition.

Serge Koussevitsky . . . "Immortal" is the term for album of his music.

BEHIND KOUSSEVITZKY, during his years as a conductor in Europe, was a reputation for championing what was new (he had even founded a publishing company to make his native Russian music known). For three decades, he was a rallying point for the American composer and encouraged and performed works of such men as Copland, Harris, Hanson, Piston, Barber and Schuman when in their 20's and just beginning.

Composers of other nations also received his help, and Koussevitzky commissions produced Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, Ravel's G Major Piano Concertos and scores by Roussel, Prokofiev, Hindemith and Honegger. He established the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., and among his pupils there in conducting were Leonard Bernstein, Thor Johnson and Eleazar de Carvalho.

THIS VICTOR set (which contains a generous slice of Koussevitzky's recording years including one performance never issued and five never on LP) represents the conductor's interest in American music with Hanson's Serenade and Foote's Suite for Strings, plus his celebrated performances of Russian music (his finest Shostakovich Ninth Symphony yet made, a stunning Tchaikovsky Fifth and small works of Rimsky and Rachmaninov) and German music (Brahms' Fourth Symphony and "Academic Festival Overture").

The sound is amazing considering that the masters were made between 1938 and 1947 and the performances are pure gold. There is a grandeur and sweep in the big pieces that is almost a lost commodity these days except when Leopold Stokowski is on the podium. His Brahms is untraditional in some of its liberties, but unbeatable in its breadth and vivacity. The Shostakovich abounds in wit, and the lyrical Hanson is admirably set forth.

Victor has done a great service in making these performances available, a service in keeping with the import of the material it owns. Perhaps the reception of the set will be such that Victor will also revive some of the magical Koussevitzky performances of Debussy and Beethoven for which he was so renowned.

WITH THE encouragement of present BSO conductor Erich Leinsdorf, major members of the Boston have founded an auxiliary group, The Boston Symphony Chamber Players. They make their recorded debut on a new Victor set (LM 6167) in a program of works ranging from Mozart to Elliott Carter.

The ensemble is composed of Joseph Silverstein (the orchestra's concertmaster) and Alfred Krips, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; and Claude Frank, piano.

The album is a brilliant achievement and offers chamber music playing of the highest order. The standouts are the playing by Miss Dwyer in the Mozart Flute Quartet, the Beethoven String Serenade in D and an exotic early Trio by Copland for Piano, Violin and Cello entitled "Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme."

Of interest will also be Irving Fine's String Trio (1957), Carter's 1948 Woodwind Quintet and the Piston Divertimento for Nine Instruments. The notes are by actor-amateur musician Peter Ustinov, and a special 10-inch LP is enclosed in which Ustinov discusses the music recorded with Silverstein and Leinsdorf. It is an album that all who value chamber music will want to own.

Columbus Sunday Dispatch
COLUMBUS, OHIO
SUN. 303,744

NOV 20 1966

HALLOWED MEMORY

Long Look Back At Koussevitsky

By ROBERT MARSH
Chicago Sun-Times Special

Serge Koussevitzky became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the autumn of 1924 and remained the musical czar of the Black Bay for a full quarter century.

Virgil Thomson feels that he was primarily responsible for bringing Koussevitzky's name before the Boston trustees, who were searching for a successor to Pierre Monteux.

Monteux apparently was not the glamor boy Boston required to sell tickets, and when Thomson reported that such an exotic creature was to be found directing a series of conversation-piece concerts at the Paris Opera, the trustees reacted.

KOUSSEVITZKY the conductor was still a relatively unknown figure, but the Koussevitzky career was a well-established one that had begun with years of tours as the world's greatest virtuoso on that most unlikely of instruments, the double bass.

Once rooted in Boston, Koussevitzky stayed there until the spring of 1949 when, reluctantly, he accepted retirement on the basis of uncertain health. He had wanted to go on, sharing the orchestra with guests, chief of them his prize pupil, Leonard Bernstein, but the trustees feared such an arrangement and a year before had engaged Charles Munch as music director.

Koussevitzky was bitter, and although he returned to the Boston Symphony to record (notably the Sibelius Second Symphony), his time belonged to the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, which he had directed on an enormously successful American tour.

As it turned out, the skepticism of the trustees was justified. Koussevitzky died in June of 1951, at the age of 76.

FOR THOSE of us whose concert experiences go back a couple decades, Koussevitzky will remain one of the great names in the history of orchestral performance. No one did more for the American composer, and at the Berkshire Music Center, which he founded in 1940, he did more for the American conductor than anyone before or since.

Yet Koussevitzky has been strangely neglected in the last decade. His records dropped out of the catalog (and there were lots of them to disappear), and a new generation of listeners grew up to whom he was at best a name in the history books.

RCA-Victor has tried to restore some substance to the Koussevitzky era with a three-record set that reminds us of some of his finest performances. Issued as VCM-6174 in the company Historic Series, it offers three longplay disks for the price of two — which is serving up history at a discount rate.

ANY COLLECTOR with a long memory will know these disks as old, old friends. There is the Brahms Fourth Symphony in the 1938-39 version that literally taught this score to thousands, and the Shostakovich Ninth as recorded in 1946 a few weeks after its American premiere under the Koussevitzky baton.

A 1944 set of the Tchaikovsky Fifth documents a flamboyant romantic performance that spared nothing for effect.

There are shorter works too, American scores by Foote and Hanson, the Brahms "Academic Festival" and lesser things by Rimsky-Korsakov and Rachmaninoff.

WHEN I WALKED out of Orchestra Hall on the evening of Dec. 8, 1944, I felt, after hearing Koussevitzky for the first time, that he had completely changed my standards of orchestral performance, and as I go back to these old records, my imagination supplies some of the indescribable quality of the living sound.

For anyone who can do that, the album is one of the treasures of the season.

It also raises the question of whether any record, especially the mono disks of the medium-fi period, can do justice to a remarkable man. Koussevitzky had his artistic limitations, as these records make clear, but he had an extraordinary ear, and under his direction the Boston Symphony played with a beauty and refinement that defies words.

THESE RECORDS may be only a faint echo, but they are precious for that. The rest is in our hearts.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 2,683,800

NOV 18 1966

DISCUSSIONS A GUIDE TO NEW LP'S

SYMPHONIC MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky & the Boston Symphony Orchestra [RCA Victor VCM6174]. Mark this as the most important release in RCA's "Treasury of Immortal Performances" series since the great Toscanini-Philadelphia Schubert 9th of several seasons ago. Even though Koussevitzky died while (if not even before) most of today's high school generation were infants, his influence has continued on the musical scene through such protégés as Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss. Yet his recordings have been shamefully neglected compared to those of people like Toscanini or Furtwangler. As one of the conductoral giants of the U.S. between 1924 and 1951, Koussevitzky set standards of orchestral execution that still have few equals. In his time he was the master of French and Russian music, and his championing of 20th century composers is a legend. This 3-LP album includes one short work never previously issued (Howard Hanson's Serenade), five never previously available on LP (Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Rimsky-Korsakov's Battle of Kershenetz, Rachmaninoff's Vocalise, Shostakovich's 9th and Brahms' 4th symphonies), and perhaps the most popular and exciting of all Koussevitzky's old recordings: a 1944 Tchaikovsky 5th. Hi-fi buffs will find the sound dated, but anyone interested in meaningful musical experience will find this set a veritable treasury. (RCA is releasing the three LPs individually, at the usual prices; however, all three are also being made available in a boxed set for the price of just two LPs. One only wishes now that RCA could work something out with ABC and the Koussevitzky estate to get permission to release some of Koussevitzky's ABC broadcasts languishing in the vaults—such as the historic 1943 premiere of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra written for Koussevitzky).

167

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS-SUN-SENTINEL
SAT. & SUN. 85,000

DEC 11 1966

Koussevitzky, Boston Group Re-Issued

KOUSSEVITZKY AND THE Boston Symphony Orchestra—Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Hanson, Foote, Shostakovich. RCA Victor. Three discs. Mono only.

The Boston Symphony has long been a member of Victor's orchestral stable, now under Leinsdorf, formerly under Munch, and before that under Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux.

This re-issue on long-play of Koussevitzky's stamp on the "aristocrat of orchestras" is most welcome in the Treasury of Immortal Performance series from Victor. It shows, despite its aging sound (however electronically it has been souped up), that both orchestras and Koussevitzky made glorious music.

* * *

Brahms is represented by the Academic Festival Overture and his Fourth Symphony, sonorous interpretations both. Tchakivosky's melodic Fifth Symphony and Shostakovich's Ninth both receive exciting readings. Especially fine is Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and String orchestra, and Foote's Suite for Strings is a welcome item for collectors.

On the stereo-Dynagroove side, Victor's new releases include a superb Brahams Piano Concerto No. 1 by Arthur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony, and an interesting collaboration on Franck's and Debussy's sonatas by pianist Andre Previn and violinist Erick Friedman.

BOB FREUND.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

NOV 27 1966

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

NOV 26 1966

Recordings in Review

Serge Koussevitzky—"vitality and magnetism."

Boston Yesterdays

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4; "Academic Festival" Overture. TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 5. SHOSTAKOVICH: Symphony No. 9. RIMSKY-KORSAKOV: "Battle of Kershenetz" (Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh). RACHMANINOFF: Vocalise (arranged by the composer). FOOTE: Suite for strings in E. HANSON: Serenade, Op. 35. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (with Georges Laurent, flute, and Bernard Zighera, harp, soloists in the Hanson). RCA Victor VCM 6174, mono only, $9.59 (2 discs).

OF THE Big Three who dominated the American orchestral scene in the Twenties and Thirties (in part, in the Forties), the least current memory is that of Koussevitzky. His activity terminated half a dozen years before Toscanini's (Stokowski, of course, is still very much current), and his recordings have not persisted in anything like such abundant variety.

Had the question come up prior to the appearance of the present release, I would have surmised that the reason for this was the unsatisfactory quality of their sound, vis-à-vis current standards. However, in the light and weight of the quality conveyed in these restorations (only the Hanson was not issued previously) that surmise has no validity at all. Even in the case of the 1939 Brahms, the transfer to LP has been accomplished with such success that a very real sense of the orchestra, the conductor, and the special quality of sound that emerged from their interaction is conveyed.

The reason for this is not wholly mysterious: it was, after all, recorded in Symphony Hall, up to the best technical mark then available. The results (in the case of the Brahms, I find my description twenty-five years ago to have been "one of the triumphant evidences of the miraculous instrument Koussevitzky fashioned in his twenty-five years of work"; and the Tchaikovsky, "full of rich wonderfully matched sounds") have been substantially exceeded by today's best, but it is remarkable how much remains. Together, they should convey, to those who never knew it "live," something of the vitality and magnetism of the Koussevitzky experience.

For those who knew it well, the favorable recollections come back almost instantly; but also, in a curiously strong relief, the offsetting weaknesses. Outstanding among them, one discovers again in the performances of the Brahms and Tchaikovsky symphonies, was the absence of a really strong sense of structure. In his enthusiasm for what he was doing, Koussevitzky had a weakness for lingering on favored melodic passages, or dwelling on one section of a movement, whether it was rationally defensible or not. But there is abundant evidence, too, as to exactly why the great orchestra he evolved, and the uses to which he put it exerted a fascination for so many.

As a protagonist of the unfamiliar as well as the new, Koussevitzky ran a close race for supremacy with his rival, Stokowski, as may be deduced not only from the fine performance of the Shostakovich Ninth, but also of the Rimsky-Korsakov "Battle of Kershenetz." The first of these is as good as any performance since, and the latter is yet to be exceeded. And certainly Hanson should treasure this performance (previously unissued) of his 1945 Serenade in which the singular sound of Georges Laurent's flute—best remembered otherwise from the unforgettable Daphnis et Chloë of Ravel—is perfectly displayed. The Elgarish work of Bostonian Foote was a frequent favorite of Koussevitzky, for reasons which this recording of 1940 makes clear. In it, as well as in the Vocalise, the now bygone sound of the Boston's strings has a resonance and purity rarely heard in orchestral performance today.

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

JAN 1967

Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Brahms, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, etc.)
RCA Victor VCM 6174 (3) mono

About time old "Koussie" was brought back! This man was an immensely important influence on 20th century music, first in Paris (the famed Koussevitsky Concerts), then for more than 25 years with the Boston—and since then posthumously via the Koussevitsky Foundation. His characteristic Russian-French background was very much of its time, and is a thing vanished forever nowadays. He was a specialist, of course, in Romantic music; but in particular he excelled in the Russian sort, from Tchaikowsky and Moussorgsky to Prokofieff and even Shostakovitch. He was marvelous with Ravel, and did many a Ravel premiere. And he promoted all sorts of other important composers via performance, from Ravel to Copland, Prokofieff and on to Lukas Foss and Lennie Bernstein—his protégés.

These noble old RCA Victor 78's, recorded from 1938 through 1947, a good many made right in the middle of WWII, are not exactly models of hi-fi waxing. But for their time they were pretty good and we didn't used to object, as I well remember. What matters is the musical performance—and there we have the cream of Koussevitsky, in Brahms, Tchaikowsky, a symphony of each, plus the Brahms Academic Festival Overture and four or five other 78 one-siders, originally used to fill out odd sides in larger albums.

I played the Brahms Fourth Symphony straight through and it was worth it—such a naturalness and honesty in the playing, out of a time when Brahms wasn't a bit old fashioned! It really sings, and there is a classic economy and restraint about it that may surprise those who think these older conductors always wept in their beer. I well remember, too, the lovely Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote, a Boston composer—very lush and Impressionistic in a forthright Bostonian way. I first got to know it via this 1940 recording. As for the Shostakovitch Ninth (1946), it must have sounded pretty modern back then, but it is as suavely clean here as the rest of these Boston performances. In his rightful bailiwick, Koussevitsky knew what he was doing.

Just as well RCA avoided his Bach, and maybe even his Beethoven. The Bach had a flair to it, but by today's standards it would be monstrously out of style—Bach à la Russe. And the Beethoven was somehow half Moussorgksy, sort of like "Pictures at an Exhibition." Well buried. That is, until we reverse our tastes again. We will. Soonet or later.

E.T.C.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1966

Koussevitzky's Legacy

● The record companies that have given us the many reissues and transfers of 33⅓-rpm and 78-rpm recordings of Furtwängler, Toscanini, Walter, Beecham, and other deceased artists deserve great praise. They have done young music enthusiasts like myself the invaluable service of bringing to them the legendary artist and his interpretations. Yet there has been left untapped one of the greatest sources of valuable reissues: the recordings of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly there would be a good market for these reissues.

CRAIG POTKAY
Philadelphia, Pa.

As Mr. Potkay perhaps knows by now, RCA Victor has just released three discs of performances by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, including such specialties of the conductor as Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. New York fans of Koussevitzky—and Mr. Potkay, too, if he has a good friend with a tape recorder in the New York area—will be interested to learn of Radio Station WRVR-FM's forthcoming series "The Art of Serge Koussevitzky," which will present concerts of the Boston Symphony conducted by Koussevitzky between 1942 and 1948. The series, which begins December 7, will be heard Wednesday evenings from 8:35 to 9:35.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

DEC 25 1966

New Records

Tribute To Conductor

"Serge Koussevitzky, The Boston Symphony Orchestra." A three-record album in tribute to the distinguished Russian-born conductor who for 25 years developed the Boston Symphony Orchestra into one of the world's greatest symphonic organizations. The performances date from 1938 to 1947. Included are Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture" and the Symphony No. 4; Tchaikowsky, Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's "Vocalize" (orchestrated by the composer); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Battle of Kershenetz": Hanson, "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra; and Shostakovich, Symphony No. 9 (1945). (RCA Victor, Treasury of Immortal Performances, VCM 6174).

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 68,000 S. 72,000

NOV 27 1966

* * *

The "Treasury of Immortal Performances" offers a Red Seal special album with three LPs for the price of two in older recordings by the Boston Symphony under the direction of the unforgettable Serge Koussevitzky. Three symphonies are included in this bargain layout—the Brahms fourth, Tchaikovsky fifth, and Shostakovich No. 9. There are also shorter overtures and suites plus one previously unissued item, the Hanson "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings". It's in a nicely boxed package. (RCA-Victor)

Today's edition of that same Boston Symphony, now directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presents the Brahms First Piano Concerto with Artur Rubinstein the soloist. There will be some eyebrow raising with this release inasmuch as the same orchestra and the same label has the same work played by Van Cliburn. Of course, serious piano students will appreciate the difference in interpretation by these wizards of the piano. (RCA-Victor)

* * *

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

NOV 27 1966

New Records

Salute To Koussevitzky

By FLORESTAN CROCHE

PROBABLY no other conductor in this country did more to encourage the development of American music and to stimulate interest in orchestral music in general than Serge Koussevitky. And undeniably no other conductor of first-class stature was more an educator of both orchestra and public.

In salute to Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for more than 25 years, and developed into one of the world's greatest symphonic ensembles, R.C.A. Victor has now issued a remarkable three-record album entitled "Serge Koussevitzky—Boston Symphony Orchestra" in its Treasury of Immortal Performances Series.

The album has been made available in a special "Three for Two" arrangement in which R.C.A. Victor is offering the three records for the usual cost of two; the suggested retail price (lower in discount shops) is, therefore, less than $10.

Compositions included are Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture, Opus 80, and the Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Opus 64; Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise," Opus 34, No. 14, arranged for orchestra by the composer; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Battle of Kershenetz"; Howard Hanson's "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra," Opus 35, with George Laurent, flutist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist; Arthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E," Opus 63; and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (1945) R.C.A. Victor, Treasury of Immortal Performances VCM 6174 (3).

Singular Style

RCA's choice of works to reveal the extraordinary singularity of Koussevitzky's style and the qualities of his orchestra was an excellent one. Among the composers of the Nineteenth Century, Brahms and Tchaikowsky were Koussevitzky's favorites. By heritage he was particularly sympathetic to the music of Russia, from the coloristic orchestral works of Korsakoff to the mysticism of his personal friend Rachmaninoff, and the expansiveness of Shostakovich.

And finally, no conductor provided more encouragement to the American composer of the 1930's and 1940's than Koussevitzky. As Lukas Foss has observed in an article of eulogy included in the excellent booklet of annotated notes accompanying the records, "With him died an entire era of 'Russo-America' Boston, while remaining a city with a great symphony orchestra, ceased from one day to the next to be a mecca for young composers, a center of symphonic premieres that made the nation sit up and take notice."

In the Brahms' works, Koussevitzky's tempi were fast, but always natural of phrase. A great characteristic of his style was that of an almost improvisatory treatment of fluctuation of speed, a tendency to slow up at transitions between themes. This approach, for many musicians in our modern period of "objective interpretation," when the aim, in the words of Ravel, is just "to read the notes" might seem to be old-fashioned.

Yet, in spite of such deviations in tempi, which, admittedly are not in the score, the music flows cohesively and convincingly, and the logic of the structure seems crystal clear.

In the reading of the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky, the orchestra reveals a woodwind section whose sound is rich and voluptuous. All too frequently descriptions of the Boston Symphony, during Koussevitzky's period of tenure (1924-1950) praised the strings; yet as heard on this disc, the orchestra's woodwinds, especially the flutes and clarinets, are of comparable richness and opulence.

The strings, of course, shine forth in unmarred purity. In Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise," they are able to sustain a long and elegant phrase with pulsating and shimmering sound, while in Foote's Brahmisian Suite, they play with power and a sense of expansiveness, their sound reminiscent frequently of the vibrancy of the Vienna Philharmoniker.

167

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS-SUN-SENTINEL
SAT. & SUN. 85,000

DEC 11 1966

Koussevitzky, Boston Group Re-Issued

KOUSSEVITZKY AND THE Boston Symphony Orchestra—Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Hanson, Foote, Shostakovich. RCA Victor. Three discs. Mono only.

The Boston Symphony has long been a member of Victor's orchestral stable, now under Leinsdorf, formerly under Munch, and before that under Serge Koussevitzky and Pierre Monteux.

This re-issue on long-play of Koussevitzky's stamp on the "aristocrat of orchestras" is most welcome in the Treasury of Immortal Performance series from Victor. It shows, despite its aging sound (however electronically it has been souped up), that both orchestras and Koussevitzky made glorious music.

* * *

Brahms is represented by the Academic Festival Overture and his Fourth Symphony, sonorous interpretations both. Tchakivosky's melodic Fifth Symphony and Shostakovich's Ninth both receive exciting readings. Especially fine is Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and String orchestra, and Foote's Suite for Strings is a welcome item for collectors.

On the stereo-Dynagroove side, Victor's new releases include a superb Brahams Piano Concerto No. 1 by Arthur Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony, and an interesting collaboration on Franck's and Debussy's sonatas by pianist Andre Previn and violinist Erick Friedman.

BOB FREUND.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

NOV 27 1966

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

NOV 26 1966

Recordings in Review

Serge Koussevitzky—"vitality and magnetism."

Boston Yesterdays

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4; "Academic Festival" Overture. TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 5. SHOSTAKOVICH: Symphony No. 9. RIMSKY-KORSAKOV: "Battle of Kershenetz" (Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh). RACHMANINOFF: Vocalise (arranged by the composer). FOOTE: Suite for strings in E. HANSON: Serenade, Op. 35. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (with Georges Laurent, flute, and Bernard Zighera, harp, soloists in the Hanson). RCA Victor VCM 6174, mono only, $9.59 (2 discs).

OF THE Big Three who dominated the American orchestral scene in the Twenties and Thirties (in part, in the Forties), the least current memory is that of Koussevitzky. His activity terminated half a dozen years before Toscanini's (Stokowski, of course, is still very much current), and his recordings have not persisted in anything like such abundant variety.

Had the question come up prior to the appearance of the present release, I would have surmised that the reason for this was the unsatisfactory quality of their sound, vis-à-vis current standards. However, in the light and weight of the quality conveyed in these restorations (only the Hanson was not issued previously) that surmise has no validity at all. Even in the case of the 1939 Brahms, the transfer to LP has been accomplished with such success that a very real sense of the orchestra, the conductor, and the special quality of sound that emerged from their interaction is conveyed.

The reason for this is not wholly mysterious: it was, after all, recorded in Symphony Hall, up to the best technical mark then available. The results (in the case of the Brahms, I find my description twenty-five years ago to have been "one of the triumphant evidences of the miraculous instrument Koussevitzky fashioned in his twenty-five years of work"; and the Tchaikovsky, "full of rich wonderfully matched sounds") have been substantially exceeded by today's best, but it is remarkable how much remains. Together they should convey, to those who never knew it "live," something of the vitality and magnetism of the Koussevitzky experience.

For those who knew it well, the favorable recollections come back almost instantly; but also, in a curiously strong relief, the offsetting weaknesses. Outstanding among them, one discovers again in the performances of the Brahms and Tchaikovsky symphonies, was the absence of a really strong sense of structure. In his enthusiasm for what he was doing, Koussevitzky had a weakness for lingering on favored melodic passages, or dwelling on one section of a movement, whether it was rationally defensible or not. But there is abundant evidence, too, as to exactly why the great orchestra he evolved and the uses to which he put it exerted a fascination for so many.

As a protagonist of the unfamiliar as well as the new, Koussevitzky ran a close race for supremacy with his rival, Stokowski, as may be deduced not only from the fine performance of the Shostakovich Ninth, but also of the Rimsky-Korsakov "Battle of Kershenetz." The first of these is as good as any performance since, and the latter is yet to be exceeded. And certainly Hanson should treasure this performance (previously unissued) of his 1945 Serenade in which the singular sound of Georges Laurent's flute—best remembered otherwise from the unforgettable Daphnis et Chloé of Ravel—is perfectly displayed. The Elgarish work of Bostonian Foote was a frequent favorite of Koussevitzky, for reasons which this recording of 1940 makes clear. In it, as well as in the Vocalise, the now bygone sound of the Boston's strings has a resonance and purity rarely heard in orchestral performance today.

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

JAN 1967

Serge Koussevitsky. Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Brahms, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, etc.)
RCA Victor VCM 6174 (3) mono

About time old "Koussie" was brought back! This man was an immensely important influence on 20th century music, first in Paris (the famed Koussevitsky Concerts), then for more than 25 years with the Boston—and since then posthumously via the Koussevitsky Foundation. His characteristic Russian-French background was very much of its time, and is a thing vanished forever nowadays. He was a specialist, of course, in Romantic music; but in particular he excelled in the Russian sort, from Tchaikowsky and Moussorgsky to Prokofieff and even Shostakovitch. He was marvelous with Ravel, and did many a Ravel premiere. And he promoted all sorts of other important composers via performance, from Ravel to Copland, Prokofieff and on to Lukas Foss and Lennie Bernstein—his protégés.

These noble old RCA Victor 78's, recorded from 1938 through 1947, a good many made right in the middle of WWII, are not exactly models of hi-fi waxing. But for their time they were pretty good and we didn't used to object, as I well remember. What matters is the musical performance—and there we have the cream of Koussevitsky, in Brahms, Tchaikowsky, a symphony of each, plus the Brahms Academic Festival Overture and four or five other 78 one-siders, originally used to fill out odd sides in larger albums.

I played the Brahms Fourth Symphony straight through and it was worth it—such a naturalness and honesty in the playing, out of a time when Brahms wasn't a bit old fashioned! It really sings, and there is a classic economy and restraint about it that may surprise those who think these older conductors always wept in their beer. I well remember, too, the lovely Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote, a Boston composer—very lush and Impressionistic in a forthright Bostonian way. I first got to know it via this 1940 recording. As for the Shostakovitch Ninth (1946), it must have sounded pretty modern back then, but it is as suavely clean here as the rest of these Boston performances. In his rightful bailiwick, Koussevitsky knew what he was doing.

Just as well RCA avoided his Bach, and maybe even his Beethoven. The Bach had a flair to it, but by today's standards it would be monstrously out of style—Bach à la Russe. And the Beethoven was somehow half Moussorgksy, sort of like "Pictures at an Exhibition." Well buried. That is, until we reverse our tastes again. We will. Sooner or later.

E.T.C.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

DEC 1966

Koussevitzky's Legacy

● The record companies that have given us the many reissues and transfers of 33⅓-rpm and 78-rpm recordings of Furtwängler, Toscanini, Walter, Beecham, and other deceased artists deserve great praise. They have done young music enthusiasts like myself the invaluable service of bringing to them the legendary artist and his interpretations. Yet there has been left untapped one of the greatest sources of valuable reissues: the recordings of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly there would be a good market for these reissues.

CRAIG POTKAY
Philadelphia, Pa.

As Mr. Potkay perhaps knows by now, RCA Victor has just released three discs of performances by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, including such specialties of the conductor as Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. New York fans of Koussevitzky—and Mr. Potkay, too, if he has a good friend with a tape recorder in the New York area—will be interested to learn of Radio Station WRVR-FM's forthcoming series "The Art of Serge Koussevitzky," which will present concerts of the Boston Symphony conducted by Koussevitzky between 1942 and 1948. The series, which begins December 7, will be heard Wednesday evenings from 8:35 to 9:35.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

DEC 25 1966

New Records

Tribute To Conductor

"Serge Koussevitzky, The Boston Symphony Orchestra." A three-record album in tribute to the distinguished Russian-born conductor who for 25 years developed the Boston Symphony Orchestra into one of the world's greatest symphonic organizations. The performances date from 1938 to 1947. Included are Brahms's "Academic Festival Overture" and the Symphony No. 4; Tchaikowsky, Symphony No. 5; Rachmaninoff's "Vocalize" (orchestrated by the composer); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Battle of Kershenetz": Hanson, "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra; and Shostakovich, Symphony No. 9 (1945). (RCA Victor, Treasury of Immortal Performances, VCM 6174).

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 68,000 S. 72,000

NOV 27 1966

* * *

The "Treasury of Immortal Performances" offers a Red Seal special album with three LPs for the price of two in older recordings by the Boston Symphony under the direction of the unforgettable Serge Koussevitzky. Three symphonies are included in this bargain layout—the Brahms fourth, Tchaikovsky fifth, and Shostakovich No. 9. There are also shorter overtures and suites plus one previously unissued item, the Hanson "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings". It's in a nicely boxed package. (RCA-Victor)

Today's edition of that same Boston Symphony, now directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presents the Brahms First Piano Concerto with Artur Rubinstein the soloist. There, will be some eyebrow raising with this release inasmuch as the same orchestra and the same label has the same work played by Van Cliburn. Of course, serious piano students will appreciate the difference in interpretation by these wizards of the piano. (RCA-Victor)

* * *

New Records

Salute To Koussevitzky

By FLORESTAN CROCHE

PROBABLY no other conductor in this country did more to encourage the development of American music and to stimulate interest in orchestral music in general than Serge Koussevitky. And undeniably no other conductor of first-class stature was more an educator of both orchestra and public.

In salute to Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for more than 25 years, and developed into one of the world's greatest symphonic ensembles, R.C.A. Victor has now issued a remarkable three-record album entitled "Serge Koussevitzky—Boston Symphony Orchestra" in its Treasury of Immortal Performances Series.

The album has been made available in a special "Three for Two" arrangement in which R.C.A. Victor is offering the three records for the usual cost of two; the suggested retail price (lower in discount shops) is, therefore, less than $10.

Compositions included are Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture, Opus 80, and the Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Opus 64; Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise," Opus 34, No. 14, arranged for orchestra by the composer; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Battle of Kershenetz"; Howard Hanson's "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra," Opus 35, with George Laurent, flutist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist; Arthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E," Opus 63; and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (1945) R.C.A. Victor, Treasury of Immortal Performances VCM 6174 (3).

Singular Style

RCA's choice of works to reveal the extraordinary singularity of Koussevitzky's style and the qualities of his orchestra was an excellent one. Among the composers of the Nineteenth Century, Brahms and Tchaikowsky were Koussevitzky's favorites. By heritage he was particularly sympathetic to the music of Russia, from the coloristic orchestral works of Korsakoff to the mysticism of his personal friend Rachmaninoff, and the expansiveness of Shostakovich.

And finally, no conductor provided more encouragement to the American composer of the 1930's and 1940's than Koussevitzky. As Lukas Foss has observed in an article of eulogy included in the excellent booklet of annotated notes accompanying the records, "With him died an entire era of 'Russo-America' Boston, while remaining a city with a great symphony orchestra, ceased from one day to the next to be a mecca for young composers, a center of symphonic premieres that made the nation sit up and take notice."

In the Brahms' works, Koussevitzky's tempi were fast, but always natural of phrase. A great characteristic of his style was that of an almost improvisatory treatment of fluctuation of speed, a tendency to slow up at transitions between themes. This approach, for many musicians in our modern period of "objective interpretation," when the aim, in the words of Ravel, is just "to read the notes" might seem to be old-fashioned.

Yet, in spite of such deviations in tempi, which, admittedly are not in the score, the music flows cohesively and convincingly, and the logic of the structure seems crystal clear.

In the reading of the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky, the orchestra reveals a woodwind section whose sound is rich and voluptuous. All too frequently descriptions of the Boston Symphony, during Koussevitzky's period of tenure (1924-1950) praised the strings; yet as heard on this disc, the orchestra's woodwinds, especially the flutes and clarinets, are of comparable richness and opulence.

The strings, of course, shine forth in unmarred purity. In Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise," they are able to sustain a long and elegant phrase with pulsating and shimmering sound, while in Foote's Brahmisian Suite, they play with power and a sense of expansiveness, their sound reminiscent frequently of the vibrancy of the Vienna Philharmoniker.

ATHENS, GA.
BANNER-HERALD
D. 7,500 S. 8,000

NOV 27 1966

DISC DATA

AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE-HERALD
SUN. 58,500

NOV 27 1966

Records in review

Koussevitzky's genius evident

By PAUL DEE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Bostom Symphony Orchestra dominated a whole era of symphonic performances in America. For 20 years after the First World War, our view of the classics was, in the main, Koussevitzky's view. Our discoveries of "modern" music were the things Koussevitzky found or encouraged. Our enthusiasms were, when you get right down to it, his.

It did not matter that, a little further south, in New York, Toscanini and Mengelberg were giving impassioned object lessons on the music of the Romantics, and that, over in Philadelphia, Stokowski was giving romantic demonstrations on the avant garde. By the beginning of World War II, both New York and Philadelphia had had a change in leadership, and the "golden triangle" sounded pretty much like Koussevitzky and the BSO at all points.

Our tastes had matured by then. Like most youthful loves, we had put "Koussi" aside with lingering tenderness and with embarrassment in remembering the ardor. The newly released Serge Koussevitzy: Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor VCM 6174, mono only) is like finding a packet of love letters from the sweetheart we didn't marry. It represents the Koussevitzky repertoire from Brahms to Shostakovich in recordings made between 1938 and 1946.

There is the well - remembered consistency of approach thoughout. Koussevitzky was a genius of the glossy production. He moved sound across the stage, so to speak, with great effectiveness and utter polish. The subtlety of his playing is impressive, but it is also quite arbitrary. Phrasing and tempos make all the superficial points very beautifully, but the preoccupation with surface finish obscures the matter within.

Where the music allows for this treatment, as in the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5 or Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, the results are ravishing. In music of greater substance, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 for example, Koussevitzky was likely to achieve only an empty stylishness. Even that quality, by the way, is hadly apparent in the poor sound of the transfer of the Brahms.

The Budapest String Quartet served much the same function in their corner of the musical repertoire that Koussevitzky and the BSO did in theirs. The phonograph would be immeasurably poorer without the long and dedicated efforts of the Budapest. There are no greater performances of anything on records than the 1957 version of the Mozard String Quintets. In particular, the reading of the D Major Quintet was so luminous that I would place it among the greatest of all discs.

As part of the Budapest's 25th Anniversary Celebration, Columbia has brought out a new edition of the Mozart Quintets (D3L 347 mono; D3S 747, stereo). Again, Walter Trampler takes the part for viola, and, again, the music sings from the records with affecting beauty. The spaciousness and clarity of the stereo is a distinct advance.

The playingof the group has changed somewhat in the intervening years. Precision in attack and ripeness of production have given way to greater earnestness and spontaneity. Some may feel this as a loss of the qualities particularly the Budapest's own. I do not hink the lessening in polish any great defect in itself. The difficulty is rather in the inability of the group to bring off the new approach with the same conviction and self possession as before. Even so, the new versions easily stand at the head of their class; their only competitors, the Budapest of a decade ago.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 211,932 SUN. 310,264

FEB 19 1967

SOUND ADVICE

New Dutilleux Work Modern, Yet Romantic

By ROBERT E. BENSON

A new Westminster disc introduces to the LP catalog an important contemporary work, the "Symphony No. 2" by Frenchman Henri Dutilleux. This symphony was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony and had its first performance that year with Charles Munch conducting, and since that time he has championed this music by conducting it often.

On this new recording, he conducts the Lamoureux Orchestra (Westminster stereo WST 17119, $4.79).

The "Symphony No. 2" is subtitled "Le Double," which refers to the double orchestra for which it is scored. A regular orchestra is augmented by a chamber orchestra of a dozen players, including trumpet, trombone, harpsichord, celesta and timpani. It is a sombre, majestic work of great difficulty, treating the entire chamber ensemble as a soloist, and although it is very modern in nature, it is best termed a Romantic work.

The performance on this new disc is very fine, and the recorded sound is excellent, although somewhat wirey. The record also containing a sparkling performance of Roussel's "Suite in F, Op. 33."

The Sacramento Union
California's Oldest Daily Newspaper
D. 55,423 SUN. 50,580

DEC 4 1966

A Koussevitsky Remembrance

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. RCA Victor VCM-6174.

Like the Metropolitan Opera souvenir album that preceded it, this three-record set of "Koussi" and the great instrument he perfected is a document to cherish.

For 25 years, Koussevitsky was musical director of the Boston Symphony, and he raised it to such a standard of excellence hausted their interest in the scores, and sought for "new" ways to perform them, Koussevitsky projects an enthusiasm for the essential work as if he had not played each one a hundred times previously.

Humor and Energy

Koussevitsky was also at home with the two major contemporary Soviet composers, Prokofiev and Shostakovich, and his reading here of the latter's "Ninth Symphony" is full of the good humor and energy with which it abounds.

The album also contains two rewarding smaller works — Brahms "Academic Festival Overture" played with a rare feeling of grandeur and the lovely Rachmaninoff "Vocalise" for strings.

Of only slight interest are the Hanson "Serenade for Flute, Harp and String Orchestra" and the Foote "Suite for Strings in E."

Some Omissions

Persuasively as Koussevitsky plays these American works, it is regrettable that RCA did not choose instead Koussevitsky's splendid reading of Roy Harris' "Third Symphony" (if an American entry was desired) or his now-legendary reading of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2" or the Prokofiev "Classical Symphony."

Although the recordings show their age in places, they are still eminently listenable. And considering the genius in performance, are to be preferred to many more recent recordings.

—By Richard Simon

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407

DEC 9 1966

The Record Cabinet

By MILTON BERLINER

RCA Victor has added two outstanding albums to its series of "Immortal" performances—The Art of the Cantor and Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first is a reissue of recordings by Josef Rosenblatt, Samuel Vigoda and Moshe Koussevitzky that date back to 1925. The Cantors are supported variously by choirs, piano, string ensemble, organ, orchestras. The fine singing both of the Cantors and the choruses give the album universal appeal.

The Boston Symphony album encompasses Koussevitzky interpretation of Brahms, (Academic Festival Overture and Symphony No. 4) Tchaikowsky (Symphony No. 5), Rachmaninoff (Vocalise), Rimsky-Korsakoff (The Battle of Kershenetz), Hanson (Serenade), Foote (Suite for Strings) and Shostakovich (Sumphony No. 9).

BLANK PAGE

169

LOHENGRIN

San Francisco Examiner
D. 275,000
JULY 3 1 1966

SANDOR KONYA (FAR LEFT) LUCINE AMARA, ERICH LEINSDORF (SEATED RIGHT)

LPs—Leinsdorf and Complete 'Lohengrin'

WAGNER — "LOHENGRIN" (complete) (Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, Sandor Konya, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin Marsh, the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor). RCA Victor Mone SRRM-5848-52; Stereo-SRRS 5858-62.

It cannot be said that the world was really waiting breathlessly for another recording of "Lohengrin" but now that it is here, it should be regarded with considerable respect. For history's sake it should be noted that this is the first recording of complete opera by a major American orchestra since Toscanini's day, and the first time a complete Wagner opera has been recorded in the western hemisphere. If there are any dissenting record collectors let them take it up with RCA Victor for it has wrought and said these things.

The advantage of returning to America and to the magnificent Boston Symphony is clear. Leinsdorf was of course a Wagner man, first and foremost. Give him Wagner with the Boston and the results are resplendent, the acoustics and balance better controlled than in any stage performance. So the importance of these "firsts" lies in the fact that the symphonic quality of the score can be heard at its best.

At one end of this range is the mysterious and ominous opening of Act II, the endless deep cello line that seemed always inadequate when played in the pit by the small opera cello section covered over by audience rustling.

At the brilliant end of things, one fastens on the opening of Act III, scene three, with the five groups of trumpets, each in different key and voice quality, entering in turn, then converging.

When they say the "complete" version, they mean every note, including the very affecting continuation of Lohengrin's Grail narrative, "In fernem Land," omitted from most performances for dramatic reasons.

Musically it is valuable in content and in balance to the familiar portion of the aria.

Leinsdorf's interpretation is excellent in taste, balance (with the off-stage elements, for example) and in driving good, almost too-gusty tempos in the scenes of crowd excitement. Reservations are entered on the question of the performance's lyric character or rather the lack of it. A fair amount of the singing—and not only in the quasi-recitatives—comes through in a note-after-note fashion.

The phrases are not compelling; there is insufficient legato flow. Since this crops up in the work of most of the soloists, this is possibly a reflection of Leinsdorf's musical personality, possibly his meticulous attention to clear articulation of the words.

A Particular Gift

Although the melodic style of "Lohengrin" is more Italianate and lyric than any of Wagner's other works, it is still a syllabic setting of characteristically short-phrased poetry. It takes a particular gift to convey this in legato, but it can and has been done. As a matter of fact, Leinsdorf achieves a beautiful cantabile with the chorus.

The cast is good at the top, but has some weak spots. Konya is fine, in a role which has been notably his for a reported 200 performances. At some points his familiar manner of coloring his voice sounds a little contrived, but his "Son of Parisfal" has a noble quality.

Lucine Amara is a worthy Elsa and sounds at her vocal best. Recording conditions enable her to handle her voice and characterization ingenuously.

The Frederick of Teiramund is sung by a baritone William Dooley who hails from Modesto and has been doing well in Germany since 1956 and at the Met since 1964. This is a strong voice, brighter than usual for this role. His characterization like his tone could use more contrast.

If the Frederick could have been improved upon, a gross casting error was Rita Gorr, the Ortrud. I see no virtue in literally depicting villainous character with villainous singing, and Miss Gorr's shrillness, portamento descents and other melodramatic effects mar this production seriously.

A Grand King

Jerome Hines is a grand King Henry, and Calvin Marsh's commanding voice makes a forceful impression as the Herald.

Alfred Nash Patterson's Boston Pro Musica chorus augmented to 180, bring the double male choruses up to snuff as they are rarely if ever heard in an opera house. The male chorus tone, however, is decidedly on the youthful, open side.

For incisive attack and the excitement of Wagner's multi-leveled responses they can hardly be improved upon—as in the first swan-sighting and the glorious end to Act II.

—R.C.

THE DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
D. 179,425 SUN. 287,506
JULY 1 7 1966

It's American First

Full 'Lohengrin' Recorded

"Lohengrin" is the first American recording of a Wagner opera.

It is also the first absolutely un-cut recording of Richard Wagner's poetic masterpiece. This performance includes the section following the Grail narrative in the final scene (called Anhang in the score). This section has been performed in recent times, to the best of my knowledge, only in the Bayreuth productions of the 30's. From a dramatic viewpoint cutting of the section is probably a wise decision, for Lohengrin's narrative ought to end with the climactic words "My father, Parsifal, bears a crown. I, his knight, am named Lohengrin." But from a musical standpoint the Anhang is a very beautiful passage.

One important thing in all Wagnerian operas is the orchestra. The orchestra bears a lot of the time the biggest share of the opera. One thing about this new RCA recording, the orchestra is probably one of the best in the world — The Boston Symphony.

The musical director of the Boston, Erich Leinsdorf, is no stranger to the opera stage. His interpretation of this opera is a marvel. Leinsdorf's first American years were at the Metropolitan Opera; he made his debut conducting "Die Walkure" and became chief conductor of the German repertoire. He also served under Bruno Walter and Toscanini for the Salzburg festivals.

Sandor Konya, who sings the title role, has sung the role on opera stages all over the world — a staggering total of more than 200 times.

Lucine Amara is Elsa and surprisingly fine in the role. William Dooley and

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, July 10, 1966

St. Louis Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016
JULY 3 0 1966

Record Reviews

By CLARK MITZE

WAGNER — RCA Victor
Lohengrin
Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin March; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Boston Chorus Pro Musica

The 1965 Summer season of the Boston Symphony in Tanglewood was noteworthy for its unusual presentation of "Lohengrin" with one act given in successive concerts. Following the final Sunday afternoon concert, the entire ensemble moved to Orchestra Hall in Boston where many of the first floor seats had been removed to accommodate the 106-piece orchestra, 180 voice choir, and 32 off-stage players.

The event was noteworthy in several respects. First, it was an excellent performance, far better than any of the other three listed in Schwann. It was the first American recording of "Lohengrin" or any other Wagner; the first major recording of any opera in America in many years and the only repertory opera ever done in the United States with a symphony orchestra. The cost of such productions has been prohibitive. It is only the recent year-around orchestra contracts that make it possible.

The handsome brochure credits Leinsdorf with saying "in the next 25 years it will come to be recognized that Wagner was the greatest musical genius of the 19th century." He attributes this reawakening to recordings. This uncut version runs three hours and 36 minutes. Add two intermissions plus the time of getting to the theater and the total involvement is more than many musicgoers care to give.

Even more pertinent is the assistance the microphones give to Wagnerian singers. With a normal opera house orchestra, the instrumental competition is too much for all but the most leather-lunged singers. With the full Boston Symphony, an audience would scarcely be able to hear anyone, although the cast is made up of veteran Wagnerian singers.

Sandor Konya is one of the great Lohengrins of all time. His voice has a steely brilliance. Calvin Marsh is excellent as the King's Herald as is Jerome Hines as King Henry. Lucine Amara, the young soprano from Hartford, Conn., sings Elsa with assurance. She overplays the final scene but is otherwise excellent.

It is interesting to note that four of the six featured soloists, Amara, Dooley, Hines and Marsh are American-born. At long last, we are coming of age in this field of the arts.

The Chorus is superb and the orchestra is equally good. Leinsdorf's control of the monstrous forces is complete. He is far from being my favorite conductor, but he does a first rate job with this impressive project and the result is a performance of the highest quality.

MASSIVE PRODUCTION FOR RECORDS — More than 300 vocal and orchestral musicians are assembled in Boston's Symphony Hall for the recording of Wagner's "Loehengrin" conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, which has scheduled the five-LP release for August, says it is the first American recording of a Wagner opera. Principal singers include Sandor Konya, tenor; Lucine Amara, soprano, and Jerome Hines, basso.

LOHENGRIN

San Francisco Examiner
D. 275,000
JULY 3 1 1966

SANDOR KONYA (FAR LEFT) LUCINE AMARA, ERICH LEINSDORF (SEATED RIGHT)

LPs—Leinsdorf and Complete 'Lohengrin'

WAGNER - "LOHENGRIN" (complete) (Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, Sandor Konya, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin Marsh, the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor). RCA Victor Mone SRRM-5848-52; Stereo-SRRS 5858-62.

It cannot be said that the world was really waiting breathlessly for another recording of "Lohengrin" but now that it is here, it should be regarded with considerable respect. For history's sake it should be noted that this is the first recording of complete opera by a major American orchestra since Toscanini's day, and the first time a complete Wagner opera has been recorded in the western hemisphere. If there are any dissenting record collectors let them take it up with RCA Victor for it has wrought and said these things.

The advantage of returning to America and to the magnificent Boston Symphony is clear. Leinsdorf was of course a Wagner man, first and foremost. Give him Wagner with the Boston and the results are resplendent, the acoustics and balance better controlled than in any stage performance. So the importance of these "firsts" lies in the fact that the symphonic quality of the score can be heard at its best.

At one end of this range is the mysterious and ominous opening of Act II, the endless deep cello line that seemed always inadequate when played in the pit by the small opera cello section covered over by audience rustling.

At the brilliant end of things, one fastens on the opening of Act III, scene three, with the five groups of trumpets, each in different key and voice quality, entering in turn, then converging.

When they say the "complete" version, they mean every note, including the very affecting continuation of Lohengrin's Grail narrative, "In fernem Land," omitted from most performances for dramatic reasons.

Musically it is valuable in content and in balance to the familiar portion of the aria.

Leinsdorf's interpretation is excellent in taste, balance (with the off-stage elements, for example) and in driving good, almost too-gusty tempos in the scenes of crowd excitement. Reservations are entered on the question of the performance's lyric character or rather the lack of it. A fair amount of the singing—and not only in the quasi-recitatives—comes through in a note-after-note fashion.

The phrases are not compelling; there is insufficient legato flow. Since this crops up in the work of most of the soloists, this is possibly a reflection of Leinsdorf's musical personality, possibly his meticulous attention to clear articulation of the words.

A Particular Gift

Although the melodic style of "Lohengrin" is more Italianate and lyric than any of Wagner's other works, it is still a syllabic setting of characteristically short-phrased poetry. It takes a particular gift to convey this in legato, but it can and has been done. As a matter of fact, Leinsdorf achieves a beautiful cantabile with the chorus.

The cast is good at the top, but has some weak spots. Konya is fine, in a role which has been notably his for a reported 200 performances. At some points his familiar manner of coloring his voice sounds a little contrived, but his "Son of Parisfal" has a noble quality.

Lucine Amara is a worthy Elsa and sounds at her vocal best. Recording conditions enable her to handle her voice and characterization ingenuously,

The Frederick of Telramund is sung by a baritone William Dooley who hails from Modesto and has been doing well in Germany since 1956 and at the Met since 1964. This is a strong voice, brighter than usual for this role. His characterization like his tone could use more contrast.

If the Frederick could have been improved upon, a gross casting error was Rita Gorr, the Ortrud. I see no virtue in literally depicting villainous character with villainous singing, and Miss Gorr's shrillness, portamento descents and other melodramatic effects mar this production seriously.

A Grand King

Jerome Hines is a grand King Henry, and Calvin Marsh's commanding voice makes a forceful impression as the Herald.

Alfred Nash Patterson's Boston Pro Musica chorus augmented to 180, bring the double male choruses up to snuff as they are rarely if ever heard in an opera house. The male chorus tone, however, is decidedly on the youthful, open side.

For incisive attack and the excitement of Wagner's multi-leveled responses they can hardly be improved upon—as in the first swan-sighting and the glorious end to Act II.

—R.C.

THE DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
D. 179,425 SUN. 287,506
JULY 1 7 1966

It's American First

Full 'Lohengrin' Recorded

"Lohengrin" is the first American recording of a Wagner opera.

It is also the first absolutely un-cut recording of Richard Wagner's poetic masterpiece. This performance includes the section following the Grail narrative in the final scene (called Anhang in the score). This section has been performed in recent times, to the best of my knowledge, only in the Bayreuth productions of the 30's. From a dramatic viewpoint cutting of the section is probably a wise decision, for Lohengrin's narrative ought to end with the climactic words "My father, Parsifal, bears a crown. I, his knight, am named Lohengrin." But from a musical standpoint the Anhang is a very beautiful passage.

One important thing in all Wagnerian operas is the orchestra. The orchestra bears a lot of the time the biggest share of the opera. One thing about this new RCA recording, the orchestra is probably one of the best in the world — The Boston Symphony.

The musical director of the Boston, Erich Leinsdorf, is no stranger to the opera stage. His interpretation of this opera is a marvel. Leinsdorf's first American years were at the Metropolitan Opera; he made his debut conducting "Die Walkure" and became chief conductor of the German repertoire. He also served under Bruno Walter and Toscanini for the Salzburg festivals.

Sandor Konya, who sings the title role, has sung the role on opera stages all over the world — a staggering total of more than 200 times.

Lucine Amara is Elsa and surprisingly fine in the role. William Dooley and

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, July 10, 1966

St. Louis Globe-Democrat
D. 303,964 SUN. 343,016
JULY 3 0 1966

Record Reviews

By CLARK MITZE

WAGNER RCA Victor
Lohengrin
Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin March; Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Boston Chorus Pro Musica

The 1965 Summer season of the Boston Symphony in Tanglewood was noteworthy for its unusual presentation of "Lohengrin" with one act given in successive concerts. Following the final Sunday afternoon concert, the entire ensemble moved to Orchestra Hall in Boston where many of the first floor seats had been removed to accommodate the 106-piece orchestra, 180 voice choir, and 32 off-stage players.

The event was noteworthy in several respects. First, it was an excellent performance, far better than any of the other three listed in Schwann. It was the first American recording of "Lohengrin" or any other Wagner; the first major recording of any opera in America in many years and the only repertory opera ever done in the United States with a symphony orchestra. The cost of such productions has been prohibitive. It is only the recent year-around orchestra contracts that make it possible.

The handsome brochure credits Leinsdorf with saying "in the next 25 years it will come to be recognized that Wagner was the greatest musical genius of the 19th century." He attributes this reawakening to recordings. This uncut version runs three hours and 36 minutes. Add two intermissions plus the time of getting to the theater and the total involvement is more than many musicgoers care to give.

Even more pertinent is the assistance the microphones give to Wagnerian singers. With a normal opera house orchestra, the instrumental competition is too much for all but the most leather-lunged singers. With the full Boston Symphony, an audience would scarcely be able to hear anyone, although the cast is made up of veteran Wagnerian singers.

Sandor Konya is one of the great Lohengrins of all time. His voice has a steely brilliance. Calvin Marsh is excellent as the King's Herald as is Jerome Hines as King Henry. Lucine Amara, the young soprano from Hartford, Conn., sings Elsa with assurance. She overplays the final scene but is otherwise excellent.

It is interesting to note that four of the six featured soloists, Amara, Dooley, Hines and Marsh are American-born. At long last, we are coming of age in this field of the arts.

The Chorus is superb and the orchestra is equally good. Leinsdorf's control of the monstrous forces is complete. He is far from being my favorite conductor, but he does a first rate job with this impressive project and the result is a performance of the highest quality.

MASSIVE PRODUCTION FOR RECORDS — More than 300 vocal and orchestral musicians are assembled in Boston's Symphony Hall for the recording of Wagner's "Loehengrin" conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor, which has scheduled the five-LP release for August, says it is the first American recording of a Wagner opera. Principal singers include Sandor Konya, tenor; Lucine Amara, soprano, and Jerome Hines, basso.

171

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515
JUL 31 1966

RECORDS

New Recording of 'Lohengrin' —What Time's the Next Swan?

WALTER SLEZAK tells an anecdote about his Wagnerian father, Leo, and the intrepid "Lohengrin" bird, ending with the book-title question, "What Time's the Next Swan?" It seems that once, in performance days of yore, the feathery, metamorphized Duke of Brabant embarked upon his journey with an empty boat in tow, leaving the warrior knight of Montsalvat stranded on the shore.

Erich Leinsdorf

And, tho not even the most avid Wagnerian could justifiably demand swans with his stereo "Lohengrin," a query along much the same line — What happened to the swan? —is called forth by the new recording of Richard Wagner's "Romantische Oper" with Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra [RCA-Victor, LSC 6710, 5-record set].

• • •

"Lohengrin" is now nearing the ripe age of 118; in terms of Wagnerian opera in America, it is the most standard of the composer's 13 stage works [alone, in Chicago there have been 52 performances since 1910]. So it is almost natural that "Lohengrin" should have been chosen as the first complete Wagner to be recorded, not only in the United States, but, according to advance information, in the western hemisphere.

Keeping this in mind, the patriotic gesture would be to praise strengths and overlook weaknesses. But musical performance standards know, or should know, no national boundaries and, frankly, the weaknesses here far outnumber the strengths.

• • •

To be equally frank, all of those weaknesses lie on the side of principal casting, with the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Boston Chorus Pro Musica forced time and time again to rescue the hearer from total befuddlement.

If past credits were ever any indication of present quality, Sandor Konya, the Hungarian tenor who rose to fame via a 1958 Bayreuth "Lohengrin," should have been outstanding in the title role. Should have been. For two acts and the first, all-important, scene of the third act, Mr. Konya wavers between Italian bel canto and Wagnerian declamation, never really casting his lot with either of the two acceptable "Lohengrin" approaches.

Lack of focus is Mr. Konya's answer to the Bridal Chamber scene's soulful conversation; his opening "Nun sei bedankt, mein lieber Schwan" is weepy and saccharine. Added to this, he often suffers from a good case of Bayreuth bark and Slavian bleat — unsupported open vowels — and tends to repress initial and final consonants. When Mr. Konya finally decides to sing Wagner, in the closing scene, much-belated satisfaction results.

• • •

Many of Mr. Konya's stylistic shortcomings are echoed by the other principals. Lucine Amara's Elsa is indeed innocent, but in the manner of a simpering schoolgirl. A wide and quick vibrato mars vocal purity, as does an invariable habit of sliding to the sharp side above the staff. Miss Amara's German pronunciation is of the sort that would have sent G. B. Shaw — and should send anyone familiar with the language — into uncontrolled fits of despair: there are neither short nor dark vowels and "Liebe" [a recurrent word in this opera] always ends up an irritating "Lee-bay."

• • •

Rita Gorr manages to capture some of Ortrud's demonism, but her pagan sorceress eventually collapses into a screaming witch. William Dooley is a lightweight and miscast Friedrich von Telramund. Even Jerome Hines, a Metropolitan opera mainstay for years, falls short here, with a fuzzy rendition of Koenig Heinrich. That leaves only Calvin Marsh as the full-throated Herald.

Some of these solo faults are likely due to the recording location: Boston's Symphony hall. Denuded of spectators, its acoustics are bright and right for the chorus and orchestra, but swallow the principal voices in indistinct reverberations and echoes.

• • •

But the faults, whatever may have caused them, are still there and hardly to be overcome in listening. Two things, help tho: the Boston Symphony orchestra and Chorus Pro Musica. They and Mr. Leinsdorf provide all of the peaks. The three Preludes are splendid Wagner; the orchestral interlude ["Aufzug des Herrbanns"] between scenes in Act III is unusual as the cathartic moment; the first finale puts a rousing finish to an act otherwise notable only for the chorus' polish in the welcoming "Seht! Seht! Welch ein Seltsam Wunder!"

The quality of choral work thruout, but especially here and in Elsa's Procession, is a rarity outside of Bayreuth. In orchestra and chorus this set has the mark of brilliant authority; too bad the principals missed the boat.

ROBERT WAGNER

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 1,355,614
JUL 31 1966

Recordings: 'Lohengrin' Complete, But Not Ideal

By HOWARD KLEIN

THE complete recording of Wagner's opera Lohengrin, which will be released by RCA Victor this week, is a newsworthy event for several reasons. But the five-record album falls short of what one expects of an ideal "Lohengrin" recording (LM 6710; stereo LSC 6710).

This is the first complete recording of the opera. Nothing is omitted and Lohengrin's third act "In fernem Land" is lengthened by the inclusion of music not usually found in productions on stage or records. This music, called the "Anhung," was supplied by Broude Brothers, the publishers, and was incorporated by Victor for completeness, which makes sense. In addition, the extention of the aria makes more of Lohengrin's farewell. The "Anhung" is included in Bayreuth performances.

It is the first opera recording to be made in the United States since Victor's "Macbeth" of 1958, having been recorded last August in Boston's Symphony Hall directly after the performances by the soloists and Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. It is also the first recording of a Wagner opera to be made here.

What prompted RCA to record here turns out to be a main virtue of the recording, namely the sound of the Boston Symphony and the acoustics of Symphony Hall. It stands to reason, when Wagner is the composer, that the orchestra is important. This is why English Decca's producer John Culshaw goes with Georg Solti to record its Wagner series in Vienna. The Vienna Philharmonic has Wagner in its blood. The Boston Symphony, while not a German - oriented orchestra, has the tradition of a great ensemble, and Victor has recorded it in a wide spectrum of tone with great warmth and detail.

The reverberation in Symphony Hall and the full, mellow tone re-produced by the recordings are a delight to hear.

The offstage effects have been beautifully handled, with fine balances and timing of trumpets, choruses, etc. The sound of the trumpets that play the fanfares in C are blaringly good, too. And only once or twice is one reminded by a brass vibrato that some Boston Symphony brass players have favored French vibratos in the past.

Erich Leinsdorf chooses unhurried tempos and he plans the sections with apparent logic. One feels the rightness of this or that speed, and the lines are always clear. But the temperature does not go up at the right places. It may be argued that "Lohengrin" is a static opera, but the fact is Rudolf Kempe creates more interest is his Angel recording, which is the only competitor. Also, Leinsdorf has minimized his string vibratos which cools much of the music down past a necessary level of objectivity.

Continuity

Leinsdorf is a first-rate opera conductor and he dilivers some fine passages of orchestral playing and ensemble singing. But the continuity of the opera is not good. Things drag in the first act where they should rush headlong. One feels the piecemeal recording technique of all studio recording has worked against Leinsdorf's sense of the dramatic. The singers take too much time in their solos; the whole has a majestic, stately quality, but not enough tension. The second act is better and the third quite good, although the last measures of the opera again lack decisiveness.

The Lohengrin is Sandor Konya, a familiar Wagnerian tenor on the world's opera stages, and a skilled exponent of this role. His singing is a high point throughout. He has taste and a sense of style. His pianissimos are soft, but well-focussed and honest.

It is hard to choose a next best singer, because the balance of the cast ranges from competent down, and none of the singing is really distinguished.

Lucine Amara's Elsa has an unsettled emotional quality from first to last. There is no growth of character apparent in her vocalism. She sings the role with ease lofting some good pianissimos, but in general her tentative attack and quick withdrawal from the heart of a note—where the focus and weight should be full or biting — detracts consistently.

Rita Gorr as Ortrud is downright hard to take when she holds a loud high note. The edginess of her voice may reflect Ortrud's nasty character, but one finds oneself wincing too often at the coarse, hard-driven sounds.

William Dooley is good as Telramund but his voice thins out a little at the top, and this baritone role calls for a Helden quality of richness in all registers. But Mr. Dooley's vocal acting, while more imaginative than Gorr's or Amara's, is lacking in vocal dynamism.

Dietrich Fischer - Dieskau's Telramund on the Angel recording sets the standard. This recording has Jess Thomas, the American tenor, as Lohengrin. Elisabeth Grümmer as Elsa and Christa Ludwig as Ortrud. Thomas is not quite the equal of Konya, but his performance, and those of his colleagues taken together is superior, especially when galvanized into a forward-moving performance by Kempe.

Jerome Hines as King Henry is authoritative but he lacks the black-voiced conviction of Gottlob Frick in the Angel set. Calvin Marsh, the American baritone handles the Herald's music with force, but there are some sharp pitches. Otto Wiener's Herald on Angel has a purer singing style as well as more momentum.

Superior Sound

The Victor "Lohengrin" is superior in recorded sound to the Angel with the spread of sound and presence much more intense. But Angel again wins in the choral department. Wagner has written great choral music in "Lohengrin," much of relying on men's voices. Angel's chorus is the Chorus of the Vienna State Opera, a mature group thoroughly acquainted not only with the German language, but with Wagnerian style. The Boston Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director, is no match for this assignment. The men's voices become boyish in high registers. And the pronounciation — especially, for example, when the words "gar viel" seem to be calling either the late President or the actor Garfield—leaves something to be desired.

In all, the Victor recording is a triumph of technicians and producers and equipment; a success for Konya and a partial success for Leinsdorf.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

[illegible] ics" albums have been added to the series of light classical music by Capitol. The two are "I Love Carmen," featuring the Sadler's Wells Opera conducted by Colin Daves and "Erich Leinsdorf Plays the Good-Time Classics," with the Concert Arts Orchestra. "I Love Carmen," contains some of the best-known melodies from the Bizet opera. The selections, sung in English by stars of London's Sadler's Wells Opera Company, include the "Toreador Song," "Habanera" and Prelude. In the title role is Patricia Johnson, who was recently heard in the Bach "Easter Oratorio" on Angel. Capitol's Classic subsidiary. The second addition to the "Good-Time" series this month features the conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf, in a program of light classics. Among the songs performed by Leinsdorf and the Concert Arts Orchestra area: Bacchanale from "Samson and Delelah." "The Sorcer's Apprentice," "The Moldau," Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin," and Danecs from "William Tell".

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 517,080
JUL 31 1966

This [illegible] S-FM will become the first station in the Boston area to broadcast the new RCA Victor recording of Wagner's Lohengrin. The cast includes Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, Jerome Hines, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica and the Boston Symphony.

Judge Henry Chmielinski Jr.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
JUL 16 1966

"LOHENGRIN" playback is listened to, from left to right, by tenor Sandor Konya, soprano Lucine Amara; Jack Pfeiffer, RCA Victor's audio co-ordinating administrator; Richard Mohr, Victor Seal a&r producer; Andrew Raeburn, assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, and Leinsdorf, who conducted the Boston Symphony for the recording. The five record set is listed for August release.

New York World Journal Tribune / September 25, 1966

by Herbert Kupferberg

Visitors to the Tanglewood Music Festival last summer probably will remember the three-segment Lohengrin—an act a day—that was performed there by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Quite a few eyebrows were raised by this unusual proceeding, and the suggestion was made that the three performances might have been entitled respectively, "Low," Hen," and "Grin."

When, right after the Festival ended, the orchestra and singers repaired to Symphony Hall, Boston, to record the entire work for RCA Victor, the wise heads again nodded and said that the whole Tanglewood arrangement had merely been a rehearsal for a recording session.

This was stoutly denied by the Boston Symphony people, the RCA Victor folk and all others concerned. But whatever the intent, the fact remains that a Lohengrin recording did come out of the affair, and has now been released by Victor. The vocal participants include Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara as Elsa, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, and Jerome Hines as King Henry, with Leinsdorf, of course, conducting (RCA Victor LM/LSC-6710, five records).

I sat in on a couple of those Symphony Hall recording sessions, and well remember the meticulous care that went into them. To gain the effect of offstage brass flourishes and the like, players were carefully stationed in the empty corridors of the hall, with the conductor's cues relayed to them by closed circuit television. This was the first time a Wagnerian opera had been recorded complete in the United States—really complete, since even the customarily excised portions were restored—and no effort was spared to make it a memorable set.

And so, indeed, it has turned out to be. For even if it has its flaws—and it assuredly does—it represents a magnificently rich and resonant unfolding of Wagner's score. Mostly this is due to the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which projects the sonorities of the music with a luxuriance you can almost feel. Leinsdorf, of course, is an old Wagnerian hand, and he draws forth the orchestral sound and surge of the music with a sure command.

But the quality of singing he is able to elicit is decidedly variable. It is no secret in musical circles that the original Elsa in this recording (and the Tanglewood performances) was to have been Leontyne Price, and to this day it's something of a mystery why she decided not to go through with it. In her place, Lucine Amara, who has never sung the part on the stage (not that Miss Price has, either), makes for a curious kind of Elsa. Strictly dramatically, she has just the right kind of voice, with a quality of childlike innocence about it. And yet it somehow lacks the musical weight to match the music. The result is that the part is sketched in very skillfully but seldom fully realized.

[redacted]

Gorr, who simply was not in good voice when the recording was made. Thanks to Leinsdorf's conducting the opera builds steadily to a musical and dramatic climax, and thanks to the restoration of the traditional cuts, this is a Lohengrin that holds the attention. But for all its merits, it leaves one with the feeling that it did not come out in the actuality quite the way that its planners intended.

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 252,084 SUN. 339,533

OCT 9 1966

RCA Victor Album Of 'Arcana' Praised

By DONAL J. HANAHAN
Chicago Daily News Writer

FACED WITH the annual autumn flurry of releases, a record reviewer can only hope to lay down guidelines and to hit high spots. The notes that follow are to be translated flatly as "Buy" or "Don't Buy," detailed discussion not being possible.

In the former category, do not hesitate to put your money on the Chicago Symphony's new RCA Victor coupling of Varese's "Arcana" and Frank Martin's concerto for seven winds, timpani, percussion and orchestra (LM-2914). No more stylistically diverse pair is likely to be recorded this season.

Jean Martinon, in his element, pulls off the explosive Varese piece magnificently, and the cooly calculated Martin calls forth spotless performances from the orchestra's first-chair brigade.

IN A contemporary vein, too, there is much to admire in an RCA two-disc album, "New Misic for the Piano" (LM-7042), in which Robert Helps espouses works by 24 living composers, among them such varied workmen as Kent Kennan and Milton Babbitt, Morton Gould and George Perle.

All the pieces are collected in one published book, which adds to the record's practical value for pianists, though it also dictated the inclusion of several vapid efforts. On the whole, the four sides are well worth the serious listener's time.

Recommended listening in another pianistic universe is Raymond Lewenthal's entertaining excursion into Liszt opera transcriptions (LM-2895). There is a properly florid put-down of Bellini, "Reminiscences de Norma," as well as the giddy "Hexameron," to which the composer contributed sections along with Chopin, Czerny and others.

IN THE not-recommended tile, sorry to say, goes RCA's new "Lohengrin" (LM-6710), though it is laudably uncut and enjoys a plush contribution from the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf.

The most successful stereo version yet of Bartok's chilling opera "Bluebeard's Castle" is London's OSA-1156. Christa Ludwig and her husband Walter Berry pass up the usual translations for convincing Hungarian. Istvan Kertesz conducts the Vienna Philharmonic.

Vladimir Ashkenazy, who should be the ideal Schumann pianist, misses the passionate sweep of the C Major Fantasia, but his latest London issue is nevertheless a must, if only for the "Symphonic Etudes," also included (CS-6471). The young Russian displays a poetry rare among current keyboard pounders, and he is technically an honest man.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

OCT 2 1966

Classical Records

Wagner: Lohengrin. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with Amara, Gorr, Konya, Dooley, Hines, Marsh, and Boston Pro Musica Chorus. Victor 6710.

Last summer, Leinsdorf gave over three Tanglewood programs to public performances of "Lohengrin," one act at a time, in preparation for this recording. The day after the last act, everyone trucked off to Boston's Symphony Hall, specially air-conditioned for the occasion, and the opera was recorded, complete. Every single note, which is something rarely heard these days, even at Bayreuth.

The total achievement has its great ups and its serious downs. The glory of the set is the distinct splendor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing a score that rarely receives so meticulous an orchestral reading. Leinsdorf moves the music with loving affection, but with no undue relaxation. The tempos move in a most welcome way. The restored passages in the first and last acts are strong and worth having. In the second act they only prolong painfully an unhappy business.

For the singing, which is after all the chief reason for opera, is highly uneven in the set. Konya is a glorious hero, his voice shining resplendently as any good Lohengrin's should. Beautiful in diction and in rhythm, he is a knight to believe in. Jerome Hines sounds imposing and at home as Henry the Fowler—who was the Fowlest?—even in a couple of roughish spots. Calvin Marsh is musical and alert as the Herald, though his voice is not precisely the weight to suit the music.

That is, alas, the sum total of merit in the singing. Lucine Amara is a replacement for Leontyne Price, who was first announced for the project. That the set is Price-less somewhat lowers its value. Miss Amara is dependable, bland, slightly girlish in sound, and lacks every bit of urgency and understanding that made the various Elsas of Lehmann, Rethberg, Traubel or Flagstad memorable. Miss Amara is dull.

Not so Rita Gorr. She is, bluntly, dreadful.

William Dooley is a fine lyric baritone who sounds completely beyond his depth, in temperament and in voice, as Telramund. If you want to know how these two should sound, you need only listen to the Ludwig-Fischer-Dieskau scenes on a rival set.

—Paul Hume.

World Journal Tribune
NEW YORK, NEW YORK
D. 900,000

SEP 25 1966

by Herbert Kupferberg

Visitors to the Tanglewood Music Festival last summer probably will remember the three-segment Lohengrin—an act a day—that was performed there by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Quite a few eyebrows were raised by this unusual proceeding, and the suggestion was made that the three performances might have been entitled respectively, "Low," Hen," and "Grin."

When, right after the Festival ended, the orchestra and singers repaired to Symphony Hall, Boston, to record the entire work for RCA Victor, the wise heads again nodded and said that the whole Tanglewood arrangement had merely been a rehearsal for a recording session.

This was stoutly denied by the Boston Symphony people, the RCA Victor folk and all others concerned. But whatever the intent, the fact remains that a Lohengrin recording did come out of the affair, and has now been released by Victor. The vocal participants include Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara as Elsa, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, and Jerome Hines as King Henry, with Leinsdorf, of course, conducting (RCA Victor LM/LSC-6710, five records).

I sat in on a couple of those Symphony Hall recording sessions, and well remember the meticulous care that went into them. To gain the effect of offstage brass flourishes and the like, players were carefully stationed in the empty corridors of the hall, with the conductor's cues relayed to them by closed circuit television. This was the first time a Wagnerian opera had been recorded complete in the United States—really complete, since even the customarily excised portions were restored—and no effort was spared to make it a memorable set.

And so, indeed, it has turned out to be. For even if it has its flaws—and it assuredly does—it represents a magnificently rich and resonant unfolding of Wagner's score. Mostly this is due to the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which projects the sonorities of the music with a luxuriance you can almost feel. Leinsdorf, of course, is an old Wagnerian hand, and he draws forth the orchestral sound and surge of the music with a sure command.

But the quality of singing he is able to elicit is decidedly variable. It is no secret in musical circles that the original Elsa in this recording (and the Tanglewood performances) was to have been Leontyne Price, and to this day it's something of a mystery why she decided not to go through with it. In her place, Lucine Amara, who has never sung the part on the stage (not that Miss Price has, either), makes for a curious kind of Elsa. Strictly dramatically, she has just the right kind of voice, with a quality of childlike innocence about it. And yet it somehow lacks the musical weight to [redacted] is sketched in very [redacted]

[redacted] Lohe[redacted] of Hines to the shrill and unsteady Ortrud of Miss Gorr, who simply was not in good voice when the recording was made. Thanks to Leinsdorf's conducting the opera builds steadily to a musical and dramatic climax, and thanks to the restoration of the traditional cuts, this is a Lohengrin that holds the attention. But for all its merits, it leaves one with the feeling that it did [redacted] out in the actuality [redacted]

[redacted] Wagner" (M2S [redacted] records). These are recordings of such works as the Flying Dutchman, Tannhaeuser, and Meistersinger Overtures, the Lohengrin Act I Prelude, and the Parsifal Prelude and Good Friday Spell. Included as a bonus, without additional charge, is a third record devoted to Walter's rehearsal of the Siegfried Idyll.

These have been released previously, but assembled like this they make for an attractive package. Walter's Wagner, like most of his other music, was suffused with a warmth and radiance that made even forbidding works seem friendly and intimate. Certainly this quality is richly evident here.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 335,705 SUN. 392,378

JAN 1 1967

Classical Records

By Sy

RECORDING COMPANIES seem to be celebrating some kind of a Wagner year, parading their conductors into the lists with appropriate fanfare. On our side of the water Victor put out a recent issue of "Lohengrin"—the first complete one—under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf and the magnificent Boston Symphony. Overseas there is promise of release this month of a new "Tristan and Isolde" by Deutsche-Grammophon, the first new recording in some six years or more. At hand is LONDON (OSA-1509, stereo; A-4509, monaural), a "Die Walkuere" under the direction of Georg Solti with the Vienna Philharmonic; it is a five-disc boxed set of distinction.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

OCT 9 1966

[redacted] more am[redacted] Victor's complete—really, complete!—"Lohengrin" (LM/LSC-6710). Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a hyper-symphonic performance that features singers either miscast or recorded on an off-day. An exception is the light-voiced, occasionally lachrymose Lohengrin of Sandor Konya, which, by current standards is one of the best. But how, on so costly and overpublicized a venture, does one account for the negative and unidiomatic Elsa (Lucine Amara), the strained and pale Telramund (William Dooley), the strident Ortrud (Rita Gorr) and the tired King Henry (Jerome Hines)? The orchestra sounds marvelous, and Leinsdorf refuses to be discouraged by his singers. The listener, however, may react differently.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

JAN 1 1967

[redacted] released at the end of the summer by RCA Victor, should stand high on any list as the choice opera recording of the year (LM-6710, LSC-6710).

Wagner's "Lohengrin" gets a resplendent performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, and a cast which includes Lucine Amara, Sandor Konya, William Dooley and Rita Gorr.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 7,764

OCT 1 1966

'Lohengrin'

By TOM THOMAS

The biggest news in opera recordings this year has to be RCA Victor's monumental production of Wagner's Lohengrin, a five-disc set that claims a few "firsts" and, more important for me, a luxurious orchestra sound second to none.

This is the first Lohengrin recorded in its entirety, the work omitting not one note written into it by Wagner. For example, In fernem Land, sung by Lohengrin in Act 3, includes the music referred to as the Anhung, usually heard only at Bayreuth.

This is the first Wagnerian opera recorded in the Western Hemisphere, and the first time a major American orchestra has recorded an opera since Toscanini conducted the NBC Symphony.

SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 1,088,000

NOV 1966

SPOTLIGHT ON

With his mighty Lohengrin, Wagner went past the point of romantic grand opera into the realm of mystic music drama; the epic is heard in a stunning new RCA Victor recording. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony and soloists, including Sándor Kónya and Lucine Amara.

New York World Journal Tribune September 25, 1966 35

by Herbert Kupferberg

Visitors to the Tanglewood Music Festival last summer probably will remember the three-segment Lohengrin—an act a day—that was performed there by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Quite a few eyebrows were raised by this unusual proceeding, and the suggestion was made that the three performances might have been entitled respectively, "Low," Hen," and "Grin."

When, right after the Festival ended, the orchestra and singers repaired to Symphony Hall, Boston, to record the entire work for RCA Victor, the wise heads again nodded and said that the whole Tanglewood arrangement had merely been a rehearsal for a recording session.

This was stoutly denied by the Boston Symphony people, the RCA Victor folk and all others concerned. But whatever the intent, the fact remains that a Lohengrin recording did come out of the affair, and has now been released by Victor. The vocal participants include Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara as Elsa, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, and Jerome Hines as King Henry, with Leinsdorf, of course, conducting (RCA Victor LM/LSC-6710, five records).

I sat in on a couple of those Symphony Hall recording sessions, and well remember the meticulous care that went into them. To gain the effect of offstage brass flourishes and the like, players were carefully stationed in the empty corridors of the hall, with the conductor's cues relayed to them by closed circuit television. This was the first time a Wagnerian opera had been recorded complete in the United States—really complete, since even the customarily excised portions were restored—and no effort was spared to make it a memorable set.

And so, indeed, it has turned out to be. For even if it has its flaws—and it assuredly does—it represents a magnificently rich and resonant unfolding of Wagner's score. Mostly this is due to the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which projects the sonorities of the music with a luxuriance you can almost feel. Leinsdorf, of course, is an old Wagnerian hand, and he draws forth the orchestral sound and surge of the music with a sure command.

But the quality of singing he is able to elicit is decidedly variable. It is no secret in musical circles that the original Elsa in this recording (and the Tanglewood performances) was to have been Leontyne Price, and to this day it's something of a mystery why she decided not to go through with it. In her place, Lucine Amara, who has never sung the part on the stage (not that Miss Price has, either), makes for a curious kind of Elsa. Strictly dramatically, she has just the right kind of voice, with a quality of childlike innocence about it. And yet it somehow lacks the musical weight to match the music. The result is that the part is sketched in very skillfully but seldom fully realized.

The rest of the cast varies from the authoritative Lohengrin of Konya and the magnificent King Henry of Hines to the shrill and unsteady Ortrud of Miss Gorr, who simply was not in good voice when the recording was made. Thanks to Leinsdorf's conducting the opera builds steadily to a musical and dramatic climax, and thanks to the restoration of the traditional cuts, this is a Lohengrin that holds the attention. But for all its merits, it leaves one with the feeling that it did not come out in the actuality quite the way that its planners intended.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N.Y.
D. 7,764

OCT 1 1966

'Lohengrin'

By TOM THOMAS

The biggest news in opera recordings this year has to be RCA Victor's monumental production of Wagner's Lohengrin, a five-disc set that claims a few "firsts" and, more important for me, a luxurious orchestra sound second to none.

This is the first Lohengrin recorded in its entirety, the work omitting not one note written into it by Wagner. For example, In fernem Land, sung by Lohengrin in Act 3, includes the music referred to as the Anhung, usually heard only at Bayreuth.

This is the first Wagnerian opera recorded in the Western Hemisphere, and the first time a major American orchestra has recorded an opera since Toscanini conducted the NBC Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

JAN 1 1967

THE COMPLETE "Lohengrin," released at the end of the summer by RCA Victor, should stand high on any list as the choice opera recording of the year (LM-6710, LSC-6710).

Wagner's "Lohengrin" gets a resplendent performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, and a cast which includes Lucine Amara, Sandor Konya, William Dooley and Rita Gorr.

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 252,084 SUN 339,533

OCT 9 1966

RCA Victor Album Of 'Arcana' Praised

By DONAL J. HANAHAN
Chicago Daily News Writer

FACED WITH the annual autumn flurry of releases, a record reviewer can only hope to lay down guidelines and to hit high spots. The notes that follow are to be translated flatly as "Buy" or "Don't Buy," detailed discussion not being possible.

In the former category, do not hesitate to put your money on the Chicago Symphony's new RCA Victor coupling of Varese's "Arcana" and Frank Martin's concerto for seven winds, timpani, percussion and orchestra (LM-2914). No more stylistically diverse pair is likely to be recorded this season.

Jean Martinon, in his element, pulls off the explosive Varese piece magnificently, and the cooly calculated Martin calls forth spotless performances from the orchestra's first-chair brigade.

IN A contemporary vein, too, there is much to admire in an RCA two-disc album, "New Misic for the Piano" (LM-7042), in which Robert Helps espouses works by 24 living composers, among them such varied workmen as Kent Kennan and Milton Babbitt, Morton Gould and George Perle.

All the pieces are collected in one published book, which adds to the record's practical value for pianists, though it also dictated the inclusion of several vapid efforts. On the whole, the four sides are well worth the serious listener's time.

Recommended listening in another pianistic universe is Raymond Lewenthal's entertaining excursion into Liszt opera transcriptions (LM-2895). There is a properly florid put-down of Bellini, "Reminiscences de Norma," as well as the giddy "Hexameron," to which the composer contributed sections along with Chopin, Czerny and others.

IN THE not-recommended file, sorry to say, goes RCA's new "Lohengrin" (LM-6710), though it is laudably uncut and enjoys a plush contribution from the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf.

The most successful stereo version yet of Bartok's chilling opera "Bluebeard's Castle" is London's OSA-1158. Christa Ludwig and her husband Walter Berry pass up the usual translations for convincing Hungarian. Istvan Kertesz conducts the Vienna Philharmonic.

Vladimir Ashkenazy, who should be the ideal Schumann pianist, misses the passionate sweep of the C Major Fantasia, but his latest London issue is nevertheless a must, if only for the "Symphonic Etudes," also included (CS-6471). The young Russian displays a poetry rare among current keyboard pounders, and he is technically an honest man.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

OCT 2 1966

Classical Records

Wagner: Lohengrin. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with Amara, Gorr, Konya, Dooley, Hines, Marsh, and Boston Pro Musica Chorus. Victor 6710.

Last summer, Leinsdorf gave over three Tanglewood programs to public performances of "Lohengrin," one act at a time, in preparation for this recording. The day after the last act, everyone trucked off to Boston's Symphony Hall, specially air-conditioned for the occasion, and the opera was recorded, complete. Every single note, which is something rarely heard these days, even at Bayreuth.

The total achievement has its great ups and its serious downs. The glory of the set is the distinct splendor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing a score that rarely receives so meticulous an orchestral reading. Leinsdorf moves the music with loving affection, but with no undue relaxation. The tempos move in a most welcome way. The restored passages in the first and last acts are strong and worth having. In the second act they only prolong painfully an unhappy business.

For the singing, which is after all the chief reason for opera, is highly uneven in the set. Konya is a glorious hero, his voice shining resplendently as any good Lohengrin's should. Beautiful in diction and in rhythm, he is a knight to believe in. Jerome Hines sounds imposing and at home as Henry the Fowler—who was the Fowlest?—even in a couple of roughish spots. Calvin Marsh is musical and alert as the Herald, though his voice is not precisely the weight to suit the music.

That is, alas, the sum total of merit in the singing. Lucine Amara is a replacement for Leontyne Price, who was first announced for the project. That the set is Price-less somewhat lowers its value. Miss Amara is dependable, bland, slightly girlish in sound, and lacks every bit of urgency and understanding that made the various Elsas of Lehmann, Rethberg, Traubel or Flagstad memorable. Miss Amara is dull.

Not so Rita Gorr. She is, bluntly, dreadful.

William Dooley is a fine lyric baritone who sounds completely beyond his depth, in temperament and in voice, as Telramund. If you want to know how these two should sound, you need only listen to the Ludwig-Fischer-Dieskau scenes on a rival set.

—Paul Hume.

World Journal Tribune
NEW YORK, NEW YORK
D. 900,000

SEP 25 1966

by Herbert Kupferberg

Visitors to the Tanglewood Music Festival last summer probably will remember the three-segment Lohengrin—an act a day—that was performed there by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Quite a few eyebrows were raised by this unusual proceeding, and the suggestion was made that the three performances might have been entitled respectively, "Low," Hen," and "Grin."

When, right after the Festival ended, the orchestra and singers repaired to Symphony Hall, Boston, to record the entire work for RCA Victor, the wise heads again nodded and said that the whole Tanglewood arrangement had merely been a rehearsal for a recording session.

This was stoutly denied by the Boston Symphony people, the RCA Victor folk and all others concerned. But whatever the intent, the fact remains that a Lohengrin recording did come out of the affair, and has now been released by Victor. The vocal participants include Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara as Elsa, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, and Jerome Hines as King Henry, with Leinsdorf, of course, conducting (RCA Victor LM/LSC-6710, five records).

I sat in on a couple of those Symphony Hall recording sessions, and well remember the meticulous care that went into them. To gain the effect of offstage brass flourishes and the like, players were carefully stationed in the empty corridors of the hall, with the conductor's cues relayed to them by closed circuit television. This was the first time a Wagnerian opera had been recorded complete in the United States—really complete, since even the customarily excised portions were restored—and no effort was spared to make it a memorable set.

And so, indeed, it has turned out to be. For even if it has its flaws—and it assuredly does—it represents a magnificently rich and resonant unfolding of Wagner's score. Mostly this is due to the presence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which projects the sonorities of the music with a luxuriance you can almost feel. Leinsdorf, of course, is an old Wagnerian hand, and he draws forth the orchestral sound and surge of the music with a sure command.

But the quality of singing he is able to elicit is decidedly variable. It is no secret in musical circles that the original Elsa in this recording (and the Tanglewood performances) was to have been Leontyne Price, and to this day it's something of a mystery why she decided not to go through with it. In her place, Lucine Amara, who has never sung the part on the stage (not that Miss Price has, either), makes for a curious kind of Elsa. Strictly dramatically, she has just the right kind of voice, with a quality of childlike innocence about it. And yet it somehow lacks the musical weight to match the music. The result is that the part is sketched in very skillfully but seldom fully realized.

The rest of the cast varies from the authoritative Lohengrin of Konya and the magnificent King Henry of Hines to the shrill and unsteady Ortrud of Miss Gorr, who simply was not in good voice when the recording was made. Thanks to Leinsdorf's conducting the opera builds steadily to a musical and dramatic climax, and thanks to the restoration of the traditional cuts, this is a Lohengrin that holds the attention. But for all its merits, it leaves one with the feeling that it did not come out in the actuality quite the way that its planners intended.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 335,705 SUN. 392,378

JAN 1 1967

Classical Records

RECORDING COMPANIES seem to be celebrating some kind of a Wagner year, parading their conductors into the lists with appropriate fanfare: On our side of the water Victor put out a recent issue of "Lohengrin"—the first complete one—under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf and the magnificent Boston Symphony. Overseas there is promise of release this month of a new "Tristan and Isolde" by Deutsche-Grammophon, the first new recording in some six years or more. At hand is LONDON (OSA-1509, stereo; A-4509, monaural), a "Die Walkuere" under the direction of Georg Solti with the Vienna Philharmonic; it is a five-disc boxed set of distinction.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

OCT 9 1966

Less successful, though even more ambitious, is RCA Victor's complete—really complete!—"Lohengrin" (LM/LSC-6710). Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a hyper-symphonic performance that features singers either miscast or recorded on an off-day. An exception is the light-voiced, occasionally lachrymose Lohengrin of Sandor Konya, which, by current standards is one of the best. But how, on so costly and overpublicized a venture, does one account for the negative and unidiomatic Elsa (Lucine Amara), the strained and pale Telramund (William Dooley), the strident Ortrud (Rita Gorr) and the tired King Henry (Jerome Hines)? The orchestra sounds marvelous, and Leinsdorf refuses to be discouraged by his singers. The listener, however, may react differently.

SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 1,088,000

NOV 1966

SPOTLIGHT

With his mighty Lohengrin, Wagner went past the point of romantic grand opera into the realm of mystic music drama; the epic is heard in a stunning new RCA Victor recording. Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony and soloists, including Sándor Kónya and Lucine Amara.

Lohengrin of Konya and the magnificent King Henry of Hines to the shrill and unsteady Ortrud of Miss Gorr, who simply was not in good voice when the recording was made. Thanks to Leinsdorf's conducting the opera builds steadily to a musical and dramatic climax, and thanks to the restoration of the traditional cuts, this is a Lohengrin that holds the attention. But for all its merits, it leaves one with the feeling that it did not come out in the actuality quite the way that its planners intended.

The album called "Bruno Walter's Wagner" (M2S 743, two records). These are recordings of such works as the Flying Dutchman, Tannhaeuser, and Meistersinger Overtures, the Lohengrin Act I Prelude, and the Parsifal Prelude and Good Friday Spell. Included as a bonus, without additional charge, is a third record devoted to Walter's rehearsal of the Siegfried Idyll.

These have been released previously, but assembled like this they make for an attractive package. Walter's Wagner, like most of his other music, was suffused with a warmth and radiance that made even forbidding works seem friendly and intimate. Certainly this quality is richly evident here.

173

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

OCT 29 1966

RC[illegible] in [illegible] (LM-6710 [illegible]), built around the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. These men stand at the heart of the performance. The wind playing, above all, is beautiful; and Leinsdorf's phrasing has strong musicality. One might—a matter of personal reaction—find some of the tempi overly deliberate, but of the authority and good taste behind them there can be no question. Balance between voices and orchestra—except for the pea-soup sonorities surrounding Telramund (was this by design?)—comes off generally well; and the thrilling effect of the instruments on stage, as in the courtyard trumpet calls and the gathering of the Brabantian nobles, works largely in favor of the album.

MATCHING the orchestra in competence and spirit is the Boston Chorus Pro Musica (Alfred Nash Patterson, director). Yet these are only the background elements of opera; one would expect the solo artists to excel. Unfortunately, only Sándor Kónya in the name part and Calvin Marsh as the Herald hold their own. The real star of the recording is the immensely gifted English horn player of the Boston Symphony. Running up the procession, rather limply, is the remainder of the cast: Rita Gorr, Ortrud; William Dooley, Telramund; Jerome Hines, King Henry; Lucine Amara, Elsa.

Miss Gorr creates such mood in her softer passages that the harshness of tone marring the climaxes is doubly regrettable. Moreover, her German enunciation is not always clear; and the scornful outcry of "Gott!" in the night scene with Telramund—the revelation of Ortrud's hatred, as a crypto-pagan, of everything bound to Christianity—is poorly sung, the appoggiatura to the main note coming with less than the bite required.

With all her technical shortcomings—and there are others beyond those just cited—Miss Gorr at least projects the part with conviction . . . an asset not to be found throughout the cast. Jerome Hines, vocally unwieldy and dramatically depersonalized, sings the music of the King in oratorio style. William Dooley has neither the stamina nor the grand line for Telramund. Although he does convey a certain intensity during the scene before the cathedral, his singing ultimately lacks class and power. Miss Amara sounds persuasive in passing; but in general hers is a small-scale Elsa, equating bland vocal timbre with innocence.

Mr. Kónya sings very well, excelling in the more piano pages such as Lohengrin's thanks to the swan and the lovely, lyrical start of the bridal duet. Occasionally he whines (the Italians have a word for this, piagnucolare), the heroic and mystical implications of the role escape

(Continued on page 74)

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
CATHOLIC STANDARD AND TIMES
W. 111,225

OCT 28 1966

MUSIC ON A PLATTER

Boston Symphony Stars In Complete 'Lohengrin'

Wagner: Lohengrin (complete, in German. Soloists, Boston Chorus Pro Musica, Boston Symphony Orch., Erich Leinsdorf, cond. Five records. RCA Victor LSC/LM 6710.

Lohengrin	Sandor Konya (t)
Elsa of Brabant	Lucine Amara (s)
Ortrud	Rita Gorr (ms)
Frederick of Telramund	William Dooley (bt)
King Henry	Jerome Hines (bs)
The Herald	Calvin Marsh (bt)

In televisionese, this absolutely complete set would probably be known as a "spin-off" from the 1965 Berkshire Festival performance at Tanglewood, and it shares the orchestral splendors—and vocal handicaps—of that flawed but memorable production. The Boston Symphony and RCA Victor's sound engineers must share star billing in this album. The orchestra, led with meticulous devotion by Erich Leinsdorf, plays magnificently throughout and has been recorded with almost frightening impact in lifelike Dynagroove stereo.

Next in line for plaudits is Sandor Konya, whose fervor and musicianship make his portrayal of the title role outstanding. The Hungarian tenor stresses the lyric rather than the heroic in his interpretation, but he can fire a stirring volley of sound when the occasion demands. Despite moments of gurgly production, his is far and away the outstanding singing in the album.

His male associates, Jerome Hines (King Henry), William Dooley (Frederick of Telramund) and Calvin Marsh (the Herald), are all better than fair, although I can't say that I like the piercing sound of Dooley's baritone. However, we're not suppose to like Frederick of Telramund, one of opera's most outright Bad Guys, so there's no harm done.

The ladies, on the other hand, do a great deal of harm. Lucine Amara is more to be pitied than censured in the role of Elsa. Her voice sounds thin, shrill and terribly insignificant throughout, but the fault lies not with her so much as with whoever chose her to replace Leontyne Price, originally scheduled to sing the role. Miss Amara is an intelligent, sensitive artist, but the Lord never gave her the vocal tools to sing Elsa.

I hope the voice of Rita Gorr, a distinguished mezzo-soprano with all the credentials for a great Ortrud, is not permanently so frayed as it sounds in this recording. Poor Ortrud has good reason to be distraught in the final scene, but the toneless shrieks emitted by Mme. Gorr leave the listener with an aching throat and a feeling of sadness over the evident deterioration of a once-great voice. One of the candid photographs in the splendid brochure shows Mme. Gorr smiling and looking "gratified." She could not have been—as she seems to be—listening to playbacks of herself at the time.

The Boston Chorus Pro Musica affords the principals admirable support. The once-ubiquitous Bridal Chorus never sounded better—or less bad.

"Lohengrin" is for me a long, tedious opera, illuminated only infrequently by interesting music—the shimmering, mystical Prelude to Act I and the shopworn but still jubilant one to Act III; most of Lohengrin's solo music and less of Elsa's; the Bridal Chamber Scene, and a few soaring choral passages. The fact that Leinsdorf, Konya, the orchestra and chorus, and the sound engineers managed to keep me interested for the better part of this album's nearly four hours' running time is a tribute to their skill and dedication.

A word about the competition. Angel has in its catalog a virtually complete stereo "Lohengrin" (S-3641) that literally bristles with heavy vocal guns—Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Gruemmer, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Christa Ludwig (a superb Ortrud) and Gottlob Frick—but suffers from the plodding direction of Rudolf Kempe and sonics that seem thick and gummy compared to RCA Victor's. And a London monaural set (4502), recorded at an actual Bayreuth production, boasts the radiant Elsa of Eleanor Steber and the sensitive conducting of Joseph Keilberth. Its sound, however, was only tolerable in 1953, the year of its birth, and has certainly not improved with age. On balance, and despite its unattractive Elsa and Ortrud, the new Leinsdorf-led set is clearly preferable.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 364,362 SUN. 551,968

AUG 14 1966

Classical Records

The Complete, Impressive 'Lohengrin'

By GERALD KLOSS, of The Journal Staff

A MAGNIFICENT five record Victor album of Wagner's "Lohengrin" (LM 6710), with the Boston symphony orchestra and the Boston Chorus Pro Musica conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, establishes a number of impressive "firsts."

It is the first truly complete recording of the opera ever made, removing cuts from the original score that are made even in productions at Bayreuth. It also is the first complete Wagner opera ever recorded in the western hemisphere, and the first time a major American orchestra has recorded a complete opera since the days of Toscanini and the NBC symphony. It is probably the costliest operatic album ever made, with the 104 member orchestra augmented by 25 other players and a chorus of 180. Two-thirds of the first floor seats in Boston's Symphony hall were removed to accommodate these forces for the six day recording session.

So much for statistics. The music is what counts, and in this three and one-half hour recording it is the orchestral and choral sound that makes the greatest impression. There is sufficient weight and mass in both ensembles to achieve the Wagnerian surge without straining, and Leinsdorf also is meticulous in delineating the various musical strands in Wagner's tapestry. A shade too meticulous at times, perhaps, but the occasional feeling of pedantry is forgiveable, considering the grandeur of the total effect.

Tenor Sandor Konya takes the title role, one which he has sung more than 200 times in opera stages over the world, and soprano Lucine Amara portrays his beloved, if too inquisitive, bride. Baritone William Dooley portrays Frederick of Telramund and mezzo Rita Gorr his vengeful wife, Ortrud. Basso Jerome Hines and baritone Calvin Marsh take the roles of Henry the Fowler and the king's herald, respectively.

In general, the soloists are not as impressive as either the orchestra or the chorus. Konya is a more than adequate Lohengrin, but Miss Amara's Elsa seems a bit too lightweight for the role. The others offer good performances, but this side of memorable. The album as a whole is a splendid one, however, and the recorded sound is all that Wagner could have wished—the original production of "Lohengrin," conducted by Franz Liszt at Weimar in 1850, had an orchestra of only 38 players and a chorus of fewer than 30 singers!

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

DUNKIRK GRAPE BELT
Wednesday, October 5, 1966

Wagner F[illegible]

By JOAN CROSBY
Newspaper Enterprise Assn.

NEW YORK — (NEA) —It may take three hours, 35 minutes and 32 seconds to hear, and it may cost $23.99 for the set ($28.99 if you have stereo), but it's the recording event of the year.

It's RCA-Victor's complete, superlative recording of Wagner's Lohengrin, a performance that will enchant even non-Wagnerians. Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, William Dooley, Rita Gorr and Jerome Hines are in excellent voice and the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, is suitably sonorous.

The album is notable in that it is the first opera recorded in the United States

Barber's "Antony"

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 442,500

NOV. 5 1966

CONCERT RECORDS
Made in U.S.A.

THE "Lohengrin" recently issued by Victor has, among its other distinctions, that of being the first commercial recording of a grand opera to be made in this country in eight years. Labor costs being what they are today, such projects have become increasingly rare (a labor dispute prevented the recording of the Metropolitan Opera's opening attraction this season, Samuel Barber's "Antony and Cleopatra," even though a proposal was made that it be taped pending an agreement), and, for that matter, only Victor, among American firms, has bothered of late to produce operatic recordings anywhere; the other complete opera recordings we get are either produced abroad by foreign companies or taken down by them from radio or stage presentations. "Lohengrin" was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf; the Boston Chorus Pro Musica; and principals associated with the Metropolitan Opera—Sándor Kónya in the title role, Lucine Amara as Elsa, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, William Dooley as Frederick, Jerome Hines as King Henry, and Calvin Marsh as the King's herald.

A product of Wagner's early maturity, "Lohengrin" is one of his most buoyant operas, even if it does have a tragic ending. (This really depends on who it is you're rooting for, though; Elsa drops dead, true enough, when she loses her man, but the man, Lohengrin, eases off in a dove-powered craft to rejoin his dedicated fellow-knights at Monsalvat.) The music is delightful in its vigor and in its rich use of melody and harmony. As music possessing a youthful excitement yet controlled by the hand of a master, it is, in a way, the equivalent in Wagner's career of "La Traviata" in Verdi's. It is also, if we are to accept the late Wieland Wagner's interpretation of his grandfather's works as being, at least in part, exalted interpretations of his personal life, one of the most engaging examples of this elevated autobiography. Like all Wagnerian heroines, from the moon-struck Senta, of "The Flying Dutchman," to the enigmatic, sullied, but still true-blue Kundry, of "Parsifal," Elsa is the dream girl. And Lohengrin, the deliverer and husband who must leave her when his near-godlike identity is revealed through her quaintly feminine insistence, is Wagner himself, with his head in the clouds. (After all, Lohengrin is, as he confides when the secret is finally forced out of him, the son of Parsifal—about as good a name as any son could drop.)

The orchestral performance is excellent throughout—as fine an example of Mr. Leinsdorf's craftsmanship as I have heard—and the choral singing, so important in "Lohengrin," is lovely. Mr. Kónya's creamy tenor is well suited to Lohengrin's music, and he employs it artfully except for the occasional hint of a sob. Miss Amara's Elsa complements Mr. Kónya's hero very well; she floats her soprano accurately and, at times, exquisitely. Mr. Dooley's baritone and Mr. Hines's bass are impressively used—the latter especially—and Mr. Marsh's baritone does justice to the part of the herald. Only Miss Gorr's Ortrud mars the total effect; in this character's more emotional scenes—most notably when she is confronting Elsa—Miss Gorr's mezzo-soprano is inclined to flat and become downright unpleasant through forcing. The opera, by the way, occupies five records.

LAKE CHARLES, LA.
LAKE CHARLES AMERICAN PRESS
D. 30,000 SUN. 30,500
OCT 8 1966

RECOMMENDED CLASSICS

Boston-made 'Lohengrin' sumptuous opera album

WAGNER: LOHENGRIN — Boston Symphony Orchestra; Boston Chorus Pro Musica; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor;
AND
Lohengrin ..... Sandor Konya
Elsa ..... Lucine Amara
Frederick ..... William Dooley
Ortrud ..... Rita Gorr
King Henry ..... Jerome Hines
Herald ..... Calvin Marsh
(RCA Victor, 5-12" records, stereo LSCV-6710; monaural LM-6710.)

This is probably the most costly opera recording ever made in the United States. It may also be the best.

This project, brought to fruition by Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Mohr of the RCA Victor staff, accounts for a number of other firsts.

It was the first full-length opera recording made in the United States since the NBC-Toscanini days. It was the first truly complete "Lohengrin" ever recorded. It is the first opera recording to use one of the major American orchestras.

The project began several years ago as an idea, and about a year and a half ago was put into actual production. In the summer of 1965, the opera was staged in concert form at the Tanglewood Musical Festival, one act at a time.

Then, the last week in August, 1965, the musical forces moved into Symphony Hall at Boston to do the actual recording.

The orchestra was increased from 104 to 120 players (at $50.63 each for two hours of recording). The Boston Chorus Pro Musica was upped from 120 to 180 voices ($65 each for the week).

The singers filled the stage, so the orchestra was moved to the floor of the hall. Four different conductors were needed to synchronize the massed performers. Some 14 portable air conditioners ($7,000 each) were used to cut the heat and to control the moisture in the air.

The result of all this preparation and this veritable army of performers is a joy to hear.

The orchestral work is simply tremendous. It is doubtful if there ever was an orchestral recording to top this one in the fullness, richness and clarity of sound. In fact, the Boston orchestra is far and away the outstanding star of the program.

The cast is an excellent one, and the vocal performances are high grade. Tenor Sandor Konya here sings his 200nd performance of the title role. He must be the world champion, Lohengrin, and his singing here is outstanding.

Konya has all of the qualities necessary for the role — tenderness, beauty of tone, and a spaciousness of voice that can bring out the heroic when it is called for.

Rita Gorr, the big-voiced French mezzo, makes a fine, dark - voiced Ortrud, bristling with menace and evil machinations.

William Dooley, an American baritone new to these ears, is convincing in the heavyweight role of Frederick of Telramund.

Two veterans of the Metropolitan Opera, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh, sing the roles of King Henry the Fowler and the Herald. They are in excellent form.

Lucine Amara sings the feminine lead role as Elsa, and about her performance we have reservations, being accustomed to a more robust performance of the role.

Leontyne Price had been announced for the role, but Miss Amara replaced her. Miss Amara's voice sounds a bit lightweight, but she uses it with intelligence, and while it is secure and beautiful, she does not always evoke the kind of dramatic conflicts that one expects from Elsa.

The whole performance carries very much the mark of Conductor Erich Leinsdorf. He conducts with brisk tempos, keeping the action going and the interest high.

A special note is due the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, which had some of the most important chorus of all. The chorus passages were expertly sung, and they are well recorded.

In fact, the reproduction of both the orchestral and choral work is one of the strong points of the set.

A handsome booklet is enclosed, with notes and libretto, and the album is nicely packaged, decorated with a color portrait of Konya in his costume as Lohengrin.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
AUG 1966

Top to bottom: Lucine Amara and Sandor Konya recording a duet; an aide prepares to cue two BSO trumpeters (all unidentified) for a passage to be recorded offstage; playback—left to right: the principals, Jack Pfeiffer (standing, rear) and Richard Mohr of RCA Victor, and Erich Leinsdorf with his assistant, Andrew Raeburn (all at Symphony Hall, Boston)

By PHILIP L. MILLER

LEINSDORF'S first opera recording with the Boston Symphony—as it happens, this is also the first complete Wagnerian opera recording ever made on this side of the Atlantic—has had the benefit of long and thorough preparation. Richard Mohr, the producer, gives us the details in the accompanying brochure. Not the least important prefatory item was the fact of public performance just before the recording was made. Each of the three acts was presented in concert form last summer at Tanglewood (on August 20, 21, and 22). The entire production was then transported to Boston, where the recording sessions took place.

For the first time on records and, surely, in the experience of most operagoers, "Lohengrin" is presented herewith in absolute completeness. Back in the thirties attention was called to the fact that Wagner's original composition of Lohengrin's Narrative, in the last act, con-

WAGNER: "Lohengrin"; Sandor Konya, tenor (Lohengrin); Lucine Amara, soprano (Elsa); William Dooley, baritone (Telramund); Rita Gorr, mezzo-soprano (Ortrud); Jerome Hines, bass (King Henry); Calvin Marsh, baritone (Herald); William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Brabantian Nobles); Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages); others: augmented Boston Chorus Pro Musica (Alfred Nash Patterson, director); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-6710, ten sides, $23.95, or Stereo LSC-6710, $28.95.

Kempe, et al ..... Angel ®3641

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 146,624 SUN. 215,445
AUG 14 1966

RCA 'Lohengrin' Important Album

The most important opera release of the month is RCA's "Lohengrin," recorded last August in Symphony Hall, Boston, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. This is the first complete operatic recording the Boston Symphony has ever made, the first American recording of a Wagnerian opera, and the first absolutely complete "Lohengrin" ever put on records.

This album's strongest points are the marvelous playing of the Boston Symphony, clear, brilliant and powerful, the generally accomplished reading of Leinsdorf, though he tends to play down the drama here and there when a little more urgency and drive would have made a difference, and the sterling Lohengrin of Sandor Konya, without a doubt the finest Lohengrin of the day. And RCA's recording is superb.

HOWEVER, there are some major shortcomings. Leontyne Price had been Leinsdorf's original choice to sing Elsa, but an illness prevented her from learning the role in time for the public performance at Tanglewood and the recording. Lucine Amara, of the Metropolitan Opera, took her place. Amara's Elsa is listenable, and it may perhaps be what Leinsdorf wanted, a rather pallid, unemotional Elsa. Still, it's all extremely uninvolved. She never gives you an outpouring of warmth, just a matter-of-fact, barely adequate interpretation that never satisfies.

As for the Ortrud, Rita Gorr is one of the great personalities in the world of opera, but at the time of the recording (and of the public performances, as those who heard the tapes over KMEO will remember) her voice was in sad shape. She is continually a shade sharp, and every so often lets out a wild shriek that is hardly singing. Most of her singing is exciting, but excitement at the expense of pitch is hardly pleasurable.

WILLIAM DOOLEY as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry are both good, though neither is as idiomatic as German singers would have been. Konya, as previously mentioned, steals the show. His is one of the most beautiful tenor voices before the public today, as those present at his recital at Grady Gammage Auditorium last April will testify. His Lohengrin is well thought out, musical, sung with rich and sensuous tone, and, outside of one or two moments when Konya lapses into Italianate crooning, never vulgar. Otherwise, this is the finest Lohengrin on records, and easily the best since Melchior's better days, though Melchior offered a more heroic portrait.

Where then does this leave the prospective purchaser? If he requires brilliant recording and orchestral playing over everything else, he will choose RCA. But as a total experience, I would recommend the Angel set, with Kempe conducting a fine cast including Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Grummer, Christa Ludwig, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Gottlob Frick. These are singers with Wagner in their bones, Thomas is a fine Lohengrin, though not quite a Konya, and Grummer is a lovely voice. The recording is not as resplendent as RCA, but except for the extension of Lohengrin's Narrative, just as complete.

Both sets take five LP's, and will set you back close to $29 for the stereo version, so it might be best to sample the final side, which contains the Narrative and the Final Scene, and perhaps Side Eight with the Act III Prelude and the Bridal Chorus, before making up your own mind. This department would choose Angel as the superior accomplishment, though feeling a tinge of sadness at losing Konya's Lohengrin.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,720
OCT 1 1966

'Lohengrin'

By TOM THOMAS

The biggest news in opera recordings this year has to be RCA Victor's monumental production of Wagner's Lohengrin, a five-disc set that claims a few "firsts" and, more important for me, a luxurious orchestra sound second to none.

This is the first Lohengrin recorded in its entirety, the work omitting not one note written into it by Wagner. For example, In fernem Land, sung by Lohengrin in Act 3, includes the music referred to as the Anhung, usually heard only at Bayreuth.

This is the first Wagnerian opera recorded in the Western Hemisphere, and the first time a major American orchestra has recorded an opera since Toscanini conducted the NBC Symphony.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
SEPT 1966

174

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ WAGNER: Lohengrin. Sándor Kónya (tenor), Lohengrin; Jerome Hines (bass), King Henry; William Dooley (baritone), Telramund; Lucine Amara (soprano), Elsa; Rita Gorr (mezzo-soprano), Ortrud; Calvin Marsh (baritone), Herald. Chorus Pro Musica, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA Victor LSC 6710 five discs $28.95, LM 6710* $23.95.

Performance: Good, with reservations
Recording: Very good
Stereo Quality: Very good

Of all of Richard Wagner's operas, Lohengrin can least afford the exaggeratedly declamatory kind of singing that for many years passed for the so-called "Wagnerian style." Wagner himself believed in no such thing; in specific reference to Lohengrin he insisted (in a letter to Franz Liszt September 8, 1850) that "the singers need only to sing the notes, exactly according to their value in the given tempo, in order to achieve the right declamatory expression." To put this in the plainest possible terms, Wagner's vocal music, like all vocal music, must be sung and not, to use W. H. Henderson's phrase, "cackled in the Bayreuth staccato."

Mindful of his grandfather's views when preparing a new production of Lohengrin for Bayreuth in 1958, Wieland Wagner assigned the title role to Sándor Kónya, a lyric tenor who had, up to that time, never sung a Wagnerian part. Since then, Kónya has done Lohengrin more than two hundred times, and is generally recognized as its outstanding exponent. Now his eloquent interpretation has been preserved on records, and it is revealed here as a portrayal completely integrated in tone and action, singing and tonal modulations. From the tender "Nun sei bedankt, mein lieber Schwan" to the poignant phrases of the Farewell and in the contrasting moods in which the heroic side of the character is accentuated with conviction, Konya's Lohengrin ranks among the most successful total realizations available on records, and that alone is enough to justify acquisition of the set.

This is the first recording of a major opera made in the United States in at least seven years. Its production (undertaken in Boston during the summer of 1965, following a "live" performance at the Tanglewood Festival) was preceded by lengthy and thoughtful preparations. By and large, the casting may be considered appropriate to the magnitude of the task, but the final result—except for Kónya's very solid contribution—falls short of expectations. This is

SÁNDOR KONYA AS LOHENGRIN
A portrayal integrated in song and action

Lucine Amara's first encounter with Elsa, and under the circumstances her achievement is admirable: touchingly phrased, and sensitively interpreted, particularly in the Bridal Chamber scene. But her voice is too light for the role; the fragile impression conveyed is right for the character but frequently insufficient in weight for the music.

Both Jerome Hines and Rita Gorr are seasoned interpreters of their roles, but neither is heard in the best vocal form here. Both artists struggle with the upper reaches of their tessituras, and the shrill tone quality produced by Rita Gorr in her final scene is particularly trying. Still, both are artists of consequence, and their portrayals are redeemed by the weight of interpretive authority. Calvin Marsh does well by the Herald's music, and William Dooley brings forceful dramatic presence to the role of Telramund, though his vocal projection is tonally not pleasurable, particularly when pitted against the weight of the orchestra.

The engineers have allowed a great deal of prominence here to orchestral sound—at times to the disadvantage of the singers—but the textures and sonorities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are a distinct joy to hear. Leinsdorf's direction has his characteristic virtues of clarity and [illegible] tempos are brisk and, even should a shade hurried in portions of the Ortrud-Telramund scene and in the introduction to Act III, his propulsiveness can be a desirable approach in this long opera. Leinsdorf succeeds in keeping the proceedings from becoming dull, and where expressiveness, color, and power are called for, his leadership is never wanting. Special mention must be made of the exceptionally fine work of the Boston Pro Musica Chorus.

Comparison with the rival stereo set (Angel S 3641 with Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Grümmer, Christa Ludwig, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Rudolf Kempe conducting) reveals the distinct superiority of Konya's Lohengrin, although Jess Thomas, too, is a very fine interpreter. Both conductors are outstanding, and while my preference is for Leinsdorf, others may be drawn to Kempe's more relaxed view. RCA Victor has a slight edge in recorded sound, but in the other principal singers Angel rates higher. It would seem desirable, under the circumstances, for RCA Victor to make available a single disc of highlights containing the entire Bridal Chamber scene and most of Lohengrin's music in Act III.

It remains to be said that the RCA Victor set includes a passage for tenor and ensemble, immediately following the Gralserzählung, that is so seldom given in performance that it cannot even be found in the Schirmer score.

G. J.

The Charlotte Observer
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
D. 172,236 SUN. 196,616
SEP 18 1966

★ ★ ★

MUSIC-LOVERS who heard tenor Sandor Konya in his Community Concert recital in Charlotte will be interested in the RCA-Victor recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" with the Boston Symphony, directed by Erich Leinsdorf.

Here Konya can be heard in his finest hour. He's known around the world for his portrayal of Lohengrin, a role he has sung more than 200 times. He has the flowing, heroic, romantic phrasing Wagner intended in the part.

Rita Gorr is a fiery mezzo indeed as scheming Ortrud, with Jerome Hines as King Henry, Lucine Amara as gentle Elsa and baritone Calvin Marsh in the demanding role of the king's herald.

NEW REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 46,800
SEPT 24 1966

RECORDS

Listening to Wagner's Lohengrin after many years, I note with interest how much of the writing is still in the old operatic style Wagner was to leave behind, though there are also beginnings of his later declamatory style. But as music I find most of it boring. Leinsdorf conducts it effectively on RCA Victor LM- and LSC-6710; and in a context of superb playing by the Boston Symphony one hears excellent singing by Sandor Konya in the title role, moderately good singing by William Dooley as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry, but almost laughably inadequate singing by Lucine Amara as Elsa, and mostly bad singing by Rita Gorr that includes some downright screaming.

LAKE CHARLES, LA.
LAKE CHARLES AMERICAN PRESS
D. 30,000 SUN. 30,500
OCT 8 1966

RECOMMENDED CLASSICS

Boston-made 'Lohengrin' sumptuous opera album

WAGNER: LOHENGRIN — Boston Symphony Orchestra; Boston Chorus Pro Musica; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor;
AND
Lohengrin .....Sandor Konya
Elsa .....Lucine Amara
Frederick ....William Dooley
Ortrud .....Rita Gorr
King Henry ....Jerome Hines
Herald .....Calvin Marsh
(RCA Victor, 5-12" records, stereo LSCV-6710; monural LM-6710.)

This is probably the most costly opera recording ever made in the United States. It may also be the best.

This project, brought to fruition by Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Mohr, of the RCA Victor staff, accounts for a number of other firsts.

It was the first full-length opera recording made in the United States since the NBC-Toscanini days. It was the first truly complete "Lohengrin" ever recorded. It is the first opera recording to use one of the major American orchestras.

The project began several years ago as an idea, and about a year and a half ago was put into actual production. In the summer of 1965, the opera was staged in concert form at the Tanglewood Musical Festival, one act at a time.

Then, the last week in August, 1965, the musical forces moved into Symphony Hall at Boston to do the actual recording.

The orchestra was increased from 104 to 129 players (at $50.63 each for two hours of recording). The Boston Chorus Pro Musica was upped from 120 to 180 voices ($65 each for the week).

The singers filled the stage, so the orchestra was moved to the floor of the hall. Four different conductors were needed to synchronize the massed performers. Some 14 portable air conditioners ($7,000 each) were used to cut the heat and to control the moisture in the air.

The result of all this preparation and this veritable army of performers is a joy to hear.

The orchestral work is simply tremendous. It is doubtful if there ever was an orchestral recording to top this one in the fullness, richness and clarity of sound. In fact, the Boston orchestra is far and away the outstanding star of the program.

The cast is an excellent one, and the vocal performances are high grade. Tenor Sandor Konya here sings his 202nd performance of the title role. He must be the world champion, Lohengrin, and his singing here is outstanding.

Konya has all of the qualities necessary for the role — tenderness, beauty of tone, and a spaciousness of voice that can bring out the heroic when it is called for.

Rita Gorr, the big-voiced French mezzo, makes a fine, dark - voiced Ortrud, bristling with menace and evil machinations.

William Dooley, an American baritone new to these ears, is convincing in the heavyweight role of Frederick of Telramund.

Two veterans of the Metropolitan Opera, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh, sing the roles of King Henry the Fowler and the Herald. They are in excellent form.

Lucine Amara sings the feminine lead role as Elsa, and about her performance we have reservations, being accustomed to a more robust performance of the role.

Leontyne Price had been announced for the role, but Miss Amara replaced her. Miss Amara's voice sounds a bit lightweight, but she uses it with intelligence, and while it is secure and beautiful, she does not always evoke the kind of dramatic conflicts that one expects from Elsa.

The whole performance carries very much the mark of Conductor Erich Leinsdorf. He conducts with brisk tempos, keeping the action going and the interest high.

A special note is due the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, which had some of the most important choruses of all. The choral passages were expertly sung, and they are well recorded.

In fact, the reproduction of both the orchestral and choral work is one of the strong points of the set.

A handsome booklet is enclosed, with notes and libretto, and the album is nicely packaged, decorated with a color portrait of Konya in his costume as Lohengrin.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100
AUG 1966

By PHILIP L. MILLER

Top to bottom: Lucine Amara and Sandor Konya recording a duet; an aide prepares to cue two BSO trumpeters (all unidentified) for a passage to be recorded offstage; playback—left to right: the principals, Jack Pfeiffer (standing, rear) and Richard Mohr of RCA Victor, and Erich Leinsdorf with his assistant, Andrew Raeburn (all at Symphony Hall, Boston)

LEINSDORF'S first opera recording with the Boston Symphony—as it happens, this is also the first complete Wagnerian opera recording ever made on this side of the Atlantic—has had the benefit of long and thorough preparation. Richard Mohr, the producer, gives us the details in the accompanying brochure. Not the least important prefatory item was the fact of public performance just before the recording was made. Each of the three acts was presented in concert form last summer at Tanglewood (on August 20, 21, and 22). The entire production was then transported to Boston, where the recording sessions took place.

For the first time on records and, surely, in the experience of most operagoers, "Lohengrin" is presented herewith in absolute completeness. Back in the thirties attention was called to the fact that Wagner's original composition of Lohengrin's Narrative, in the last act, con-

WAGNER: "Lohengrin"; Sandor Konya, tenor (Lohengrin); Lucine Amara, soprano (Elsa); William Dooley, baritone (Telramund); Rita Gorr, mezzo-soprano (Ortrud); Jerome Hines, bass (King Henry); Calvin Marsh, baritone (Herald); William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Brabantian Nobles); Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages); others: augmented Boston Chorus Pro Musica (Alfred Nash Patterson, director); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-6710, ten sides, $23.95, or Stereo LSC-6710, $28.95.

Kempe, et al.....Angel ⓢ3641

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 146,624 SUN. 215,445
AUG 14 1966

RCA 'Lohengrin' Important Album

The most important opera release of the month is RCA's "Lohengrin," recorded last August in Symphony Hall, Boston, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. This is the first complete operatic recording the Boston Symphony has ever made, the first American recording of a Wagnerian opera, and the first absolutely complete "Lohengrin" ever put on records.

This album's strongest points are the marvelous playing of the Boston Symphony, clear, brilliant and powerful, the generally accomplished reading of Leinsdorf, though he tends to play down the drama here and there when a little more urgency and drive would have made a difference, and the sterling Lohengrin of Sandor Konya, without a doubt the finest Lohengrin of the day. And RCA's recording is superb.

HOWEVER, there are some major shortcomings. Leontyne Price had been Leinsdorf's original choice to sing Elsa, but an illness prevented her from learning the role in time for the public performance at Tanglewood and the recording. Lucine Amara, of the Metropolitan Opera, took her place. Amara's Elsa is listenable, and it may perhaps be what Leinsdorf wanted, a rather pallid, unemotional Elsa. Still, it's all extremely uninvolved. She never gives you an outpouring of warmth, just a matter-of-fact, barely adequate interpretation that never satisfies.

As for the Ortrud, Rita Gorr is one of the great personalities in the world of opera, but at the time of the recording (and of the public performances, as those who heard the tapes over KMEO will remember) her voice was in sad shape. She is continually a shade sharp, and every so often lets out a wild shriek that is hardly singing. Most of her singing is exciting, but excitement at the expense of pitch is hardly pleasurable.

WILLIAM DOOLEY as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry are both good, though neither is as idiomatic as German singers would have been. Konya, as previously mentioned, steals the show. His is one of the most beautiful tenor voices before the public today, as those present at his recital at Grady Gammage Auditorium last April will testify. His Lohengrin is well thought out, musical, sung with rich and sensuous tone, and, outside of one or two moments when Konya lapses into Italianate crooning, never vulgar. Otherwise, this is the finest Lahengrin on records, and easily the best since Melchior's better days, though Melchior offered a more heroic portrait.

Where then does this leave the prospective purchaser? If he requires brilliant recording and orchestral playing over everything else, he will choose RCA. But as a total experience, I would recommend the Angel set, with Kempe conducting a fine cast including Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Grummer, Christa Ludwig, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Gottlob Frick. These are singers with Wagner in their bones. Thomas is a fine Lohengrin, though not quite a Konya, and Grummer is a lovely voice. The recording is not as resplendent as RCA, but except for the extension of Lohengrin's Narrative, just as complete.

Both sets take five LP's, and will set you back close to $29 for the stereo version, so it might be best to sample the final side, which contains the Narrative and the Final Scene, and perhaps Side Eight with the Act III Prelude and the Bridal Chorus, before making up your own mind. This department would choose Angel as the superior accomplishment, though feeling a tinge of sadness at losing Konya's Lohengrin.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 41,720
OCT 1 1966

'Lohengrin'

By TOM THOMAS

The biggest news in opera recordings this year has to be RCA Victor's monumental production of Wagner's Lohengrin, a five-disc set that claims a few "firsts" and, more important for me, a luxurious orchestra sound second to none.

This is the first Lohengrin recorded in its entirety, the work omitting not one note written into it by Wagner. For example, In fernem Land, sung by Lohengrin in Act 3, includes the music referred to as the Anhung, usually heard only at Bayreuth.

This is the first Wagnerian opera recorded in the Western Hemisphere, and the first time a major American orchestra has recorded an opera since Toscanini conducted the NBC Symphony.

174

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400
SEPT 1966

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

Ⓢ Ⓜ WAGNER: Lohengrin. Sándor Kónya (tenor), Lohengrin; Jerome Hines (bass), King Henry; William Dooley (baritone), Telramund; Lucine Amara (soprano), Elsa; Rita Gorr (mezzo-soprano), Ortrud; Calvin Marsh (baritone), Herald. Chorus Pro Musica, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 6710 five discs $28.95, LM 6710* $23.95.

Performance: Good, with reservations
Recording: Very good
Stereo Quality: Very good

Of all of Richard Wagner's operas, Lohengrin can least afford the exaggeratedly declamatory kind of singing that for many years passed for the so-called "Wagnerian style," Wagner himself believed in no such thing; in specific reference to Lohengrin he insisted (in a letter to Franz Liszt September 8, 1850) that "the singers need only to sing the notes, exactly according to their value in the given tempo, in order to achieve the right declamatory expression." To put this in the plainest possible terms, Wagner's vocal music, like all vocal music, must be sung and not, to use W. H. Henderson's phrase, "cackled in the Bayreuth staccato."

Mindful of his grandfather's views when preparing a new production of Lohengrin for Bayreuth in 1958, Wieland Wagner assigned the title role to Sándor Kónya, a lyric tenor who had, up to that time, never sung a Wagnerian part. Since then, Kónya has done Lohengrin more than two hundred times, and is generally recognized as its outstanding exponent. Now his eloquent interpretation has been preserved on records, and it is revealed here as a portrayal completely integrated in song and action, through of phrasings ranging from legato singing and tonal modulations. From the tender "Nun sei bedankt, mein lieber Schwan" to the poignant phrases of the Farewell and in the contrasting moods in which the heroic side of the character is accentuated with conviction, Konya's Lohengrin ranks among the most successful total realizations available on records, and that alone is enough to justify acquisition of the set.

This is the first recording of a major opera made in the United States in at least seven years. Its production (undertaken in Boston during the summer of 1965, following a "live" performance at the Tanglewood Festival) was preceded by lengthy and thoughtful preparations. By and large, the casting may be considered appropriate to the magnitude of the task, but the final result—except for Kónya's very solid contribution—falls short of expectations. This is

SÁNDOR KONYA AS LOHENGRIN
A portrayal integrated in song and action

Lucine Amara's first encounter with Elsa, and under the circumstances her achievement is admirable: touchingly phrased, and sensitively interpreted, particularly in the Bridal Chamber scene. But her voice is too light for the role; the fragile impression conveyed is right for the character but frequently insufficient in weight for the music.

Both Jerome Hines and Rita Gorr are seasoned interpreters of their roles, but neither is heard in the best vocal form here. Both artists struggle with the upper reaches of their tessituras; and the shrill tone quality produced by Rita Gorr in her final scene is particularly trying. Still, both are artists of consequence, and their portrayals are redeemed by the weight of interpretive authority. Calvin Marsh does well by the Herald's music, and William Dooley brings forceful dramatic presence to the role of Telramund, though his vocal projection is tonally not pleasurable, particularly when pitted against the weight of the orchestra.

The engineers have allowed a great deal of prominence here to orchestral sound—at times to the disadvantage of the singers—but the textures and sonorities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are a distinct joy to hear. Leinsdorf's direction has his characteristic virtues of clarity and precision. His tempos are brisk and even sound a shade hurried in portions of the Ortrud-Telramund scene and in the introduction to Act III. But propulsiveness can be a desirable approach in this long opera. Leinsdorf succeeds in keeping the proceedings from becoming dull, and where expressiveness, color, or power are called for, his leadership is never wanting. Special mention must be made of the exceptionally fine work of the Boston Pro Musica Chorus.

Comparison with the rival stereo set (Angel S 3641 with Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Grümmer, Christa Ludwig, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Rudolf Kempe conducting) reveals the distinct superiority of Kónya's Lohengrin, although Jess Thomas, too, is a very fine interpreter. Both conductors are outstanding, and while my preference is for Leinsdorf, others may be drawn to Kempe's more relaxed view. RCA Victor has a slight edge in recorded sound, but in the other principal singers Angel rates higher. It would seem desirable, under the circumstances, for RCA Victor to make available a single disc of highlights containing the entire Bridal Chamber scene and most of Lohengrin's music in Act III.

It remains to be said that the RCA Victor set includes a passage for tenor and ensemble, immediately following the Gralserzählung, that is so seldom given in performance that it cannot even be found in the Schirmer score. G. J.

The Charlotte Observer
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
D. 172,236 SUN. 196,616
SEP 18 1966

★ ★ ★

MUSIC-LOVERS who heard tenor Sandor Konya in his Community Concert recital in Charlotte will be interested in the RCA-Victor recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" with the Boston Symphony, directed by Erich Leinsdorf.

Here Konya can be heard in his finest hour. He's known around the world for his portrayal of Lohengrin, a role he has sung more than 200 times. He has the flowing, heroic, romantic phrasing Wagner intended in the part.

Rita Gorr is a fiery mezzo indeed as scheming Ortrud, with Jerome Hines as King Henry, Lucine Amara as gentle Elsa and baritone Calvin Marsh in the demanding role of the king's herald.

NEW REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 46,800
SEPT 24 1966

RECORDS

Listening to Wagner's Lohengrin after many years, I note with interest how much of the writing is still in the old operatic style Wagner was to leave behind, though there are also beginnings of his later declamatory style. But as music I find most of it boring. Leinsdorf conducts it effectively on RCA Victor LM- and LSC-6710; and in a context of superb playing by the Boston Symphony one hears excellent singing by Sandor Konya in the title role, moderately good singing by William Dooley as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry, but almost laughably inadequate singing by Lucine Amara as Elsa, and mostly bad singing by Rita Gorr that includes some downright screaming.

175

REPORTER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
E. O. WEEK 170,200

SEPT 8 1966

Opera Notes

ROLAND GELATT

ALONG with football and politics, the autumn season traditionally brings a flood of new opera recordings. Three early arrivals are Lohengrin, Nabucco, and Cav. & Pag.

First attention goes to Lohengrin (RCA Victor 6710; five discs, mono or stereo) in deference to the well-meaning largess that brought this recording into being. Nothing was stinted in its production. Rather than go to Europe, where union rates are lower and working conditions more permissive, RCA elected to record the opera in America with the most extravagant "pit orchestra" imaginable—the Boston Symphony at full strength, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The work was rehearsed to a fare-thee-well and recorded painstakingly over twelve three-hour sessions. Tons of helpful paraphernalia were brought in: closed-circuit television to relay the conductor's beat to the stage musicians; portable air-conditioning units to immunize Boston's Symphony Hall from an August heat wave; extra tape machines to forestall interruptions. All told, about $180,000 was spent from start to finish, which makes this Lohengrin far and away the most costly opera recording in history. That is, alas, its chief distinction. As an artistic recreation, the production is no great shakes.

Admittedly, an uncut Lohengrin has plenty of built-in hurdles to clear—and this recording is complete to the last note, even including material ordinarily omitted at Bayreuth. The work cuts a poor figure next to Der Ring, Tristan, and Meistersinger. It is an old-fashioned opera consisting of recitatives, arias, duets, and choruses strung along one after another. Among them we encounter some marvelous tunes (millions of brides have not appeared to the strains of the Wedding Chorus for nothing), but we also encounter some interminably tedious patches, and nowhere do we find that engrossing symphonic development of motives which Wagner achieved a mere seven years later in the first of the Ring dramas. Nevertheless, despite these very real shortcomings, Lohengrin is not a hopeless cause. I remember being enthralled by its fairy-tale atmosphere in my early opera-going days, and though this may be partially ascribed to the good-natured tolerance of youth, it had also to do with the fact that I heard Lohengrin performed by great artists. The Elsas of my youth were Elisabeth Rethberg, Lotte Lehmann, and Kirsten Flagstad; the Lohengrins were René Maison and Lauritz Melchior. Their like is no longer to be found.

SANDOR KONYA, the Lohengrin of this new recording, comes closest to matching the standards set by his predecessors. He has sung the role more than two hundred times in opera houses throughout the world and makes a magnificent appearance on stage, a truly radiant knight in shining armor. Heard but not seen, Kónya is less impressive. There is an occasional whine in his singing that conflicts with Lohengrin's strength of character (it seems particularly detrimental in the Höchstes vertrau'n episode), and he displays a whitening of tone at high climaxes that lessens the heroic effect intended. Still, this is a distinguished and often vocally sumptuous portrayal.

The same cannot be said for any of the other performances. Lucine Amara is completely miscast as Elsa, a light soprano endowed with neither the fullness of tone nor the mystical rapture to do justice to the part. Rita Gorr has some compelling moments as Ortrud, enough to show that she is basically right for this imperious and difficult role, but most of the sessions caught her in poor vocal form. William Dooley as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry give performances that are best described as workmanlike.

This leaves the Boston Symphony as the hero of the occasion. It makes a wonderful sound in this music (even though its brass does not have the rich, plummy character which Wagner ideally demands), and to give this sound its full due RCA's engineers pulled out all the stereo stops. There are some stunning effects—the opening of Scene IV in the second act, for instance, with the shimmer of high violins arching over a velvety chorus, or the opening of Scene III in the third act, as the Brabantian army enters to the bray of proclamatory trumpets from all directions. But to my ears the recording as a whole has too much resonance. The voices glare with a souped-up brilliance that blurs clarity and eventually tires the senses.

Well, the $180,000 has been spent, and for it RCA Victor can at least lay claim to the most recommendable Lohengrin in stereo. But if you want to hear how this music should be sung, listen to the Bridal Chamber scene performed by Flagstad and Melchior (RCA Victor 2618). And if you want to hear it conducted with true intensity, listen to the Preludes brought to incandescent heat by Arturo Toscanini (RCA Victor 6020).

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

OCT 1966

Book-and-Record Spectaculars

Wagner: Lohengrin (complete). Konya, Amara, Dooley, Goor, Hines et al., Boston Chorus Pro Musica (augmented), Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf.
by Edward Canby
RCA Victor LSC 6710 (5) stereo

This is the first complete Wagner opera recorded in the U.S. for a long time and the manner of its production is highly significant. There are, to be sure, the expected "Metropolitan Opera stars"; but the Met itself is oh-so-definitely absent. So is the opera house in any form. This is Boston-Symphony-Tanglewood stuff, a production first put on in concert form at the summer festival and then recorded, in the Boston Symphony's home hall, immediately afterwards—the now-standard method of recording big works. (Even the hall itself was revamped for recording, with the orchestra on the floor, the soloists on a sort of runway at the front of the stage and the huge chorus in back of them.)

The prime listening factor here, then, is the orchestra itself, not an opera orchestra but a first-class symphony ensemble. The whole production is built around this factor, which is vital in Wag- [illegible] dorf. That in itself is enough [illegible] the production to many of us—for nothing can match the sound of the Wagner orchestra, rightly directed.

The solo voices are plenty good enough, if oddly assorted in background (an old American opera tradition). Lohengrin is Hungarian, his lady friend, Elsa, is Armenian-American; from there we move onwards to a Belgian and three Americans, two from California. Lohengrin is just fine; so are the other more massive males who back him up. The modest Elsa, shy maiden ever-so-determined, is not quite so good for my ears but her deficiencies are not dramatically serious in the whole—just a rather unsteady production, more wobbly than the ear can easily follow.

As for the all-important chorus—superb! Instead of the usual motley collection of elderly professionals (and youngerly would-be professionals) this one is an augmented standard amateur chorus, a very knowledgeable one, which represents the mass of the people in the opera with wonderfully musical effect—nicely contrasted with the all-male pro group of Brabantian nobles, who sing together as a second chorus. With all this enormous vocal population, the big ensemble scenes are no less than stunning.

But maybe the biggest virtue of this set is RCA's commendable restraint in miking the solo voices, which are kept well back and in proportion, never zooming out super-close-up (as used to be the fashion), often actually drowned out in luscious orchestra sound—exactly as was intended. Those who distrust Wagnerian vocalizing need not worry a bit here. All is properly in perspective.

It's a documentary too, this album. A huge, fat booklet with all the text, word for word in German and English, plus quite a bit of useful info along with the usual decorative plugs for the various performers.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N.Y.
23 TI. A YR. 70,700

NOV 5 1966

RECORDS

WAGNER: Lohengrin
■ Amara, Gorr; Kónya, Dooley, Marsh, Hines; Chorus Pro Musica, Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf. Victor LM(LSC)-6710 [5].

In European opera recordings it is not unusual to encounter major symphony orchestras, but the last such undertaking in America was the Toscanini-NBC Symphony Ballo in Maschera of 1954. Victor's new, uncut Lohengrin with the Boston Symphony is newsworthy on another count as well: it is the first on discs to include a section following the hero's Grail Narrative in the final scene, omitted from the printed score and probably unheard beyond the Bayreuth productions of the 1930's.

This album was made not at Tanglewood, where the public performances took place, but at recording sessions in Boston's Symphony Hall in August 1965. The stars are the orchestra, which plays at all times superlatively, and the chorus, a 120-voice ensemble amplified for the occasion to 180, which sings with handsome tone, good diction and sensitive dramatic impact.

The work of the soloists and conductor, though never less than professional, is less consistently satisfying. As Elsa, Lucine Amara is on top of the hardest passages and shows skill of portraiture, but one notes a lack of that tonal purity and exaltation demanded by the role. Rita Gorr's Ortrud, much admired in Europe, is restricted by strained tone on topmost notes. The finest performances here are those of Sándor Kónya—a veteran of over 200 Lohengrins and [illegible] a [illegible] knight in [illegible] armor—and Jerome Hines, an assured and forceful King Henry. Because William Dooley's baritone is neither so large nor so rich as Telramund requires, he seems to extend his resources at the sacrifice of shading.

Erich Leinsdorf's direction is notable more for neatness and clarity than for dramatic color and expressive fervor. Some of his pacing seems overdeliberate, some phrasing without much lyric grace. In the main, the recorded sound is quite good. Orchestra and chorus come through with telling impact, though there is obvious monitoring from time to time. The solo voices, however, sometimes appear fuzzy in tone as a result of too much resonance.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
D. 45,000 S. 65,500
OCT 9 1966

SOUNDTRACK

Reviewed by ED LABORWIT

WAGNER: Lohengrin. Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, Sandor Konya, Jerome Hines, et al.; Boston Sym. Orch., Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LSC-6710 five discs, $28.95.

This set is the crowning achievement in RCA Victor's Dynagroove process. The sound must be heard to be believed!

It's common knowledge that this is the most expensive opera recording EVER, but even a project of its gargantuan proportions could have been a fiasco if one artist had failed to meet the demands of his role. This was not the case. Even though Rita Gorr was not in perfect voice, her's is still the finest Ortrud, in this reviewer's opinion.

Lucine Amara's Elsa is all lyricism, light and lovely, surprising in a role that calls for a fuller voice (traditionally), but is this not a time that laughs at tradition? No fault can be found with her approach to the part, though her temperament seems far from Germanic. Here is a perfect Puccinni heroine, springing forth full grown as a Wagnarian soprano. More power to her! It took courage to accept the challenge, and she has not disappointed us.

Sandor Konya, in the title role, is heroic and powerful. It is a part he knows inside out, and this familiarity shows to full advantage.

Jerome Hines, in the impossible role of Henry the Fowler, is, as always, flawless; reminding one of his past triumphs as Mephistopheles, Wotan and King Marke, to mention a few. The Californian's German is unidiomatic, but it is preferable to the style of German bassos.

William Dooley's Telramund is dramatically satisfying; he has captured the flavor of the role, though it is new to him.

Boston's Pro Musica chorus has a cold clarity that leaves something to be desired if one is looking for warmth of tonal quality, but their musicianship cannot be denied.

The Boston Symphony is the real "star" of this performance. One has a feeling that the magnificent voices are backdrops for the orchestra, instead of the other way around, and this is undoubtedly due to Maestro Leinsdorf's reading of the opera. His major concern is the orchestra, but what an orchestra! It puts most good opera orchestras to shame.

THE MORNING CALL
PATERSON, N. J.
D. 20,932
DEC 10 1966

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 137,868
DEC 10 1966

THE CLASSICS

Americans Take Over

By Mark A. Stuart

ONE of the problems with listening to Wagnerian opera, besides the fact that you may be allergic to Wagner, is that you have to listen to singers who may be long dead, or retired, or inactive for another reason. There are plenty of gals around now who can sing the heroic strophes, but where do you find the old-style heldentenor who can match them decibel for decibel? Ever since Lauritz Melchior decided to call it a day, there hasn't been a singer on the scene who won't be drowned out by the orchestra.

I'm happy to report RCA-Victor has come to the rescue with a "Lohengrin" by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the title role is Sandor Konya, a real old-fashioned-type big voice who could probably keep up with Birgit Nilsson and you have to be some kind of tenor to do that.

Birgit Nilsson isn't on this recording, but besides Mr. Konya we have a stellar cast consisting of Lucine Amara as Elsa of Brabant, William Dooley as Frederick of Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, Jerome Hines as Henry the Fowler, and Calvin Marsh as the King's Herald. The interesting thing about this cast is that it's distinctly American. There was a time when getting an American into a Wagnerian role was like fitting a chihuahua into a great dane's collar. Now it appears as if the better Wagnerian singers come from these here parts.

Erich Leinsdorf, the maestro of this piece, has an interesting theory about this. He feels it all stems from the increased use of recordings. When he was a young man in Vienna, he says, Germany alone had 50 to 70 opera houses providing Wagner on a seasonal basis. It took, he says, about 35 Brunnhildes to keep these houses supplied. Most of them were awful, but at least there were 35 of them and this was a training ground.

But with the advent of popular recordings, these 35 houses in the sticks had to make way for top performances on records and the supply of weak, sickly Brunnhildes dwindled. They couldn't stand the gaff in the marketplace.

Add to this the fact that in the intervening years America has taken over the leadership of the operatic world, as much as European houses won't admit it, and you have the development of a new school of singers here who will not fear to tackle Wagner just because he was once a German monopoly.

In any case, we have here a full-bodied Wagner. Leinsdorf has been accused of conducting by the book. I don't know if this is all bad although the purists might wince, but I do know one thing. If you don't conduct Wagner by the book, you're in trouble. There was only one Wagner. As nasty as he was personally, he was a musician par excellence. Try and fool around with his explicit instructions and you'll produce the kind of travesty which makes spoofs of Wagnerian singing a regular bet on the Ed Sullivan show.

Leinsdorf knows this and he keeps a tight rein on his people—singers and players alike. The result is a kind of taut, melodic, soaring, completely satisfying "Lohengrin" which could serve as the introduction to Wagnerian opera to a whole generation of new listeners. Can that be all bad?

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 144,948 SUN. 155,094

SEP 25 1966

Music notes

By CHICK OBER of The Times Staff

RCA Victor's complete recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" is unusual in its field — the instrumental performance overshadows the vocal.

Erich Leinsdorf is so magnificent conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the dazzling Wagner score that the soloists cannot consider themselves slighted by this tribute to the instrumentalists.

In fact, with the help of RCA Victor's sound engineers, the Boston Symphony has perhaps achieved the finest operatic instrumental sound since the advent of stereo.

The recording is unusual in several other respects. It is the first recording of a Wagner opera made in America, and it is the first complete opera recording by a major American symphony orchestra since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. It is the first absolutely complete recording ever made of "Lohengrin."

The vocal cast is headed by Sandor Konya, tenor, who has sung the title role on opera stages all over the world more than 200 times.

Other vocal stars of the five-LP album include: Lucine Amara, soprano, as Elsa; William Dooley, bari- [illegible] 180-member Boston Chorus Pro Musica.

For the recording, which requires 3 hours, 35 minutes to play, the 104 regular members of the Boston Symphony were augmented by 25 additional instrumentalists.

The vocal accolades belong to Konya. Miss Amara's voice is a bit thin for her role. William Dooley's performance has merit, and Jerome Hines is right for the difficult role he portrays, but occasionally lacks freshness. The Pro Musica vocalizing is outstanding, blending well with the inspired Leinsdorf instrumentation.

175

REPORTER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
E. O. WEEK 170,200

SEPT 8 1966

Opera Notes

ROLAND GELATT

ALONG with football and politics, the autumn season traditionally brings a flood of new opera recordings. Three early arrivals are Lohengrin, Nabucco, and Cav. & Pag.

First attention goes to Lohengrin (RCA Victor 6710; five discs, mono or stereo) in deference to the well-meaning largess that brought this recording into being. Nothing was stinted in its production. Rather than go to Europe, where union rates are lower and working conditions more permissive, RCA elected to record the opera in America with the most extravagant "pit orchestra" imaginable—the Boston Symphony at full strength, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The work was rehearsed to a fare-thee-well and recorded painstakingly over twelve three-hour sessions. Tons of helpful paraphernalia were brought in: closed-circuit television to relay the conductor's beat to off-stage musicians; portable air-conditioning units to immunize Boston's Symphony Hall from an August heat wave; extra tape machines to forestall interruptions. All told, about $180,000 was spent from start to finish, which makes this Lohengrin far and away the most costly opera recording in history. That is, alas, its chief distinction. As an artistic recreation, the production is no great shakes.

Admittedly, an uncut Lohengrin has plenty of built-in hurdles to clear—and this recording is complete to the last note, even including material ordinarily omitted at Bayreuth. The work cuts a poor figure next to Der Ring, Tristan, and Meistersinger. It is an old-fashioned opera consisting of recitatives, arias, duets, and choruses strung along one after another. Among them we encounter some marvelous tunes (millions of brides have not appeared to the strains of the Wedding Chorus for nothing), but we also encounter some interminably tedious patches, and nowhere do we find that engrossing symphonic development of motive which Wagner achieved a mere seven years later in the first of the Ring dramas. Nevertheless, despite these very real shortcomings, Lohengrin is not a hopeless cause. I remember being enthralled by its fairy-tale atmosphere in my early opera-going days, and though this may be partially ascribed to the good-natured tolerance of youth, it had also to do with the fact that I heard Lohengrin performed by great artists. The Elsas of my youth were Elisabeth Rethberg, Lotte Lehmann, and Kirsten Flagstad; the Lohengrins were René Maison and Lauritz Melchior. Their like is no longer to be found.

SANDOR KONYA, the Lohengrin of this new recording, comes closest to matching the standards set by his predecessors. He has sung the role more than two hundred times in opera houses throughout the world and makes a magnificent appearance on stage, a truly radiant knight in shining armor. Heard but not seen, Kónya is less impressive. There is an occasional whine in his singing that conflicts with Lohengrin's strength of character (it seems particularly detrimental in the Höchstes vertrau'n episode), and he displays a whitening of tone at high climaxes that lessens the heroic effect intended. Still, this is a distinguished and often vocally sumptuous portrayal.

The same cannot be said for any of the other performances. Lucine Amara is completely miscast as Elsa, a light soprano endowed with neither the fullness of tone nor the mystical rapture to do justice to the part. Rita Gorr has some compelling moments as Ortrud, enough to show that she is basically right for this imperious and difficult role, but most of the sessions caught her in poor vocal form. William Dooley as Telramund and Jerome Hines as King Henry give performances that are best described as workmanlike.

This leaves the Boston Symphony as the hero of the occasion. It makes a wonderful sound in this music (even though its brass does not have the rich, plummy character which Wagner ideally demands), and to give this sound its full due RCA's engineers pulled out all the stereo stops. There are some stunning effects—the opening of Scene IV in the second act, for instance, with the shimmer of high violins arching over a velvety chorus, or the opening of Scene III in the third act, as the Brabantian army enters to the bray of proclamatory trumpets from all directions. But to my ears the recording as a whole has too much resonance. The voices glare with a souped-up brilliance that blurs clarity and eventually tires the senses.

Well, the $180,000 has been spent, and for it RCA Victor can at least lay claim to the most recommendable Lohengrin in stereo. But if you want to hear how this music should be sung, listen to the Bridal Chamber scene performed by Flagstad and Melchior (RCA Victor 2618). And if you want to hear it conducted with true intensity, listen to the Preludes brought to incandescent heat by Arturo Toscanini (RCA Victor 6020).

AUDIO
MINEOLA, N. Y.
MONTHLY 26,100

OCT 1966

Book-and-Record Spectaculars

Wagner: Lohengrin (complete). Konya, Amara, Dooley, Goor, Hines et al., Boston Chorus Pro Musica (augmented), Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf.

RCA Victor LSC 6710 (5) stereo

This is the first complete Wagner opera recorded in the U.S. for a long time and the manner of its production is highly significant. There are, to be sure, the expected "Metropolitan Opera stars"; but the Met itself is oh-so-definitely absent. So is the opera house in any form. This is Boston-Symphony-Tanglewood stuff, a production first put on in concert form at the summer festival and then recorded, in the Boston Symphony's home hall, immediately afterwards—the now-standard method of recording big works. (Even the hall itself was revamped for recording, with the orchestra on the floor, the soloists on a sort of runway at the front of the stage and the huge chorus in back of them.)

The prime listening factor here, then, is the orchestra itself, not an opera orchestra but a first-class symphony ensemble. The whole production is built around this factor, which is vital in Wagnerian music, and with the predominant sound of the 10 LP sides, voices or no, is that of the superb BSO [illegible] dorf. That in itself is enough [illegible] the production to many of us—for nothing can match the sound of the Wagner orchestra, rightly directed.

The solo voices are plenty good enough, if oddly assorted in background (an old American opera tradition). Lohengrin is Hungarian, his lady friend, Elsa, is Armenian-American; from there we move onwards to a Belgian and three Americans, two from California. Lohengrin is just fine; so are the other more massive males who back him up. The modest Elsa, shy maiden ever-so-determined, is not quite so good for my ears but her deficiencies are not dramatically serious in the whole—just a rather unsteady production, more wobbly than the ear can easily follow.

As for the all-important chorus—superb! Instead of the usual motley collection of elderly professionals (and youngerly would-be professionals) this one is an augmented standard amateur chorus, a very knowledgeable one, which represents the mass of the people in the opera with wonderfully musical effect—nicely contrasted with the all-male pro group of Brabantian nobles, who sing together as a second chorus. With all this enormous vocal population, the big ensemble scenes are no less than stunning.

But maybe the biggest virtue of this set is RCA's commendable restraint in miking the solo voices, which are kept well back and in proportion, never zooming out super-close-up (as used to be the fashion), often actually drowned out in luscious orchestra sound—exactly as was intended. Those who distrust Wagnerian vocalizing need not worry a bit here. All is properly in perspective.

It's a documentary too, this album. A huge, fat booklet with all the text, word for word in German and English, plus quite a bit of useful info along with the usual decorative plugs for the various performers.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N.Y.
23 TI. A YR. 70,700

NOV 5 1966

RECORDS

WAGNER: Lohengrin

■ Amara, Gorr; Kónya, Dooley, Marsh, Hines; Chorus Pro Musica, Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf. Victor LM(LSC)-6710 [5].

In European opera recordings it is not unusual to encounter major symphony orchestras, but the last such undertaking in America was the Toscanini-NBC Symphony Balio in Maschera of 1954. Victor's new, uncut Lohengrin with the Boston Symphony is newsworthy on another count as well: it is the first on discs to include a section following the hero's Grail Narrative in the final scene, omitted from the printed score and probably unheard beyond the Bayreuth productions of the 1930's.

This album was made not at Tanglewood, where the public performances took place, but at recording sessions in Boston's Symphony Hall in August 1965. The stars are the orchestra, which plays at all times superlatively, and the chorus, a 120-voice ensemble amplified for the occasion to 180, which sings with handsome tone, good diction and sensitive dramatic impact.

The work of the soloists and conductor, though never less than professional, is less consistently satisfying. As Elsa, Lucine Amara is on top of the hardest passages and shows skill of portraiture, but one notes a lack of that tonal purity and exaltation demanded by the role. Rita Gorr's Ortrud, much admired in Europe, is restricted by strained tone on topmost notes. The finest performances here are those of Sándor Kónya—a veteran of over 200 Lohengrins and altogether a sweet, manly knight in shining armor—and Jerome Hines, an assured and forceful King Henry. Because William Dooley's baritone is neither so large nor so rich as Telramund requires, he seems to extend his resources at the sacrifice of shading.

Erich Leinsdorf's direction is notable more for neatness and clarity than for dramatic color and expressive fervor. Some of his pacing seems overdeliberate, some phrasing without much lyric grace. In the main, the recorded sound is quite good. Orchestra and chorus come through with telling impact, though there is obvious monitoring from time to time. The solo voices, however, sometimes appear fuzzy in tone as a result of too much resonance.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
D. 45,000 S. 65,500
OCT 9 1966

SOUNDTRACK

Reviewed by ED LABORWIT

WAGNER: Lohengrin. Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, Sandor Konya, Jerome Hines, et al.; Boston Sym. Orch., Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LSC-6710 five discs, $28.95.

This set is the crowning achievement in RCA Victor's Dynagroove process. The sound must be heard to be believed!

It's common knowledge that this is the most expensive opera recording EVER, but even a project of its gargantuan proportions could have been a fiasco if one artist had failed to meet the demands of his role. This was not the case. Even though Rita Gorr was not in perfect voice, her's is still the finest Ortrud, in this reviewer's opinion.

Lucine Amara's Elsa is all lyricism, light and lovely, surprising in a role that calls for a fuller voice (traditionally), but is this not a time that laughs at tradition? No fault can be found with her approach to the part, though her temperament seems far from Germanic. Here is a perfect Puccinni heroine, springing forth full grown as a Wagnarian soprano. More power to her! It took courage to accept the challenge, and she has not disappointed us.

Sandor Konya, in the title role, is heroic and powerful. It is a part he knows inside out, and this familiarity shows to full advantage.

Jerome Hines, in the impossible role of Henry the Fowler, is, as always, flawless; reminding one of his past triumphs as Mephistopheles, Wotan and King Marke, to mention a few. The Californian's German is unidiomatic, but it is preferable to the style of German bassos.

William Dooley's Telramund is dramatically satisfying; he has captured the flavor of the role, though it is new to him.

Boston's Pro Musica chorus has a cold clarity that leaves something to be desired if one is looking for warmth of tonal quality, but their musicianship cannot be denied.

The Boston Symphony is the real "star" of this performance. One has a feeling that the magnificent voices are backdrops for the orchestra, instead of the other way around, and this is undoubtedly due to Maestro Leinsdorf's reading of the opera. His major concern is the orchestra, but what an orchestra! It puts most good opera orchestras to shame.

THE MORNING CALL
PATERSON, N. J.
D. 20,932
DEC 10 1966

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 137,868
DEC 10 1966

THE CLASSICS

Americans Take Over

By Mark A. Stuart

ONE of the problems with listening to Wagnerian opera, besides the fact that you may be allergic to Wagner, is that you have to listen to singers who may be long dead, or retired, or inactive for another reason. There are plenty of gals around now who can sing the heroic strophes, but where do you find the old-style heldentenor who can match them decibel for decibel? Ever since Lauritz Melchior decided to call it a day, there hasn't been a singer on the scene who won't be drowned out by the orchestra.

I'm happy to report RCA-Victor has come to the rescue with a "Lohengrin" by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the title role is Sandor Konya, a real old-fashioned-type big voice who could probably keep up with Birgit Nilsson and you have to be some kind of tenor to do that.

Birgit Nilsson isn't on this recording, but besides Mr. Konya we have a stellar cast consisting of Lucine Amara as Elsa of Brabant, William Dooley as Frederick of Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, Jerome Hines as Henry the Fowler, and Calvin Marsh as the King's Herald. The interesting thing about this cast is that it's distinctly American. There was a time when getting an American into a Wagnerian role was like fitting a chihuahua into a great dane's collar. Now it appears as if the better Wagnerian singers come from these here parts.

Erich Leinsdorf, the maestro of this piece, has an interesting theory about this. He feels it all stems from the increased use of recordings. When he was a young man in Vienna, he says, Germany alone had 50 to 70 opera houses providing Wagner on a seasonal basis. It took, he says, about 35 Brunnhildes to keep these houses supplied. Most of them were awful, but at least there were 35 of them and this was a training ground.

But with the advent of popular recordings, these 35 houses in the sticks had to make way for top performances on records and the supply of weak, sickly Brunnhildes dwindled. They couldn't stand the gaff in the marketplace.

Add to this the fact that in the intervening years America has taken over the leadership of the operatic world, as much as European houses won't admit it, and you have the development of a new school of singers here who will not fear to tackle Wagner just because he was once a German monopoly.

In any case, we have here a full-bodied Wagner. Leinsdorf has been accused of conducting by the book. I don't know if this is all bad although the purists might wince, but I do know one thing. If you don't conduct Wagner by the book, you're in trouble. There was only one Wagner. As nasty as he was personally, he was a musician par excellence. Try and fool around with his explicit instructions and you'll produce the kind of travesty which makes spoofs of Wagnerian singing a regular bet on the Ed Sullivan show.

Leinsdorf knows this and he keeps a tight rein on his people—singers and players alike. The result is a kind of taut, melodic, soaring, completely satisfying "Lohengrin" which could serve as the introduction to Wagnerian opera to a whole generation of new listeners. Can that be all bad?

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 144,948 SUN. 155,094

SEP 25 1966

By CHICK OBER of The Times Staff

RCA Victor's complete recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" is unusual in its field — the instrumental performance overshadows the vocal.

Erich Leinsdorf is so magnificent conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the dazzling Wagner score that the soloists cannot consider themselves slighted by this tribute to the instrumentalists.

In fact, with the help of RCA Victor's sound engineers, the Boston Symphony has perhaps achieved the finest operatic instrumental sound since the advent of stereo.

The recording is unusual in several other respects. It is the first recording of a Wagner opera made in America, and it is the first complete opera recording by a major American symphony orchestra since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. It is the first absolutely complete recording ever made of "Lohengrin."

The vocal cast is headed by Sandor Konya, tenor, who has sung the title role on opera stages all over the world more than 200 times.

Other vocal stars of the five-LP album include: Lucine Amara, soprano, as Elsa; William Dooley, bari- [illegible] 180 - member Boston Chorus Pro Musica.

For the recording, which requires 3 hours, 35 minutes to play, the 104 regular members of the Boston Symphony were augmented by 25 additional instrumentalists.

The vocal accolades belong to Konya. Miss Amara's voice is a bit thin for her role. William Dooley's performance has merit, and Jerome Hines is right for the difficult role he portrays, but occasionally lacks freshness. The Pro Musica vocalizing is outstanding, blending well with the inspired Leinsdorf instrumentation.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 52,173

AUG 28 1966

Opera Star Missed The Boat

Wagner's opera. Tenor Leo Slezak said is one night when he lingered too long after singing his farewell. The swan and raft which are supposed to bear Lohengrin away pulled into the wings on schedule, without him, and Slezak asked, "What time does the next swan boat leave?"

And the most talked-about one of the recording sessions of "Lohengrin" isn't on the record. There were Lucine Amara and Sandor Konya singing on the stage of Symphony Hall in Boston, getting more and more lyrical, more and more impassioned. As Elsa and Lohengrin, they have just been married; she wants to know his name; he doesn't want to tell her.

Just as the few spectators were thinking they'd never heard it sung better conductor Erich Leinsdorf's voice cut through the music:

"Where's the man with the sword? Sabotage! Sabotage! You're all a bunch of dilettantes!" Then Leindorf phased out of English and into another of the many languages he knows.

A "Lohengrin" recording doesn't need a swan but it does need the sound of steel as Frederick breaks into the bridal chamber, sword drawn, where he is run through on Lohengrin's sword.

The offending scene was, of course, done again, this time with "the man with the sword" on a box in front of a microphone facing his own assistant conductor, and bobbing his entire body up and down to the beat, to express his zealous concentration.

The rest of the recording went smoothly. It was hot in Boston, but nobody got sick, or temperamental; "good voice" was the general rule; recording sessions were all the serious business of making music but without undue tension; moments in between sessions were a mixture of studying the music and light-hearted banter.

Cheaper in Europe

Opera recordings are nearly always done in Europe — because they are so much chesper there. A record company pays a soloist his fee no matter where the recording is done and as for everybody else — in Europe they don't belong to the American Federation of Musicians.

But RCA Victor decided to record an opera in America anyway. It picked a big one "Lohengrin," and a giant of an orchestra, the Boston Symphony.

George R. Marek, head of RCA Victor Records, said, "There are some things which just must be done. Wagner more than any other operatic composer used the orchestra in the widest sense of its capacities. Thus unless one had the opportunity to hear, one would always be curious to know how Wagner would sound performed by one of the world's finest orchestras.

"It is an instance when artistic curiosity overcame the natural barriers — notably cost. Of course 'Lohengrin' could have been recorded less expensively in Europe. But not the 'Lohengrin' I feel we have achieved with the Boston Symphony."

The president of the AFM, Herman D. Kenin, found the occasion so auspicious that he flew from Chicago to attend one of the recording sessions. (He was carrying a newspaper folded so that the first half of a headline, "LBJ Conducts," could be read. After formal words of greeting and mutual congratulations, conductor Leinsdorf quipped, "Be sure that he takes out a card.")

Released This Month

This month, the 104-member Boston Symphony, plus 25 extra players (50.63 each for tow hours of recording), the 160-voice semi - professional Chorus Pro Musica of Boston ($65 each for the week) and the Metropolitan Opera's Lucine Amara, Sandor Konya, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh made music in the superb acoustics of Symphony Hall, Boston, for six days, six hours a day. They were creating the five-record, three hour and 45 minute, complete "Lohengrin," put on the market this month.

Conductor Leinsdorf said, "Our major intent is to do the work as I think it stands in all its romantic grandeur. My concept is a real romantic fairy tale and as such I am hoping that the recording will come out."

Season patrons of Symphony Hall would hardly have recognized the place. Chairs, on fingers crossed on both hands. most of the state. The soloists stood in front of them.

Miss Amara sang with wide, caressing sweeps of her arms, dingers crossed on both hands. Konya pumped his right hand up and down, fist clenched. Miss Gorr opened her arms wide. Dooley stood, looking lean and alert as a sailor on leave, arms folded across his chest.

The front half of the seats had been removed from the hall's main floor, and the orchestra sat there, facing Erich Leinsdorf who sat on a red leather stool atop a red-carpeted podium. A tripod at his right held a telephone on which he talked with the men in the upstairs control room.

Long plywood panels leaned side by side against the balconies, making two side walls; long maroon dropcloths hung from the balconies at back, making a rear wall. Seven balcony doors had been removed at each side and 14 air - conditioning units ($7,000 each) thrust through the door jams were running during each hour's 20-minute break from recording. Because they made noise, they could'nt operate during the re[illegible] itself.

The units also co[illegible] midity from the hall and dumped the water in buckets in the outside corridor.

The recording was done in large segments; sometimes an entire 40-minute period would be spent recording without interruption.

In a typical exchange after Leinsdorf stopped the music and before he started the retake, he told one instrumentalist that his B flat was a little high in the fourth bar of 48B; RCA producer Richard Mohr suggested by telephone that 48A be a little softer and Leinsdorf ordered 48A cut from two harps to one.

Miss Amara said, "Can we do from the entrance of 55?" Leinsdorf replied, "I'd be delighted.

"I don't want to tire her out; she's so brave. Everybody watch it."

In French, he told Miss Gorr, who is Belgian, that this retake did not include any singing by her.

Leinsdorf spoke in English to Miss Amara who is of Armenian heritage, born in Hartford, Conn., reared in California. He spoke in German to Konya, who is Hungarian, and Konya answered in English. He spoke in English to Californian Dooley, who answered in German, or, for Gorr's benefit, French.

Konya was singing Lohengrin for the 202nd time. He said, "Wieland Wagner (the composer's grandson) is calling me the world's champion Lohengrin.

"But recording is much different. Everything has to be projected and perfect. The finest little notes have to be projected. We're magnificently organized here. I wish I could do all my recording with so much rehearsal and with Mr. Leinsdorf. I think we are getting a very good recording."

Konya made his debut at Bayreuth and at the Met as Lohengrin. However, he made [illegible] Fran- [illegible] the girl of the [illegible]

One critic wrote that I was a big success but I didn't walk like a cowboy."

Miss Amara had never sung her role before. She explained to Dooley with the vivacity she maintained all week, "I'm not that gullible. Why should I sing the role of a gullible person?"

JOPLIN, MO.
GLOBE
D. 31,500 S. 35,000

AUG 21 1966

OFF THE RECORD

-by-
Dave Gragg

On the classical [illegible] is a large helping of Wagner. For devotees of this master's music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers "Wagner: Lohengrin (complete.)"

The orchestra is conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and the Boston Chorus Pro Musica — Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, William Dooley, Rita Gorr, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh — also performs.

This marks the first American recording of the Wagner opera. It is the first complete recording of an opera by a major symphony orchestra since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony.

The Courier-Journal
LOUISVILLE, KY.
D. 229,925 SUN. 338,841

SEP 18 1966

THE RECORD SHELF

Leinsdorf's 'Lohengrin' Puts Opera in a Fresh Perspective

By WILLIAM MOOTZ, Courier-Journal Music Critic

ON THE TOP of a stack of new recordings that had piled up during a recent vacation were two of the big entries of the upcoming fall season—RCA Victor's five-disc recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" and London's three-disc album of Verdi's "Nabucco."

Both operas represent unusual accomplishments for their companies. "Lohengrin" is not only the first opera recorded in the United States in many years (Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony are the raison d'etre for the performance), but it is also the first absolutely complete "Lohengrin" to reach record counters. "Nabucco" is the first stereo recording of the opera that made Verdi famous and established him permanently in the affections of his fellow countrymen.

Both recordings have major assets to perk up an opera fan's ears, although neither is without shortcomings. But that's the way it goes when record companies undertake so complex an operation as a complete opera.

'Lohengrin' Has Assets

To take up first the more-complex, and in some respects the more-exciting of the two recordings, "Lohengrin" has going for it the magnificent Boston Symphony, brilliant recorded sound from Victor's engineers, and Leinsdorf, who delivers a beautifully balanced performance of Wagner's lyrical score. Leinsdorf does not belong to the "wallow and groan" school of Wagner conductors. I have sometimes complained about his clinical conducting in the past. But for "Lohengrin," it seems to me that his restraint throws the opera into a fresh perspective. I like hearing it without every emotion driven home with leaden psychological overtones.

It was probably Leinsdorf's idea to restore the second verse of "In fernem Land," so universally cut in the opera house that I couldn't find a score of the opera that included it. But since Sandor Konya is his Lohengrin, and sings beautifully throughout, it is nice to have the short passage restored.

The rest of the cast fails to measure up to their Lohengrin. Lucina Amara sings prettily as Elsa, but sings without character. Rita Gorr, however, is much worse. Her Ortrud is shrill, rough and painfully strained whenever she must climb to the top registers of the role. Jerome Hines' King and William Dooley's Telramund are commonplace.

So the Boston Orchestra, its conductor, and the authoritative Lohengrin of Konya are the recording's top blessings.

With "Nabucco," we also get a soaring performance from conductor Lamberto Gardelli, who is in charge of the Vienna Opera Orchestra. But here, also, the singing is not always up to the standards set by the conductor.

Of primary interest, perhaps, is the recording debut of Elena Suliotis, a 22-year old Greek soprano cast in the cruelly difficult role of Abigaille. Hers is a faxcinating voice, uneven and immature, but conveying a raw power that can be exciting. If she doesn't destroy her voice by bad vocal habits, she may have a big future.

Tito Gobbi, beyond his vocal prime, is nevertheless an illuminating Nabucco. Bruno Prevedi sings appealingly as Ismaele. Carlo Cava is an uninteresting Zaccaria; but the chorus, so important in this opera, is splendid. For lovers of this wonderfully tuneful Verdi score, London's "Nabucco" is a satisfying performance, and probably will remain the only stereo "Nabucco" in the catalogue.

EAST SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
PRESS
W. 659

SEP 15 1966

RECORD NOTES

By Barney Glazer

Eric Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh sing the main roles of Wagner's "Lohengrin represented the most tragicgic situation of his times, the misunderstanding that separates the souls of the chosen from the obscure towards which they are propelled by the impulse of an irresistible affection.

Lohengrin is Wagner himself, who feels that he is isolated and powerless in the midst of contemporary society, which is unintelligent and inimical. Wagner suffered from this isolation. He wanted to be loved without being compelled to state his origin, his plans, his name.

But Wagner is not loved and he returns to his solitude.

At the time that he wrote "Lohengrin," Wagner perhaps most bitterly felt his moral isolation. He had to suffer at the same time from the injustice of critics, who t eated him as a charlatan.

Omaha World-Herald
OMAHA, NEBR.
(MORNING)
D. 126,435 SUN. 273,599

AUG 21 1966

By Vernon L. Hoyt

IF EVIL old Richard Wagner had never written a piece of orchestral music other than the "Prelude" to the Third Act of "Lohengrin" his fame would be forever. This particular segment of the opera is only one of the brilliant performances in RCA Victor's (LSC-6710) production.

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Chorus Pro Musica are heard along with a cast of soloists rarely matched on records: Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara, soprano, as Elsa; William Dooley, baritone, as Frederick; the monumental Jerome Hines, whose bass is magnificent, as Henry the Fowler, and Rita Gorr, mezzo, as Ortrud.

Besides the 10-side album, the package includes a brochure which contains a sensible translation of the German text, a synopsis of the libretto, reasonable illustrations of the action and an outline of the career of each performer.

Leinsdorf keeps a tight rein on the entire proceeding.

GREAT NECK, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 5,000

NOV 11 1966

Best Recordings This Week

By J. Albert Fracht

Mention the name Richard Wagner and Freudians leap with joy, realists stiffen with revulsion, romanticists girate in ecstatic sensualities and Brahmsians die in agonized jolts. All the man wanted to do and he was the first to do it, was to write in one lump sum, the libretto, words and music about epic productions. One of these, "Lohengrin," has just been produced with remarkable success on RCA Victor Stereo/LSC-6710, Mono/LM-6710. Five LP records.

Pinpoint for this amazing achievement is Conductor Erich Leinsdorf (formerly principal Wagner conductor of the Met) who with the Boston Symphony Orchestra finalizes the argument that a great conductor and a superb orchestra can round out a word or a phrase into far greater depths than can be found in the printed text.

If ever a case for this argument was clearly stated, Leinsdorf has made it. Lyrics that are incredibly poor (Wagner wrote them) are caressed and trumpeted into heaven and hell. This fairy tale about magic with its princely knight, swan, dove and even a virgin besides other peculiar accidents, is transformed into a musical drama whose beginning leads with inexorable intensity to a heartbreak ending.

Sandor Konya, tenor, is an excellent Lohengrin, and should make history as one of the greats. Lucine Amara, soprano, is a good Elsa with some outstanding moments. She bears watching. The rest of the stars are too numerous to detail and are matched more or less in other recordings. We would be remiss in not placing special emphasis on the Boston Chorus Pro Musica. This is an outstanding vocal ensemble that is pliable and always beautiful. Director Alfred Nash Patterson, has molded a fine complement to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Here then is Wagner's dream about dreams fully realized. Music and words are perfectly welded with each other, the pure "pure" and evil "evil" become a believability and a good reason for more Wagner on RCA Victor.

Freudians, realists, romanticists and Brahmsians — take over!

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 2 1966

Accolade Renewed

A letter from Harold Thompson of the Boston Symphony percussion sections provides the opportunity to correct an injustice unwittingly perpetrated in the review of the new RCA Victor recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" last July 31st.

That review said: "The Globe's own Grand Prix du Disque goes to BSO percussionist Arthur Press for his glorious imitation of a king smiting a shield with his sword."

Mr. Thompson writes: "The sound of sword struck against shield was the result of more than a routine effort that I personally pupt forth . . . (and which) consisted of many hours of experiment. The fact that my effort is successful is sufficient. Our dear friend and colleague Arthur Press produced the sword sounds of the duel scene and for these he deserves your best possible accolade. At my age I am becoming somewhat egocentric, but cannot help hoping that you will be somewhat amused at my position."

I had attended a recording session in August 1965. When I heard the album ten months later I retained a vivid memory of Arthur Press standing on a chair banging something to splendid effect, and then telescoped that memory with the sound that was so impressive on the record. My apologies and a renewed grand accolade to Messrs. Thompson and Press.

177

THE BOSTON HERALD
D. 167,765 SUN. 280,099
AUG 2 1 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, September 3, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

HUDSON REGISTER STAR
Friday, September 2, 1966

Sing Major Roles: Soprano Lucine Amara is the Elsa and tenor Sandor Konya is the Lohengrin in RCA Victor's recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin," released in August. Here, they record a duet. The recording, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, marks the first time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recorded an opera.

—RCA Victor Records photo

The Detroit News
D. 682,834 SUN. 917,360
AUG 1 4 1966

On the Re

By JAY CARR
Detroit News Drama and Music Critic

As graphic evidence that records are a year-round proposition, two major labels have issued key opera releases during the summer months.

First there is the long-awaited Victor "Lohengrin" under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf (LSC 6710, five stereo records). It is not meant as a backing-into of the discussion of the performance to point out that the sound (a combination of the superb acoustics of Boston's Symphony Hall and sensitive engineering) is excellent, because sound is an important part of any Wagnerian enterprise.

The production enjoys a high if not complete incidence of success. As he did in the Victor "Don Giovanni," Leinsdorf has restored all the traditional cuts. And Leinsdorf's careful approach, which has made him one of the world's first-echelon opera conductors, results in a copious outpouring of brilliantly executed measures. Having the Boston Symphony as your orchestra doesn't hurt, either.

But certain portions, usually the more lyric ones, seem to suffer from a deficiency of pulse. Rudolf Kempe fashions a more thrust-conscious performance on Angel, although Victor's sound leaves Angel's behind.

As for the singers, Sandor Konya's stylish singing of the title role clearly outdistances the Angel Lohengrin, Jess Thomas. But Angel's Ortrud, Christa Ludwig, is to be preferred over Rita Gorr, who is surprisingly shrill here. Lucine Amara, the Victor Elsa, sings well enough, but unlike Angel's Elisabeth Grummer, is on the pallid side dramatically. William Dooley is a satisfactory Telramund; Dietrich-Dieskau on Angel is mannered. Jerome Hines is a richer-voiced Henry than Angel's Gottlob Frick.

The Boston Chorus Pro Musica contributes some appealing open-toned choral support. Angel's Vienna State Opera Chorus sings with less authority than one would expect. I'd give Victor the edge in sound, Angel the edge in conductor and call the singing a standoff, with Angel taking female honors, Victor male. Neither set eclipses the other. Both are estimable and each scores higher than the mono competition on London and DGG.

* * *

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
SEP 4 1966

Sampling Records

Entire 'Lohengrin'

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

RCA VICTOR'S just released recording of "Lohengrin" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf (LSC-6710, also Mono) is said to be the costliest opera recording ever made. It would be nice to be able to say it is also the finest; but, in spite of many excellencies, it is by no means that.

This is the first complete opera recording made in this country since Toscanini's recordings with the NBC Symphony, and the only entirely complete recording of "Lohengrin" ever made. The enormous pains taken with the recording paid off in magnificent sound, superb performance from the orchestra, fine, solid singing from the augmented 180-voice Boston Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director, and a very high level of singing from the men of the cast.

Sandor Konya is the very embodiment of Lohengrin, romantic in tone, secure in technique. William Dooley will doubtless sing Telramund with more subtlety and insight in years to come, but it is not likely that he will sing it with greater beauty and opulence of tone, or with more musicianly approach, accuracy of pitch, or solid satisfaction throughout than he achieves here.

Jerome Hines is still a very impressive King Henry, and Calvin Marsh as the Herald (as Boris Goldovsky says, "by no means a comprimario part") is perfection itself, and the finest Herald I've ever heard.

Only the two women are not entirely satisfactory. Lucine Amara, who was a substitute for the announced Leontyne Price as Elsa, has not quite enough voice for the part, and is sorely taxed in portions of the score.

Rita Gorr should be one of the best Ortruds around, but she evidently was not in her best condition when the recording was made, for some of her top notes, too, are exceedingly effortful.

Even so, this is a highly impressive recording, and one not likely to be duplicated for some time to come.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
SEP 1 7 1966

OFF THE RECORD

RCA, Columbia Lead Off With Blockbuster Albums

By DURWOOD McALISTER

Two major recording companies have kicked off their fall campaigns with blockbuster albums that demand a space on the shelf of any good music library.

RCA Victor turned to opera with an excitingly successful experiment. The opera, Wagner's "Lohengrin," is the first Wagnerian opera ever recorded in America and the result is most impressive.

Columbia chose to display one of its star performers, Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra, in a complete recording of the greatest symphonic vehicle, the nine symphonies of Beethoven. The choice was a fortunate one.

RCA's "Lohengrin" (Stereo LSC-6710) uses the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a cast of superb singers under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The chorus is the Boston Chorus Pro Musica.

The album represents a considerable financial gamble for RCA. Opera recordings are generally made in Europe because of the very high cost of producing them in the United States, but for this album, the producers pulled out all stops.

THE 104 REGULAR members of the Boston orchestra were augmented by 25 additional instruments. The 120-voice Pro Musica chorus was increased to 180 voices, a move that gives the opera a spaciousness lacking in previous recordings.

The recording was done in Boston's Symphony Hall after concert performances by the cast at Tanglewood. Elaborate technical preparations were required to maintain proper temperature in the sweltering August weather (air conditioners had to be turned off, of course, during the actual takes) and Maestro Leinsdorf had to keep his cast "up" for twelve two-a-day recording sessions. The album attests to the fact that he did his job well.

SANDOR KONYA'S brilliant Lohengrin is matched by outstanding performances by other members of the cast — Lucine Amara as Elsa, Jerome Hines as Henry the Fowler, William Dooley as Frederick, Rita Gorr as Ortrud and Calvin Marsh as the herald.

RCA's "Lohengrin" is unique in that it is a complete, uncut performance.

RCA deserves success in this venture, a success which may encourage more American-recorded opera albums.

Columbia's recording of Beethoven's nine symphonies is everything you would expect from the Philadelphians —plus.

The El Paso Times
D. 58,290 SUN. 82,050
SEPT 1 1 1966

The second masterpiece, this one recorded first, is RCA Victor's Lohengrin, the first un-cut recording of this great work by Richard Wagner, the first major opera recorded in this country since 1958, the first time a major American orchestra has recorded a complete opera since the days of Toscanini and the NBC symphony and the first recording of a complete Wagner opera in the western hemisphere (LSC 6710).

It is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. In the major roles are Sandor Konya, tenor, as Lohengrin; Lucine Amara, soprano, as Elsa of Brabant; William Dooley, baritone, as Frederick of Telramund; Rita Gorr, mezzo-soprano, as Frederick's wife, Ortrud; Jerome Hines, bass, as Henry the Fowler, king of German, and Calvin March, baritone, as the king's herald.

The Brabantian nobles' roles are sung by William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter and Eugene Thamon and in the roles of the pages are Helen Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller and Batyah Godrey, plus 180 singer of the augmented Boston Chorus Pro Musica directed by Alfred Nash Patterson.

The beautifully packaged album consists of five long-play records providing more than three and one-half hours of listening accompanied by a beautifully prepared book with biographies of the stars, an historical discussion of Wagner and his "Lohengrin," an illustrated description of the unusual score, an article on Leinsdorf as related to this opera, a description of the recording sessions, a resume of the plot of each of the three acts and, finally and most enjoyable, the complete German-English libretto, properly noted in relation to the recording.

It is a majestic recording, all leading roles being sung by Metropolitan Opera stars, the consistently most distinguished voice being that of Konya who brought to this session more than 200 previous performances as Lohengrin, [illegible] his [illegible] reputation [illegible]

A great strength of this [illegible] recording is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills its opportunity to achieve the sometimes lengthy but always beautiful musical passages including the opening Prelude, as written by Wagner. Thus, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony share star honors in this work which is both great music and great drama.

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 237,192 SUN. 262,441
SEP 1 8 1966

Records in Review

By JOHN ARDOIN

'Lohengrin' in Boston

The new recording of "Lohengrin" just issued by RCA Victor (LSC 6710) is the sixth recording of the opera. The first two (on Urania and DGG) were routine affairs, but the third version was the charm. Recorded by London live during a performance at Bayreuth in 1953, it boasted a cast still unequalled for uniformity and excitement: Eleanor Steber, Astrid Varnay, Wolfgang Windgassen, Hermann Uhde and Josef Greindl.

The fourth set came from EMI and was distinguished primarily by the Lohengrin of Rudolf Shock. The next set was also from EMI, and it was the first stereo "Lohengrin," with a cast including Elisabeth Gruemmer, Christa Ludwig, Jess Thomas and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Rudolf Kempe's flesh and blood conducting and much of the solo work made this set the first serious challenge to the London set.

Now we have a sixth "Lohengrin," the second in stereo and one of the most expensive operatic recordings ever made. The reason for this is that it was recorded in America (usually a prohibitive practice) utilizing the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IT WAS, IN fact, the first repertory opera recorded on these shores since RCA persevered the Met production of "Macbeth" in 1958. The Victor set has the distinction of being the first completely uncut "Lohengrin" on record (it even restores the extension of Lohengrin's "In Fernam Land" which had been cut by Wagner).

The virtue of completeness is something each listener must solve to his own satisfaction. What is more notable here is the contribution of the Boston men. Rarely does one hear Wagner played so full-bodied and lyrically. It was quite a surprise, for under conductor Erich Leinsdorf the BSO has taken on an extremely tight, dry sound in recent seasons, but none plagues this recording. The answer must be Leinsdorf's tremendous affinity for the score, for he has rarely conducted with such expansiveness and love.

The cast is headed by tenor Sandor Konya in the title part, and his Lohengrin is a superb achievement: Noble, youthful and shining. His singing is the sort of Wagner belcanto one hears about but rarely hears.

FROM HERE on the story is a less happy one. Soprano Lucine Amara (an 11th-hour replacement for Leontyne Price) brings little presence or personality to Elsa. She gives us a drooping lily of a girl rather than a woman torn by doubt and distrust.

The singing of mezzo-soprano Rita Gorr as Ortrud is simply painful above the staff where so much of the role lies. There can be no doubt that Miss Gorr caught the dramatic message of the role, but she is not vocally up to delivering it.

Another important role which was poorly cast was that of Telramund. American baritone William Dooley brings less vocal weight and malevolence to the part than even the light-weight Fischer-Dieskau for EMI. RCA would have been better advised to have used Calvin Marsh (who sings the Herald) as Telramund. Finally, King Henry is sung by bass Jerome Hines who sounds disinterested in the whole proceedings.

On the positive side, however, the singing of the Boston Chorus Pro Musica is all one could want. It is a pity that what could have been a major phonographic contribution is flawed in many important areas. As far as "Lohengrin" is concerned one must continue to set a course by the old London set.

177

THE BOSTON HERALD
D. 167,765 SUN. 280,099
AUG 2 1 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, September 3, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

HUDSON REGISTER STAR
Friday, September 2, 1966

Sing Major Roles: Soprano Lucine Amara is the Elsa and tenor Sandor Konya is the Lohengrin in RCA Victor's recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin," released in August. Here, they record a duet. The recording, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, marks the first time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recorded an opera.

—RCA Victor Records photo

The Detroit News
D. 682,834 SUN. 917,360
AUG 1 4 1966

On the Re

By JAY CARR
Detroit News Drama and Music Critic

As graphic evidence that records are a year-round proposition, two major labels have issued key opera releases during the summer months.

First there is the long-awaited Victor "Lohengrin" under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf (LSC 6710, five stereo records). It is not meant as a backing-into of the discussion of the performance to point out that the sound (a combination of the superb acoustics of Boston's Symphony Hall and sensitive engineering) is excellent, because sound is an important part of any Wagnerian enterprise.

The production enjoys a high if not complete incidence of success. As he did in the Victor "Don Giovanni," Leinsdorf has restored all the traditional cuts. And Leinsdorf's careful approach, which has made him one of the world's first-echelon opera conductors, results in a copious outpouring of brilliantly executed measures. Having the Boston Symphony as your orchestra doesn't hurt, either.

But certain portions, usually the more lyric ones, seem to suffer from a deficiency of pulse. Rudolf Kempe fashions a more thrust-conscious performance on Angel, although Victor's sound leaves Angel's behind.

As for the singers, Sandor Konya's stylish singing of the title role clearly outdistances the Angel Lohengrin, Jess Thomas. But Angel's Ortrud, Christa Ludwig, is to be preferred over Rita Gorr, who is surprisingly shrill here. Lucine Amara, the Victor Elsa, sings well enough, but unlike Angel's Elisabeth Grummer, is on the pallid side dramatically. William Dooley is a satisfactory Telramund; Dietrich-Dieskau on Angel is mannered. Jerome Hines is a richer-voiced Henry than Angel's Gottlob Frick.

The Boston Chorus Pro Musica contributes some appealing open-toned choral support. Angel's Vienna State Opera Chorus sings with less authority than one would expect. I'd give Victor the edge in sound, Angel the edge in conductor and call the singing a standoff, with Angel taking female honors, Victor male. Neither set eclipses the other. Both are estimable and each scores higher than the mono competition on London and DGG.

* * *

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 137,900 SUN. 222,693
SEP 4 1966

Sampling Records

Entire 'Lohengrin'

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

RCA VICTOR'S just released recording of "Lohengrin" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf (LSC-6710, also Mono) is said to be the costliest opera recording ever made. It would be nice to be able to say it is also the finest; but, in spite of many excellencies, it is by no means that.

This is the first complete opera recording made in this country since Toscanini's recordings with the NBC Symphony, and the only entirely complete recording of "Lohengrin" ever made. The enormous pains taken with the recording paid off in magnificent sound, superb performance from the orchestra, fine, solid singing from the augmented 180-voice Boston Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director, and a very high level of singing from the men of the cast.

Sandor Konya is the very embodiment of Lohengrin, romantic in tone, secure in technique. William Dooley will doubtless sing Telramund with more subtlety and insight in years to come, but it is not likely that he will sing it with greater beauty and opulence of tone, or with more musicianly approach, accuracy of pitch, or solid satisfaction throughout than he achieves here.

Jerome Hines is still a very impressive King Henry, and Calvin Marsh as the Herald (as Boris Goldovsky says, "by no means a comprimario part") is perfection itself, and the finest Herald I've ever heard.

Only the two women are not entirely satisfactory. Lucine Amara, who was a substitute for the announced Leontyne Price as Elsa, has not quite enough voice for the part, and is sorely taxed in portions of the score.

Rita Gorr should be one of the best Ortruds around, but she evidently was not in her best condition when the recording was made, for some of her top notes, too, are exceedingly effortful.

Even so, this is a highly impressive recording, and one not likely to be duplicated for some time to come.

The El Paso Times
D. 58,250 SUN. 82,050
SEPT 1 1 1966

The second masterpiece, this one released in this August, is RCA Victor's Lohengrin, the first un-cut recording of this great work by Richard Wagner, the first major opera recorded in this country since 1958, the first time a major American orchestra has recorded a complete opera since the days of Toscanini and the NBC symphony and the first recording of a complete Wagner opera in the western hemisphere (LSC 6710).

It is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. In the major roles are Sandor Konya, tenor, as Lohengrin; Lucine Amara, soprano, as Elsa of Brabant; William Dooley, baritone, as Frederick of Telramund; Rita Gorr, mezzo-soprano, as Frederick's wife, Ortrud; Jerome Hines, bass, as Henry the Fowler, king of German, and Calvin March, baritone, as the king's herald.

The Brabantian nobles' roles are sung by William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter and Eugene Thamon and in the roles of the pages are Helen Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller and Batyah Godrey, plus 180 singer of the augmented Boston Chorus Pro Musica directed by Alfred Nash Patterson.

The beautifully packaged album consists of five long-play records providing more than three and one-half hours of listening accompanied by a beautifully prepared book with biographies of the stars, an historical discussion of Wagner and his "Lohengrin," an illustrated description of the unusual score, an article on Leinsdorf as related to this opera, a description of the recording sessions, a resume of the plot of each of the three acts and, finally and most enjoyable, the complete German-English libretto, properly noted in relation to the recording.

It is a majestic recording, all leading roles being sung by Metropolitan Opera stars, the consistently most distinguished voice being that of Konya who brought to this session more than 200 previous performances as Lohengrin, upon which his international reputation is based.

A great strength of this full recording is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills its opportunity to achieve the sometimes lengthy but always beautiful musical passages including the opening Prelude, as written by Wagner. Thus, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony share star honors in this work which is both great music and great drama.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 246,714
SEP 1 7 1966

OFF THE RECORD

RCA, Columbia Lead Off With Blockbuster Albums

By DURWOOD McALISTER

Two major recording companies have kicked off their fall campaigns with blockbuster albums that demand a space on the shelf of any good music library.

RCA Victor turned to opera with an excitingly successful experiment. The opera, Wagner's "Lohengrin," is the first Wagnerian opera ever recorded in America and the result is most impressive.

Columbia chose to display one of its star performers, Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra, in a complete recording of the greatest symphonic vehicle, the nine symphonies of Beethoven. The choice was a fortunate one.

RCA's "Lohengrin" (Stereo LSC-6710) uses the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a cast of superb singers under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The chorus is the Boston Chorus Pro Musica.

The album represents a considerable financial gamble for RCA. Opera recordings are generally made in Europe because of the very high cost of producing them in the United States, but for this album, the producers pulled out all stops.

THE 104 REGULAR members of the Boston orchestra were augmented by 25 additional instruments. The 120-voice Pro Musica chorus was increased to 180 voices, a move that gives the opera a spaciousness lacking in previous recordings.

The recording was done in Boston's Symphony Hall after concert performances by the cast at Tanglewood. Elaborate technical preparations were required to maintain proper temperature in the sweltering August weather (air conditioners had to be turned off, of course, during the actual takes) and Maestro Leinsdorf had to keep his cast "up" for twelve two-a-day recording sessions. The album attests to the fact that he did his job well.

SANDOR KONYA'S brilliant Lohengrin is matched by outstanding performances by other members of the cast — Lucine Amara as Elsa, Jerome Hines as Henry the Fowler, William Dooley as Frederick, Rita Gorr as Ortrud and Calvin Marsh as the herald.

RCA's "Lohengrin" is unique in that it is a complete, uncut performance.

RCA deserves success in this venture, a success which may encourage more American-recorded opera albums.

Columbia's recording of Beethoven's nine symphonies is everything you would expect from the Philadelphians —plus.

The Dallas Morning News
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 237,192 SUN. 262,441
SEP 1 8 1966

Records in Review

By JOHN ARDOIN

'Lohengrin' in Boston

The new recording of "Lohengrin" just issued by RCA Victor (LSC 6710) is the sixth recording of the opera. The first two (on Urania and DGG) were routine affairs, but the third version was the charm. Recorded by London live during a performance at Bayreuth in 1953, it boasted a cast still unequalled for uniformity and excitement: Eleanor Steber, Astrid Varnay, Wolfgang Windgassen, Hermann Uhde and Josef Greindl.

The fourth set came from EMI and was distinguished primarily by the Lohengrin of Rudolf Shock. The next set was also from EMI, and it was the first stereo "Lohengrin," with a cast including Elisabeth Gruemmer, Christa Ludwig, Jess Thomas and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Rudolf Kempe's flesh and blood conducting and much of the solo work made this set the first serious challenge to the London set.

Now we have a sixth "Lohengrin," the second in stereo and one of the most expensive operatic recordings ever made. The reason for this is that it was recorded in America (usually a prohibitive practice) utilizing the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IT WAS, IN fact, the first repertory opera recorded on these shores since RCA persevered the Met production of "Macbeth" in 1958. The Victor set has the distinction of being the first completely uncut "Lohengrin" on record (it even restores the extension of Lohengrin's "In Fernam Land" which had been cut by Wagner).

The virtue of completeness is something each listener must solve to his own satisfaction. What is more notable here is the contribution of the Boston men. Rarely does one hear Wagner played so full-bodied and lyrically. It was quite a surprise, for under conductor Erich Leinsdorf the BSO has taken on an extremely tight, dry sound in recent seasons, but none plagues this recording. The answer must be Leinsdorf's tremendous affinity for the score, for he has rarely conducted with such expansiveness and love.

The cast is headed by tenor Sandor Konya in the title part, and his Lohengrin is a superb achievement: Noble, youthful and shining. His singing is the sort of Wagner belcanto one hears about but rarely hears.

FROM HERE on the story is a less happy one. Soprano Lucine Amara (an 11th-hour replacement for Leontyne Price) brings little presence or personality to Elsa. She gives us a drooping lily of a girl rather than a woman torn by doubt and distrust.

The singing of mezzo-soprano Rita Gorr as Ortrud is simply painful above the staff where so much of the role lies. There can be no doubt that Miss Gorr caught the dramatic message of the role, but she is not vocally up to delivering it.

Another important role which was poorly cast was that of Telramund. American baritone William Dooley brings less vocal weight and malevolence to the part than even the light-weight Fischer-Dieskau for EMI. RCA would have been better advised to have used Calvin Marsh (who sings the Herald) as Telramund. Finally, King Henry is sung by bass Jerome Hines who sounds disinterested in the whole proceedings.

On the positive side, however, the singing of the Boston Chorus Pro Musica is all one could want. It is a pity that what could have been a major phonographic contribution is flawed in many important areas. As far as "Lohengrin" is concerned one must continue to set a course by the old London set.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
AUG 22 1966

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 177,755
AUG 2 2 1966

Boston Symphony's

By Richard J. Cattani

We tend to think of opera in terms of the histronics — the trumpery, the overblown sentiments, the posturing. Yet, it is always the gentler qualities that make it winning. Bravura style becomes grotesque without genuineness, without a trueness in the feelings expressed.

Happily, in the discs reviewed below, not only does the music reach toward the heart, but the artistry is such that it gets there.

Wagner, "Lohengrin": Kónya, Amara, Gorr, Dooley, Hines, Marsh; Boston Chorus Pro Musica; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting. (RCA, stereo LSC-6710).

The Boston Symphony's new "Lohengrin" is an important recording event. It is not only highly listenable on its own, but it also marks the first complete opera recording in America since the Toscanini-NBC days. Will there be more?

The project began several years ago as an idea, and a year and a half ago in detail. A live run was made in August, 1965, at Tanglewood. It was done then in three parts. A 12-day recording session followed at once at Boston's Symphony Hall.

The preparations were sizable. The orchestra was increased from 104 to 129 players, and the Boston Chorus Pro Musica from 120 to 180 voices. With the singers filling the stage, the orchestra was moved to the floor of the house. Four separate conductors synchronized the efforts of the mass of performers. Fourteen portable air conditioners were used to cut the August heat and to control the amount of water in the air. Plywood sound baffles were installed.

The successes of the efforts are notably:

- The singing of Sándor Kónya as Lohengrin. From the mement the Hungarian tenor arrives with the swan, we hear a rare moment in opera history. No other modern singer brings such mystery and tenderness, such sustained vocal light and spaciousness to the role.
- The superb amplitude and clarity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are here grandly put to operatic use. Also the reproductive dynamics of the discs are surprisingly full and distinct.
- The musical direction of conductor Erich Leinsdorf is sound. So much of the Boston maestro's career has been devoted to the German operatic repertoire that there is a fine logic to his undertaking this "Lohengrin."

The singing, particularly of American baritones William Dooley (Telramund) and Calvin Marsh (Herald) is excellent. However, if it is true, as Wagner said, that the substance of the opera lies in Elsa's heart, we should have misgivings. Lucine Amara's singing of the role, secure as it is vocally, does not reflect the dramatic conflicts Elsa undergoes—let alone sustain the richness of Wagner's entire conception.

The Birmingham News
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
D. 177,433 SUN. 221,429
AUG 1 4 1966

New 'Lohengrin' as done by Leinsdorf is moving experience

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

"LOHENGRIN" — A profoundly moving musical and emotional experience awaits music lovers in the magnificent new recording of Wagner's opera, released this month by RCA-Victor. The five-record album, with a running time of three hours and 35 minutes, is the first absolutely completely recording ever made of "Lohengrin," to my knowledge.

It is the first American recording of the Wagner opera. And the first complete opera recording by a major American orchestra since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony.

And it is sung by a distinguished cast, with Sandor Konya, probably the best of the contemporary Lohengrins, in the title part, singing with soprano Lucine Amara as Elsa, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, Jerome Hines as the King of Germany, William Dooley as Frederick of Telramund, and others from the Metropolitan and other leading opera companies.

Under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the cast, 180-voice chorus and Boston Symphony Orchestra bring some glorious moments of Wagner's powerfully rich and dramatic music, enhanced by the Dynagroove stereo process. Deluxe edition with handsome book enclosures, a work of art. This surely will take its place as one of the major recordings of today.—(RCA-VICTOR).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,785
AUG 30 1966

record shop

Wagner Record Smash Of Year

LUCINE AMARA consults with Erich Leinsdorf during the recording of Lohengrin, with Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony.

By JOAN CROSBY

NEW YORK — It may take three hours, 35 minutes and 32 seconds to hear, and it may cost $23.99 for the set ($28.99 if you have stereo), but it's the recording event of the year.

It's RCA-Victor's complete, superlative recording of Wagner's Lohengrin, a performance that will enchant even non-Wagnerians. Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, William Dooley, Rita Gorr and Jerome Hines are in excellent voice and the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, is suitably sonorous.

The album is notable in that it is the first opera recorded in the United States since 1958 (costs are lower in Europe), and it is also the first time since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony, that a major American orchestra has recorded a complete opera.

Wagner once wrote to Liszt, "If cuts are made, the chain of comprehension will be torn asunder." The chain of comprehension is not torn asunder in this set. Neither is total enjoyment.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 279,780 SAT. 292,741
AUG 1 3 1966

Disc Data

A New, Thrilling 'Lohengrin'

Sets Standard for Excellence

By NELL LAWSON

Excellent news for opera lovers, a major release in the summertime — a stunning RCA Victor five-record album of Wagner's "Lohengrin," recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Eric Leinsdorf, who proves again his magnificent versatility.

When the "bests" of the year are totted up, this is certain to be among them, even offering the first complete version of the "Anhang" following the third act Grail narrative, as Wagner originally intended.

It also sets a new standard of excellence in the quality of vocalists and recording techniques.

American soprano Lucine Amara gives a lyrical performance as Elsa, a character often tiresome to this listener. She stresses pure lyricism in the Italian opera style.

Sandor Konya in the title role is inspired. Others: Baritone William Dooley, mezzo Rita Gorr, bass Jerome Hines and baritone Calvin March.

Others in the huge cast are nothing less than brilliant, especially the Boston Pro Musica Chorus under Alfred Nash. A boxed album with huge accompanying libretto, etc. with full-color cover-photograph of the participants during rehearsal. Stereo LSC-6710. Mono also.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 718,221 SUN. 699,943
SEP 1 8 1966

First Complete 'Lohengrin'

Records

Another "Lohengrin?"

RCA Victor has released a five-disk complete album (LM 6710).

And it is another "Lohengrin"—one of great importance for years to come. As the first complete recording of the opera, even omitted lines of the hero's "In fernem Land" of Act III have been restored.

This would have delighted the composer. In a letter to Liszt, Wagner wrote, "If cuts are made, the chain of comprehension will be torn asunder."

It has not been torn asunder, a tribute to Erich Leinsdorf.

The 104 regular members of the Boston Symphony were augmented by 25 instrumentalists, and the Boston Pro Musica Chorus of 120 members, under direction of Alfred Nash Patterson, was increased to 180.

Then there were the principals. Hungarian tenor Sandor Konya sang Lohengrin. Lucine Amara was Elsa; William Dooley sang Frederick; Rita Gorr was Ortud; Jerome Hines was Henry, and Calvin Marsh was the King's herald.

Leinsdorf never lets them out of hand. He said of the opera, "My concept is that Lohengrin is a romantic fairy tale." And that is what has been created here.

* * *

The Cleveland Press
D. 370,759
AUG 5 1966

Boston's "Lohengrin" Praised for Insights

By Jim Frankel

RCA Victor's new recording of "Lohengrin" is the fourth complete edition on LP records, and in several essential respects, the best.

Its strongest feature is the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf, who once tarried at Severance Hall for a couple of years. Over and over throughout the 3 hours and 35½ minutes of this meandering masterwork, the richness and brilliance of the BSO provides new insights and musical delights.

This BSO recording is a major event. It has been eight years since the last complete opera was recorded on commercial discs in the U. S. That, too, was an RCA product, Verdi's "Macbeth," with the Met Opera.

"LOHENGRIN" WAS RECORDED just one year ago following a rather controversial weekend performance at the Berkshire Festival. Critics complained because RCA and the BSO were "using" Tanglewood as a rehearsal for a recording.

THIS IS AN ABSURD ARGUMENT. This sort of thing is always being done, including here at Severance Hall. Certainly, no first class musical organization is going to give a rehearsal-type performance. It is going to perform the very best it can.

The new "Lohengrin" is also the best aurally, I think. The sound is very good, although it needn't have been so faithful at Lohengrin's entrance which is via swan at the back of the stage.

THE NEW "LOHENGRIN" is more complete than the other "complete" versions, for it contains a beautiful bonus passage at the end of Lohengrin's name-naming narrative, "In Fernem Land." This section, called the "Anhang" by Composer Richard Wagner, has been cut because it is dramatically anti-climactic, coming after our hero tells his identity. This may be so, but the public has been denied a lovely chunk of music—until now. This includes the Bayreuth recording.

NOW TO THE WEAKNESSES: Some of the principals are not effective. Lucine Amara is just not the right Elsa. Her rich voice is too small and intimate for the broad dramatic singing required. Full power is needed, and full power she lacks.

As Lohengrin, however, Sandor Konya, is as good as you will hear these days. A Melchior he is not, but his heldentenor has steel power which he projects ably and without shouting.

AS THE VILLAINS, Baritone William Dooley is a dull and not very wicked Telramund, while Rita Gorr is a first-rate vixen as his wife, Ortrud. She tends to shout a bit when she gets excited, however. Jerome Hines is just competent as King Henry of Brabant.

THE CLASSICS

Despite the several weakness of the principals, this is a memorable recording if only to hear Wagner played in all the glory it deserves.

Perhaps Columbia will answer its competitor with a George Szell-Cleveland Orchestra Wagner production. Someone should record Szell's magnificent "Meistersinger" before it is too late. Sure it's expensive, but one man who can sell Wagner is Szell.

179

The Sacramento Union
California's Oldest Daily Newspaper
D. 55,423 SUN. 50,580

SEP 25 1966

Opera Pressing Sets Precedent

As the first recording in the United States of a major opera since the end of World War II, a recording of "Lohengrin" by Richard Wagner (RCA Victor LM/LSC-6710) is worthy of special consideration for a number of reasons.

The fact that it was recorded in the United States rather than abroad makes it the most expensive opera recording in history.

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra as "the pit orchestra" for the occasion, this performance offers a standard of orchestral playing not likely ever to be encountered in the opera house.

Complete Work

A third feature of this recording that sets it apart from both live performances and other recordings is its completeness. Sections traditionally cut in the opera house have been restored.

So far, so good, but what about the performance? Does it justify the expense and the obviously painstaking care that went into it? For the most part, the answer is yes.

Erich Leinsdorf, the regular conductor of the Boston and a veteran of a quarter of a century in directing Wagner's operas, has a wonderful way with the score.

Steady Pace

Eschewing the easy approach of playing up the mid-19th century rhetoric of the opera, he offers a reading that stresses the formal structure and moves along with a firm and steady pace.

The orchestra plays sumptuously in the big, showy scenes and with finesse in the smaller-scaled episodes.

Sandor Konya, in the title role, is magnificent. He is a superb heldentenor with a fine, ringing voice that negotiates easily the tessitura of the part.

Not only is he fine as the knight in shining armor when he makes his entrance as Elsa's champion, but he is equally at home in the more poignant episodes.

Take for example, the beautifully-nuanced mezzo-voice singing in "Ihr Hortet Alle," when he denounces Elsa for breaking her vow to him.

If Konya is the strongest member of the cast, his leading lady is the weakest.

Out Of Place

Elsa is a lyric soprano, but she is a more complex heroine than Lucinne Amara projects in her performance. Neither vocally or dramatically is she convincing as the pure and radiant maiden. She is Mimi, forever Mimi, and she is out of place in Wagner's Brabant.

As King Henry, Jerome Hines produces a basso that is full of authority, beautifully-colored and dramatically convincing.

Calvin Marsh, who sings the Herald, and Rita Gorr, who sings Ortrud, have one thing in common. Both reveal a sense of strain in the upper registers. Miss Gorr, however, produces some good singing in the lower registers and is dramatically alert, while Marsh is just adequate.

As Frederick, William Dooley offers consistently acceptable singing but reveals a characterization not entirely formed.

Boston Chorus

Some splendid choral singing is offered by the Boston Chorus Pro Musica—precise in intonation, rhythmically alive and well-blended in music.

Since the chorus is an important element in this opera, it adds another distinction to the many inherent in this offering.

The Dynagroove sound is wonderfully alive and brilliant.

R. D. S.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 68,000 S. 72,000

SEPT. 25 1966

New Records in

By Les Zacheis

Classical

The very first recording in America of a complete reading of Wagner's "Lohengrin" can only be acclaimed as an artistic triumph of the highest quality. Crowded into the grooves of 5 LPs, the set is by the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pro Musica chorus and soloists, all under the brilliant direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

ZACHEIS

The recording was made in Boston's Symphony Hall, following hard on the heels of a concert performance at Tanglewood.

Singing the title role is the fine tenor, Sandor Konya, supported by Lucine Amara as Elsa, Baritone William Dooley as Frederick of Telramund, Mezzo Rita Gorr as Ortrud and Jerome Hines as Henry, King of Germany.

It has been known for some time that European orchestras were being eclipsed in quality by American orchestras. It may now be pointed out that this recording sets a new high standard for opera that the continental opera mills will be hard pressed to equal.

The sound is absolutely sumptuous, and the soloists come through with amazing clarity, with the intense Wagnerian orchestral score bursting with a richness and color that sets new standards.

The more familiar passages like the Procession into the cathedral, the wedding march and the Act 3 prelude offer the listener new and unsuspected beauty of shadings and tonal tapestries.

A lavish libretto book in blazing color accompanies the plushy boxed set. (RCA-Victor).

* * *

The New Haven Register
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
D. 102,218 SUN. 115,186

AUG 21 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 115,186
AUG 21 1966

RECORDS

Boston 'Lohengrin' Superlative

WAGNER: LOHENGRIN, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin Marsh, Boston Chorus Pro Musica. (RCA LM 6710; Stereo LSC 6710).

Franz Liszt conducted the premiere performance of "Lohengrin" 166 years ago this August 28 in Weimer, Germany. His forces included an "augmented" orchestra of 38 musicians and a chorus of less than 30. Erich Leinsdorf's re-creation of the work for RCA Victor includes an augmented Boston Symphony of some 129 players and the Boston Chorus Pro-Musica enlarged for the occasion to 160 voices.

When one considers the fact that in the score Wagner asks for 32 off-stage players alone in Act III (aside from the main orchestra) one must wonder how Liszt ever managed to get through the premiere of this mammoth work at all. The orchestral writing is symphonic in its largest meaning, and Wagner's choral writing is both sumptuous and grand in conception.

ARTS

The Boston Symphony, for the most part, is magnificent—and herein lies the personality of this RCA version. The orchestra is the musical core of this work, and the Boston Symphony gives the music a spaciousness and nobility which is really quite singular in terms of either live or recorded performances heretofore. Leinsdorf is a first rate opera conductor (he was a specialist in German repertoire at the "Met" before going to Boston) and his conception of this music contains a coolness and almost detached objectivity which gives the performance a silvery fairy-tale quality that is quite moving, and only occasionally a let-down in its lack of intensity or fire.

The soloists are for the most part disappointing, however, with the exception of Sandor Konya, who is well known for his interpretation of the title role. His singing is the vocal high point of the album, and aside from his fine voice and good intonation he gives the added dividend of projecting a point of view of the character he portrays. Even with the obvious limitation of a recorded performance one feels a sense of character through his "vocal acting." Miss Amara, as Elsa, is disappointing in this latter respect, although her voice is generally well controlled, and Rita Gorr, who portrays Ortrud's hatefulness admirably, exhibits a pinched sound and bad intonation in the upper register which is difficult to take even in the dramatic context of her part.

The only comparable "Lohengrin" on the market is Rudolf Kempe's version on Angel. For excitement and overall vocal quality—both soloists and chorus—Kempe's version is on the whole better. The soloists are uniformly good in this version, recorded in Vienna, and the chorus of the Vienna State Opera is really quite superior to the Boston Pro Musica for this music. Their diction is magnificent and their familiarity with the Wagnerian style obvious.

On the other hand, the warmth and presence in the Leindorf recording is far superior to the Angel version. It was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall, and although there is occasionally too much echo, the overall technical job is excellent with some wonderful synchronization of off-stage effects. Also, the Boston Symphony, though not trained in the Wagnerian style, has a sheen and transparency that sets it quite apart from the Vienna Orchestra. For magnificance of sound, orchestral supremacy, and Sandor Konya's Lohengrin, this new RCA Victor version (which is the first completely uncut version ever recorded) has much to recommend it. It is certainly a qualified—if not definitive—success.

Gordon Emerson

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,393 SUN. 693,178

AUG 1 1966

ROBERT MARSH

Stereo And Hi-Fi

'LOHENGRIN' IN BOSTON

The new RCA-Victor album of Wagner's "Lohengrin," LSC 6710, is one of the most perfectly achieved operatic recordings to appear in several seasons. The cast is a fine one—you would be lucky to do as well in any major opera house of the world today. The level of orchestral performance is exceptional in every respect, and why not, it's the Boston Symphony on home ground in all its glory.

But the real victory goes to the recording crew, headed by Richard Mohr, and conductor Erich Leinsdorf, who reminds us forcefully, that he can control the development of 3½-hour music drama with a security and authority unsurpassed since the death of his sometime mentor, Arturo Toscanini.

This is a beautiful set, both in its format and its sound. For opera collectors it is clearly one of the major events of the year. Historically it is of interest on two very substantial counts. First, although we have had four previous "Lohengrin" recordings that gave the complete text as generally presented in the theater, this is the first absolutely complete version with the "Anhang" following the third act Grail narrative as Wagner originally intended.

The Wichita Sunday
Eagle and Beacon
WICHITA, KANS.
SUN. 158,842

SEP 18 1966

Checking the Records

'Lohengrin' Could Be Top Recording of 1966

By DEWEY ANDERSON

When major American recording events for the year are tallied up, the Boston Symphony may well walk off with top honors.

Foremost in the BSO's fall lineup is the first American recording of a Wagner opera, "Lohengrin" (RCA Victor LM-LSC-6710). It is in addition the first opera to be recorded at all in this country since 1958, the first complete opera since Toscanini, and the first complete Wagner opera to be recorded in this hemisphere.

RECORDED following live performances at the Tanglewood Festival, "Lohengrin" features Sandor Konya in the title role, Lucine Amara as Elsa, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, William Dooley as Frederick and basso Jerome Hines in the role of King Henry. The augmented Boston Chorus Pro Musica furnishes the massive choral sections and Erich Leinsdorf conducts the 300 participants.

Let there be no mistake that the gigantic undertaking meets with major success! Leinsdorf pulls the performance through at a pace that never lags and with a generally high level of musical accomplishment. Konya steals every honor for seasoned reading as Lohengrin. Throughout his range the production is even, lyric and yet dramatic. The other male roles are uniformly in character.

THE LADIES of the cast deserve a special word, however. Amara at first seems a strange choice for Elsa. The lyric quality for which she is famed is unusually light in terms of the usual Elsas one hears. Yet as the role deepens she calls upon dramatic qualities that serve doubly to convey the difficult role of a young girl caught in a web of intrigue that at last destroys both her innocence and her life.

Rita Gorr, sad to relate, is shrill and inflexible as Ortrud. Little of the dramatic possibility of the role is revealed, and her appearances become more bothersome as the opera progresses.

The Boston Chorus Pro Musica sings with spirit, good pitch and clarity, and excellent diction. Their sound is quiet young and without question superior to the average opera chorus.

RECORDING SESSIONS took place in Boston's Symphony Hall where most of the chairs on the main floor were removed to accommodate the orchestra while the chorus and soloists sang from the stage. A major reservation of the entire recording is that under these conditions the reverberation in the hall is too great. Quiet passages profit from the live sound, but the heavy sections become muddied and generally unclear.

Perhaps the best reason to recommend the recording, however, is just to hear what one of the world's great orchestras can do with a complete opera and Wagner at that.

ANOTHER COUP from Boston reveals "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players" (RCA Victor LM-LSC-6167). After the titanic size of Lohengrin," the eight chamber works played by 11 first desk men of the same orchestra demonstrate the virtuosity of the individuals lost in such an engulfing sound.

Prominent among the players here are violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer flute, Ralph Gomberg oboe, Gino Cioffi clarinet, and James Stagliano horn. Claude Frank is the pianist.

Two quartets of Mozart begin the "concert," one for flute and strings, the other for oboe and strings. Both are miracles of clarity and ensemble. The slow movement of the first is particularly memorable.

THE BRAHMS "Quartet in C Minor for Piano and Strings" follows with a virile reading. The piano part is at times unnecessarily prominent, but in general balance is good. The Beethoven "Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola" offers an excellent contrast to the program; it is light and superbly played.

Four shorter contemporary works complete the three-record set. Irving Fine's "Fantasia for String Trio" is a handsome and listenable 12-tone work. Copland's "Vitebsk - Study on a Jewish Theme" is little-known, but reaches expressive depths often missing in his larger works. Elliot Carter's "Woodwind Quintet" is classic in essence and pungently contemporary in language.

The largest work in terms of numbers of players is the concluding one, Piston's "Divertimento for Nine Instruments." It bubbles and flows with an easy grace and leaves the listener asking for more.

PROGRAM commentary is written by Peter Ustinov. His observations are throughtful and non-technical. A 10-inch "bonus" record offers conversation on the project with Ustinov, musical director Erich Leinsdorf and concertmaster Silverstein. The "conversation" somewhat pompous and repetitious, and Silverstein serves as little more than a disc-jockey for interspersed musical excerpts. The idea is basically a good one, but such excellent performances of such masterful works leave little room for an unnecessary sales pitch.

* * *

The Phoenix Gazette
D. 87,288

SEPT 2 1966

FOR THE FIRST time, Wagner's "Lohengrin" has been placed completely on wax. RCA Victor is proud of a new 5-LP version of the great opera that features the Boston Symphony and the 180-member Boston Chorus Pro Musica. The 3-hour, 35-minute production is the first U.S. recording of a Wagner opera, the first complete opera waxing by a major American symphony since the days of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. A jewel.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607
AUG 21 1966

RECORDS: A 'Lohengrin' With Every Note Wagner Wrote

By SUE YAGER

The eagerly awaited LOHENGRIN released this month by RCA Victor was two years in the planning and in many respects is a superb realization of Richard Wagner's exquisitely lyrical, stirringly romantic music-drama (mono and stero)

This is our first absolutely complete LOHENGRIN, containing every note Wagner wrote. Some of the prodigious vital statistics of the present recording: it covers 10 LP sides, runs three hours, thirty-five minutes, thirty-two seconds and involves more than 300 musicians (106 men of the Boston Sumphony Orchestra, chorus of 180 voices and 32 off-stage players) with nearly another 100 technicians. This compared to the debut performance of a hundred and sixteen years ago when Liszt gave LOHENGRIN in Weimar with 39 musicians!

Several 'Firsts'

This is the first major opera recorded in this country since RCA recorded Verdi's MACBETH with the Metropolitan Opera Association in 1959; the first time a major American orchestra has recorded a complete opera since Toscanini and the NBC Symphony; and marks the first American recording of a Wagner opera. The high cost of production is the answer to why companies must record in Europe, often with inferior musical forces. RCA Victor is to be generously applauded and appreciated for undertaking the enormous costs involved in the present recording.

On the heels of performances at Tanglewood where each of the three acts constituted a separate performance, the cast was moved to Symphony Hall in Boston where the recording took place in twelve three-hour sessions, taking six consecutive days to complete, August 1965. (Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Amara, Konya, Dooley, Gorr, Hines and Marsh in principal roles.)

In the handsome accompanying booklet other fascinating details on the physical side of making the album are included in an article titled "Lohengrin in Weimar and in Boston" by album producer, Richard Mohr.

Boris Goldowsky contributes an informative and entertaining look into the symbolism contained in the libretto and brief analysis of the musical merits that make LOHENGRIN "a major landmark in the history of orchestral and harmonic development."

IN STARRING ROLES—Lucine Amara and Sandor Konya sing one of the duets of Wagner's massive "Lohengrin" during one of the many recording sessions necessary to complete the three-and-one-half-hour, five-disc RCA album.

A CROWDED STAGE—To muster the massive musical might necessary for the marathon "Lohengrin" recording takes a bit of doing. Here, an aerial view gives an idea of the size of the ensemble gathered for the recording session: the 106-member Boston Symphony, the 180-voice Symphony Choir, a host of soloists—and, off-stage, 32 more musicians.

NOW THE PLAYBACK—Listening to a playback of their masterpiece are, from left, standing: tenor Sandor Konya, soprano Lucine Amara, audio coordinator Jack Pfeiffer and assistant to Leinsdorf Andrew Raeburn; seated are Richard Mohr, RCA producer, and Erich Leinsdorf.

TV CUE—Meanwhile, out in a corridor, an assistant conductor gives a brace of trumpeters their cue while he follows Leinsdorf via a TV monitor. In order to bring the brass into the act at precisely the right moment, the assistant had to conduct a fraction of a second ahead of the Boston Symphony maestro.

181

The Hartford Times
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 132,266

AUG 27 1966

This Week's Scene in Records

'Lohengrin' on Victor

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Last summer at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf presented the first uncut performance in America of Wagner's "Lohengrin" and now Victor has released the whole thing in a five-pocket set (LM or LSC-6710) with the same participants.

Needless to say, it represents one of the most ambitious projects ever attempted in this country and on several counts it is quite a stunning success. Certainly no opera house can boast an orchestra of the caliber of the Boston Symphony, which gives a magnificent account of itself. And the Boston Pro Musica Chorus is in superb form, singing throughout with both weight and clarity of texture.

Sandor Konya, I'm sure, is the finest Lohengrin of this generation. While he lacks the clarion tenor of Melchior, his tone is warmly and smoothly projected and he is always musicianly. I still have reservations about Lucine Amara's Puccini-like voice for Elsa, although she sounds better here than she did in the Tanglewood performance.

As Ortrud Rita Gorr has the vocal timbre for the part and does extremely well in the Second Act; in the Third Act she sometimes pushes the voice unmercifully. William Dooley's Telramund is not nearly as effective here as it was in the Music Shed. Jerome Hines is exactly right for King Henry, though he was not in particularly good voice at the time he was singing the role.

Leinsdorf, who considers Wagner "the greatest musical genius of the 19th Century," has evidently performed a labor of love and there is an attention to detail here worth of admiration. Sometimes, however, I miss the sweeping grandeur that one finds in Solti's Wagner recordings for London.

Victor's stereo sound has a breadth and warmth that will please the most demanding of stereophiles. Listen, for instance, to the double choruses of the Saxons and Brabantians.

* * *

ORFF: Carmina Burana, with Lucia Popp, Gerhard Unger, Raymond Wolansky, John Noble, and the New Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra under Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos (Angel 36333, mono or stereo). Carl Orff's popular neo-primitive score gets a highly disciplined performance under the young Spanish conductor. His fine rhythmic control, the excellent work of the Philharmonia chorus directed by Wilhelm Pitz, a brace of first-rate soloists, make this a recommendable version of "The Worldly Songs of the Benediktbeuren Monastery" (as the work is subtitled). The sound is spacious, rather than closely miked, which gives the whole thing a concert hall aura.

SONGS OF GRANADOS: with Montserrat Caballe, soprano, and a Symphony Orchestra under Rafael Ferrer (Victor LM or LSC-2910). As she was in the earlier disc of zarsuela airs, Caballe is completely at home here and brings both understanding and vocal beauty to this brace of 17 songs by her countryman. Entitled "Canciones Amatorios" and "Tonadillas," they are an ingratiating cross-section of the composer's output. The conductor and an unnamed orchestra give her sympathetic support and the sound is first-rate.

BIZET: "L'Arlesienne" Suite No. 1, with the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell (Columbia MS-6877, ML-6277). Szell gives highly burnished readings of the Bizet suite and the even more popular Grieg "Peer Gynt" Suite. His sympathies seem to incline toward the Bizet, rather than the Grieg, which is given a more charming performance on the older Angel disc conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham (Angel 35445). However, Columbia's sound is silken on this new release.

BACH: Lute Suites No. 1 and 2, with Julian Bream, guitar (Victor LM or LSC-2896). Although these suites were written for the Baroque lute, Bream believes that the music "falls happier" on the guitar and he argues his case with impeccable musicianship and a communicative warmth that make this one of his most treasurable phonographic contributions. Victor has accorded him intimate reproduction that misses no subtle detail of interpretation.

THE MOLDAU AND OTHER FAVORITES: with the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein (Columbia MS-6879, ML-6279). Dvorak and Smetana are Bernstein's musical predilection in this disc that includes, besides Smetana's Moldau, Dances from "The Bartered Bride," Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture and two of the "Slavonic Dances." My favorite is the conductor's dynamic reading of the "Carnival" Overture.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 335,705 SUN. 392,378

AUG 21 1966

ONE YEAR AGO this week conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston symphony made musical history by recording the first complete version of the Wagner musical drama, "Lohengrin" (RCA Victor, LSC-6710, stereo; LM-6710, monaural). The lengthy work (3 hours, 35 minutes, 32 seconds) is now released on five long-playing records, boxed, containing a booklet with German-English libretto and a good deal of tasteful annotation. The production was deemed worthy of being preceded by a press packet, hailing it as the first American recording of a Wagner opera.

Why is it such a big deal? Because of the cost of recording in this country, opera generally, and Wagnerian opera particularly, has been commercially unfeasible. The field, therefore, has been left largely to the European orchestras, and not since the mid-1950s has there been a long opera recorded by a major American orchestra under its resident conductor.

The dress rehearsal for the six days of 2-a-day recording sessions was a Berkshire festival performance at Tanglewood, in which each of "Lohengrin's" three acts was given as a separate concert. After the last one, on August 22, 1965, the recording sessions began in Boston's Symphony hall the following day. Two-thirds of the seats on the hall's first floor were removed for the recording, and the 104 players of the Boston Symphony were set up there in their usual concert formation. On the stage was the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, augmented for the recording to 180 voices, and carefully prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson. Offstage—and sometimes out of the hall—were 25 additional musicians, brought into the action by closed circuit television monitors and led by assistant conductors (who picked up Leinsdorf's beat and brought them in ahead of their cues to avoid distressing time-lag caused by distance).

GIVEN THIS impressive array of musical talent, including a cast of principal singers who would do credit to any opera house; given, too, a master chef d'orchestre who had refined his techniques of conducting opera under Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini to make the work go; given, finally, a technical team of the first rank directed by Richard Mohr, and how could the project fail to be a major event in operatic recording? It could not fail, and it does not; this is a "Lohengrin" to make converts of the most hardened anti-Wagnerians.

The Boston symphony is a glorious instrument of many voices, and under Leinsdorf's ardent direction it sets forth the beauties of this opulent score with a distinction that has been captured superbly on the recording. At all times the chorus is extremely eloquent, but especially so in Act II. The sound of orchestra alone or with chorus and principals in full ensemble has at times a kind of radiance perfectly expressive of Leinsdorf's comment on the music: "It is almost as if there is a silver scrim over the whole score, and we are transported with no apparent effort to this never-never land of Swan Knights and magical transformations and a kind of pure 'good' and pure 'bad'."

SANDOR KONYA, a tenor of warmth and lyric intensity, sings the title role of the Knight of the Grail who appears in answer to her prayer to be Elsa's champion and husband. He projects his words with remarkable clarity, and brings a splendid fervor to the love scenes. Lucine Amara, soprano, sings—not quite conventionally, but effectively—the role of Elsa, the unfortunate girl who cannot keep her pledge that she will not ask Lohengrin to reveal his identity. The heavy role of Frederick of Telramund, the accuser of Elsa who finally is killed by Lohengrin, is sung somewhat unevenly by William Dooley, a baritone whose voice is lighter in Act I than it is in the other two acts.

Ortrud, the evil wife of Frederick, is sung with sufficient menace by Rita Gorr, mezzo-soprano, though she does a little screaming in the final pages of the score, where the tessitura is fiendishly difficult. Jerome Hines is vocally mighty and profound in the bass role of Henry the Fowler, king of Germany, who seeks to unite Saxony, Thuringia and Brabant against the eastern hordes. Calvin Marsh, a baritone of elegance and strength, sings the important role of the King's herald.

The accompanying booklet uses as motto a quotation from Franz Liszt, who brought off the premiere of "Lohengrin" with hopelessly inadequate performing forces at Weimar in August, 1850. Boris Goldovsky in an essay sets the work into historical perspective, adding a brief harmonic analysis of Wagner's technique of accomplishing harmonic movement through the use of pivot tones that is a little gem of exposition. His essay is followed by a brief interview of Erich Leinsdorf written by Warren B. Syer; then there is a note on the recording sessions by producer Richard Mohr, the standard synopsis, and the German-English libretto. Stewart Robb did the English version which is published by Schirmer, and it is in most respects an indifferent job.

This "Lohengrin" makes its mark as an engineering triumph and a precedent-setting historical event. Its claim to be the first complete version on discs is justified by inclusion of the section following the Grail narrative in the final scene (called the "Anhang" in the score) which is normally omitted in performance. Sandor Konya sings it beautifully. It is icing on the cake, another element contributing to the musical triumph of the recording.

RECORDING IN BOSTON'S SYMPHONY HALL—With two-thirds of the orchestra floor seats removed, the Boston Symphony surrounds conductor Erich Leinsdorf on the floor before the stage. Onstage, principal singers are disposed before a chorus of 180 voices. Unseen offstage are some 25 additional musicians led by assistant conductors. Closed-circuit television helped keep things in hand.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721

AUG 21 1966

New Records

Majestic Wagnerian Roll

By FLORESTAN CROCHE

AT the end of last August, as the concluding event in the Tanglewood Festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducted the first uncut version in the United States of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Utilizing his famous orchestra and an assemblage of world-famous operatic soloists, Leinsdorf presented (in concert performance) one act of the opera on each day of the final weekend of the Berkshire season. A few weeks later, with the same cast, he began the recording of the massive work.

ERICH LEINSDORF

It has now become available in a majestic five-record album released by R.C.A. Victor. Soloists are Sandor Konya as Lohengrin, Lucine Amara as Elsa, William Dooley as Frederick, Rita Gorr as Ortrud, Jerome Hines as Henry, and Calvin Marsh as the Herald, joined by the Boston Pro Musica Chorus (Alfred Nash Petterson, director), and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (R.C.A. Victor LSC 6710).

As in his Tanglewood performance, Leinsdorf's approach to "Lohengrin" is a brisk one. In the belief, perhaps, that slow and deliberate tempi are possible only in the opera house, graced by the presence of visual elements, of costume and dramatic action, he keeps the tempi going at a consistently quick pace. Never are the singers permitted to dawdle, and never are there instrumental passages which are exploited for their textural effects alone.

Instead everything is conceived in terms of the over-all structure of the opera, of the interplay of part, of the harmonic and contrapuntal schemes which have been so subtlely exploited by Wagner.

No Easy Task

And this is no easy task, for "Lohengrin" is written for a gargantuan orchestra and a huge chorus used antiphonally, as well as for 32 off-stage brasses. Yet so great are Leinsdorf's gifts of technical authority that the performance is one notable for its clarity of individual line, and for its well-controlled and judicious balance of the various vocal and instrumental sections.

There will be some, to be sure, who will criticize this reasoned and lucid approach to the score, and who will want a more expansive and passionate exposition of the emotional characteristics of Wagner's masterpiece which has been called the last of the great German Romantic operas.

Among the singers it is Konya whose performance is the most artistically convincing. Now at the height of his powers, he is probably the foremost Wagnerian tenor before the footlights today. Interestingly he is at his most impressive in moments of powerful outburst and over-declamation, where his voice soars forth with majesty and golden power.

Of comparable authority is the performance of William Dooley, his voice dark and richly sonorous.

Female Singer

The situation is less felicitous in the performance of the female singers. Lucine Amara as Elsa is appealingly lyrical, but there is a lightness and restraint in her tone quality and performance which seem inappropriate to the requirements of the role. Rita Gorr, while properly sensual and powerful in her portrayal, unfortunately occasionally produces phrases which are marred by inaccuracy of intonation or inconsistency of texture.

The true heroes of the performance are the orchestra, the chorus, and the off-stage groups under their conductors, Richard Woitach, Melvin Strauss, and Paul Calloway. (Calloway also performs the various organ parts in the score). Everything is crystal-clear, and in the massed moments of chorus and orchestra, there is a marvelous delineation of part between the instrumental and vocal forces, while retaining a sense of speciousness and dramatic urgency. The recorded sound is vibrant. This is, therefore, an important release, a significant addition to the LP catalogue.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 146,403 SAT. 134,613

AUG 20 1966

These We Like..

By ANTHONY CRESWELL
Journal Staff Writer

Concert

An important addition to the few available complete editions of Wagner's "Lohengrin" is that released a few days ago by RCA Victor. It has a number of things to commend it, not the least of which is an excellent cast, including Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, William Dooley, Rita Gore, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh. However, greatest credit for a truly outstanding performance must go to Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, who not only conducted sensitively and understandingly but also carried the burden of responsibility for the entire project. And a massive project Lohengrin is, this edition occupying five records and playing for more than three hours and a half. The chorus is the Boston Pro Musica, a group of 180 voices. Technically the sound is unusually clean and natural, the result, we are told, of the use of improved recording tape and advanced recording techniques. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6710.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
D. 47,000

AUG 27 1966

Sight-n-Sounds

Recordings

RCA-Victor has released a new recording of Lohengrin, in which Wagner's endless yet rich score is played with perfection and little imagination by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. According to critics, this album is brisk and businesslike, quite lacking in warmth. Singing by the principals, Sandra Kenya, Jerome Hines, Lucine Amara, and Rita Gorr ranges from good to very, very poor.

CHICAGO, ILL.
COMMUNITY REPORTER
W.-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

AUG 24 1966

PLATTER CHATTER

Victor has some superb and unusual offerings this week, starting with a magnificent five-disc complete recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin," the first opera recorded in this country in the past seven years, and at Symphony Hall in Boston with the great Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. The sonics are spinetingling, as is Sandor Konya's heroic and beautiful projection of the title role. Rita Gorr's "Ortud" is a powerful characterization as well. This album is the first in disc history to give virtually the entire opera without the usual cuts, especially Lohengrin's explanation of his background. A gem!

182

ELECTRONIC AGE

RCA Autumn 1965

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recording "Lohengrin" for RCA Victor

ELECTRONIC AGE

RCA Autumn 1965

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recording "Lohengrin" for RCA Victor

"Fisheye" camera lens view of New York's downtown financial district. To cope with the flood of paperwork that daily threatens to inundate them, businesses have turned to the computer. The Chase Manhattan Bank, for example, at 1 Chase Manhattan Plaza (largest structure in left foreground), employs 21 RCA computer systems to help process 2.5 million checks a day and to handle routine banking operations.

Published quarterly by RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA
30 Rockefeller Plaza
New York, N. Y. 10020

DAVID SARNOFF
Chairman of the Board
ELMER W. ENGSTROM
President
FRANK M. FOLSOM
Chairman, Executive Committee
JOHN Q. CANNON
Secretary
ERNEST B. GORIN
Treasurer

Editor
JULES KOSLOW

©1965, Radio Corporation of America—all rights reserved. For permission to reprint or reproduce any portion of the magazine, write to the Editor, Electronic Age, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, Room 5115, New York, N. Y. 10020. Printed in U. S. A. When requesting a change of address please include the code letters and numbers appearing with stenciled address.

Cover: At Symphony Hall in Boston, Erich Leinsdorf conduc as the Boston Symphony Orchestra records "Lohengrin" for RCA Victor. "Lohengrin" is the first major opera to be recorded in the United States in several years and the first Wagnerian opera ever recorded in this country. For more about this noteworthy musical event, turn to page 6.

plete distribution and promotional programs ever undertaken in the field.

The recorders are scheduled to be merchandised by RCA Victor dealers, many of whom have never been in the tape recorder business. To simplify their entry into this untapped market, the company is making available some imaginative merchandising and promotional aids, including "instant-demonstration" display centers that can help prove to the public — and the dealer — just how simple and adaptable today's tape recorder actually is.

Perhaps the most significant part of the program is the budgeting of an unprecedented $1 million for advertising and sales promotion during the September–December period when one-half of the total annual recorder sales normally are made. The magnitude of this campaign — which will use network TV, magazines, and newspapers — becomes apparent when it is pointed out that industry-wide sales of tape recorders last year totaled only $100 million. This saturation ad campaign has already been hailed by rival manufacturers as a major step in accustoming the public to the concept of the tape recorder itself.

RCA's total commitment to the recorder as the fourth major electronic instrument for the home — after television, radio, and the phonograph — has interesting connotations for the future. Home taping today is an aural medium, but already the imagination of the public is being stirred by the arrival of relatively high-priced "home video recorders" which record picture as well as sound.

More than 10 years ago, RCA demonstrated a developmental version of what some day may be a moderately priced home color video tape recorder. There has been considerable industry speculation that the company, in seeking to build an identity as a leader in home tape recorders, may be preparing for the day when this status complements its leadership in the field of television.

Tape has come a long way from its start as a secret weapon. Nevertheless, its versatility and appeal as a mass-market home instrument have been kept secret too long. ■

The Recording of an Opera

Behind the scenes with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the recording of "Lohengrin."

by Mary Campbell

Soprano Lucine Amara and tenor Sandor Konya.

For nearly an entire week last August, Symphony Hall in Boston looked as though some bustling housewife had decided to clean the closets in her house, had put everything out all over the floor, and left it just like that.

The lobby was an untidy grove of potted artificial trees with white blooms, a few statues such as found around small pools, and superfluous maroon doors leaning on the walls, each marked for its proper place by a stuck-on piece of paper — "Mass Ave Side Center Door Left Side."

Hallways were no better. Head-high fans turned the side halls into hot-air tunnels, and thick cables snaked along the floor. Inside the refined, elegant hall, tall plyboard strips rested on the floor and leaned against the first balcony, forming makeshift side walls. A huge, red, faded dropcloth hung from the back of the balcony, and another dropcloth covered a stage full of empty folding chairs. Seats in the orchestra section were missing all the way back to Row X.

But in that space of missing seats from Row X forward sat the Boston Symphony, in shirtsleeves, with their conductor Erich Leinsdorf facing them on a podium. Across the front of the stage, facing two microphones, stood four soloists from the Metropolitan Opera — a soprano with a heldentenor and a mezzo-soprano with a baritone.

In the midst of apparent chaos and a few onlookers in the balcony, these artists knew exactly what they were doing and, ignoring their surroundings, they were expertly going about doing it. They were recording the full, uncut "Lohengrin," the first major opera to be recorded in America in several years (how many years depends on which of several modern operas recorded here are considered of major importance) and the first Wagnerian opera ever recorded in this country.

Herman D. Kenin, president of the American Federation of Musicians, found the occasion so auspicious that he came from Chicago on one of the six days of recording to listen. He made a brief speech congratulating RCA Victor and the participants on the undertaking, saying that he hoped the general argument for recording operas in Europe instead of America — that orchestral musicians are paid less in Europe — will be refuted by sales of made-in-America "Lohengrin."

Soprano Lucine Amara and tenor Sandor Konya, both with feet astride and firmly planted, stood facing a microphone at stage left — she with outstretched arms gracefully waving in time to the music, fingers crossed on both hands, and he with right hand pumping up and down, right hand in a fist, knit shirt pulled up to midchest, revealing an expanse of undershirt. Although they stood side by side, they never looked at each other; they were completely intent on singing the opera's first love duet by Elsa and Lohengrin.

In the opera, beautiful, blonde Elsa is accused, on a riverbank, before a king, of having murdered her brother. Lohengrin, in silver armor, riding a boat pulled by a swan, arrives to say that he will fight Elsa's accuser, thus proving her innocent. And he will marry her — if she will trust him completely and never ask his name or origin. She promises, but soon after the marriage ceremony is enticed to ask the forbidden questions. Lohengrin then reveals that he is a knight of the Grail, who now must leave her, and the swan is her brother, who had been put under a spell.

Recording an opera, like shooting a movie, is not done from beginning to end. "Lohengrin," whose three acts are divided into 11 scenes, was recorded by scene. Three hours

Erich Leinsdorf and some members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RCA Victor, long the leader in the field of classical music, offers one of the industry's most impressive lists of opera recordings. Displayed here are some of the notable opera albums RCA Victor has released.

in the afternoon and three in the evening were scheduled, Monday through Saturday — 36 hours of recording for a 3-hour-and-45-minute opera.

When Miss Amara and Konya finish their duet, baritone William Dooley, as Elsa's accuser, Telramund, and mezzo Rita Gorr, as Ortrud, his wife, who later gets Elsa into trouble, begin to sing. They face a mike at stage right, since, on a stage at that moment, the two couples would not be near each other. On the stereo record, their voices will come from separate speakers. Jerome Hines also will be heard on the recording, as the king, and Calvin Marsh, as the king's herald.

The scene finished, conductor Leinsdorf settles back on the high red leather chair on his red felt-topped podium and turns to a little box on a tripod at his right side. The red light on the box goes out, indicating that sounds in Symphony Hall are no longer being recorded. Leinsdorf picks up a telephone, also on the box, to talk with Richard Mohr, RCA Victor's producer for the "Lohengrin" recording, whose background in opera record production extends back to work with Toscanini. Mohr and Leinsdorf's musical assistant Andrew Raeburn have been sitting in the control room, simultaneously listening, poring over orchestral scores, conferring and making notes on the score to indicate why and how a certain passage has to be rerecorded.

Mohr says that measure 48A should be "a little softer in the harp part," and Leinsdorf tells the harpists they'll "play it with one harp instead of two." He also tells one instrumentalist that his "B flat is a little high in the fourth bar of 48B." They all get set to do it again, from the measure in the score marked "47" to the end of the scene.

However, it is clear that, over-all, "Lohengrin" is not being conducted by committee. Leinsdorf is definitely in charge. Once, stopping the music to correct a singer's tempo for the second time, he says, "I know you are singing it at the traditional tempo, but that is not what I consider the right tempo, and we are going to do it over until we get it the way I say."

Only a linguist, however, could understand all of the Vienna-born conductor's statements. He speaks to Miss Amara and Dooley, both Californians, in English. She answers in English, and Dooley, who has done most of his singing for the past eight years in Germany, answers in German. Leinsdorf speaks to Konya, who is Hungarian, in German, and Konya answers in English. He speaks to Miss Gorr, who is Belgian, sometimes in German and sometimes in French, and she answers in French.

The soloists talk to each other in English, except Miss Gorr and Dooley, who converse in French. Leinsdorf is apt to speak a few words of Italian to his orchestra, chide them with "Now you know you don't understand German" when they laugh at one of Dooley's remarks, and make himself the butt of his own joke when his heavily accented English is misunderstood and the orchestra starts playing in the wrong place in the score. He says, "Thirty-eight . . . thirty-eight. I'm going to take diction lessons, I promise you, probably from Shakespeare in the park."

Finally, Leinsdorf calls a 20-minute break and everybody scatters. Leinsdorf and soloists climb to the back upstairs room, which serves as the control room, to listen to the playback. There, amid piles of boxes of vinyl tape reels, two technicians operate tape machines, recording on 30-inch-per-second tape. A roll lasts 15 minutes. Most scenes to be recorded run longer than that, so the second man starts his machine before the first has completely filled his tape.

Listening to playback are (left to right) Sandor Konya, Lucine Amara, producer Richard Mohr, and musical director Erich Leinsdorf and his musical assistant, Andrew Raeburn. Dynagroove expert Jack Pfeiffer is in background.

An engineer has been sitting at a large console watching pointers on dials that indicate the sound level at each microphone and turning knobs to regulate the sound levels and to mix or not mix sound for stereo separation.

During the playback, Leinsdorf makes suggestions to the soloists. He tells Miss Amara that she sang a part of the score too passionately. When Richard Woitach, assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, in Boston to help with the recording by conducting off-stage musicians and coaching Miss Amara on her part, walks into the room, she explains, "I sang this too dark; I must sing it more maidenly."

Before they go out to rehearse the lines, less passionately, with a piano, Miss Amara and Konya pose for photographers. "Don't be afraid to hold her," Miss Amara's manager tells Konya. And somebody makes a pun, "What do you want him to be? A holdentenor?"

At break time, orchestra members might go to one of three rooms — a large one behind the stage for tuning up and practicing, a hall-like space half a flight down where concertmaster Joseph Silverstein could be found with his violin resting against his lap and chest while he reached around it to play cards, and a basement room where a waitress dispensed coffee and doughnuts. The basement is otherwise stacked with instrument cases and boxes for traveling and a metal cabinet plastered with the sign, "Happy Birthday, Beethoven."

Also during the breaks, 14 air-conditioning units are turned on to combat the late summer heat. These had been thrust, seven on each side, into doorjambs on the first balcony after the doors had been labeled and removed. The units could not operate during the recording because of noise of the motors but during breaks they ran at top speed, complete with hoses to drain condensed humidity into buckets in the halls and with powerful fans to blow the hot air down the corridors, away from the stage end and toward the back of the hall. The temperature in one of the business offices opening off a balcony hall registered 106 degrees F. one afternoon during a recording break.

Concertmaster Silverstein remembers a scientific test conducted one season on the Boston Symphony which indicated that the orchestra's sound is best in an atmosphere of between 71 and 78 degrees F. Above 78, metal instruments tend to go sharp, and, when humidity accompanies the heat, stringed instruments go flat.

Conscious of the optimum temperature, orchestra members kept a thermometer with them all during the recording. Sessions usually lasted 40 minutes, with a 20-minute rest every hour, but during one 80-minute-straight session, which was followed by a 40-minute break, they noted a temperature increase from 68 to 83 degrees F. in the hall.

The 104 members of the orchestra were augmented for the recording by 25 additional musicians, most of them performing as off-stage instruments. These people, of course, could not see Leinsdorf's conducting, so a TV camera set up behind the French-horn players automatically photographed him. Closed-circuit TV sets were watched by two "tower trumpets" on folding chairs in the nearly dark left hall, and two "vassal trumpets" in the right hall upstairs.

Beyond a door at the left rear of the stage sat two flutists and two oboists. When it is almost time for them to play, conductor Woitach quietly opens the door — Symphony Hall acoustics are so good they will be heard as off-stage instruments without the use of a mike — and himself facing Leinsdorf on the TV monitor, he conducts his four men. Their part over, he cautiously shuts the door to the stage. As he starts up a back stairway to listen from the control room, one of the oboists forlornly calls, "Keep in touch."

Woitach's conducting was designed to solve one of the problems of recording — the time lag of sound. If off-stage musicians simply had followed Leinsdorf's beat, by the time their sound had traveled through the door onto the stage and then across the stage to the microphones, they would have sounded hopelessly behind. As it was, Woitach had to figure out how to conduct ahead of Leinsdorf, so that off-stage sound would arrive precisely at the correct time.

The relatively slow speed of sound also was a big problem facing the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, which sang the choral parts of the opera. Soloists' scenes were scheduled for the 2 to 5 P.M. sessions, and all scenes requiring chorus were scheduled for 7 to 10 P.M., since the Chorus Pro Musica is a semiprofessional group whose members are employed as everything from typists to radiologists during the daytime.

As the chorus — which has recorded and has sung the Verdi "Requiem" with the Boston Symphony and has sung premieres of Britten's "War Requiem" in Tanglewood, Boston, and New York — stands on the stage and sings, it is some 75 feet from Leinsdorf and 30 feet behind the orchestra. When its sound arrives late, Leinsdorf stops the chorus for immediate retakes.

While the chorus sings the last 10 minutes of Act I, chorus director Alfred Nash Patterson explains that the normally 120-voice group was increased — by diligently advertising and screening 460 persons — to 180. They not only had to be able to sing, practice, and study German with Irmgard Zeitler nightly since April but they also had to be able to spend the week before the recording week at Tanglewood, where the same people making the record performed "Lohengrin" an act at a time for three nights.

The schedule set up for the week of recording was maintained, as chorus and orchestra strived mightily to perform without errors, and soloists remained in remarkably good voice all through the week.

Miss Amara also seemed to be in constant good spirits, charming some girls in the chorus during a break with an animated description of a pair of slacks, asking Mrs. Konya at a playback whether her enunciation was all right, admitting that not only does she sing with her fingers crossed but she listens to her own recordings the same way, brightly explaining to Dooley why she has never sung the part of Elsa before. "I'm not that gullible, why should I sing the role of such a gullible person?"

She asks Leinsdorf after one scene has been recorded whether she can try it again from No. 55. Leinsdorf replies, "I didn't like to ask you, but I'd be delighted." Then to the orchestra, "I don't want to tire her out, she is so brave. Everybody watch it."

Dooley, currently in his third season at the Met, is singing Telramund for the first time and also participating in his first opera recording. Telramund, he says, is still too heavy a role for him at 31, and he does not intend to sing it on stage for several more years. "Recording is a new discipline and type of work for me," he says, "more difficult than the stage. It is almost humanly impossible to sing six hours a day. But I'm enjoying it very much. I'm delighted working with Mr. Leinsdorf. He is a great inspiration and a powerhouse of energy."

Miss Gorr, who has recorded many times and who most likes to sing in the operas of Wagner and Verdi, also considers recording more difficult than singing opera on stage. "This is more difficult, much more. It makes me very nervous. You haven't the warmth of the public; the atmosphere is not the same. I've sung Ortrud many times on the stage, including the Met, Bayreuth, and Covent Garden. It helps to have sung it before." Miss Gorr prefers the afternoon sessions, when she is more rested and her voice is clearer.

Konya has sung the title role of "Lohengrin" 202 times, including this recording, many of those performances with Miss Gorr in the cast. He would rather sing at night, when his voice has warmed up.

One of the most noted and in-demand Wagnerian tenors in the world, Konya arranged during the week for his car to be driven from the port of New York to San Francisco where he would need it during his September-through-November appearances with the San Francisco Opera, before he returned to the Met for the opera season. During the summer, the Konyas and car had been on a busy schedule in Europe, with performances and recordings scheduled in several countries.

"Wieland Wagner [the composer's grandson] is calling me the world's champion in 'Lohengrin,' " he says. Konya was hired by Wieland Wagner to sing "Lohengrin" in Bayreuth and gave six performances each summer during 1958, 1959, and 1960. He made his debut in the same role at the Met in 1961, but his American debut had been the year before, in San Francisco, in "The Girl of the Golden West." He recalls, "A critic wrote, 'Konya was a big success but he didn't walk like a cowboy.'

"I think it is magnificently organized here," Konya continues. He pauses for a moment, reflects, and then comments: "In recording, a singer must concentrate more. Everything has to be perfect, and the finest little notes have to be projected."

Plans for the American recording of "Lohengrin" have been under way for two years. Maestro Leinsdorf says, "To get a good cast together for two weeks is not the easiest thing in the world. There are very few casts that can be got together in 1965 for 1966."

As for the opera's release to the public, that will not be until March of 1966 at the earliest and probably not until the early fall of that year.

"Lohengrin" is uncut, including a portion that was restored in Bayreuth in 1936 and 1937 but never performed in this country. Leinsdorf says, "That has always been the principle of my recording with RCA, that portions never done in performance are included, making a complete record in two senses of the word.

"Our major intent," the conductor explains, "is to do the work as I think it stands in all its romantic grandeur. My concept is a real romantic fairy tale and, as such, I'm hoping that the recording will come out." ■

183

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

NOV 1965

they shall have music

THE BSO PLAYS LOHENGRIN

BY HERBERT KUPFERBERG

Some time next fall RCA Victor will send forth into a curious and possibly skeptical music world a new recording of Wagner's opera Lohengrin. It will be a Lohengrin like none other, with a passage in it that even Wagner never heard, with a leading soprano completely new to her role, with an oversized chorus of 169, and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has never before been involved in a complete opera recording.

Even now, with the actual recording sessions over, no one is quite sure of who thought of having the Boston do Lohengrin in the first place. George R. Marek, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division, says that the Boston Symphony wanted to do it, and adds: "We seldom argue." Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston's conductor, remembers the original suggestion as coming from another RCA Victor executive, although he himself, he says, eagerly accepted the idea.

Whoever originated the project, it quickly ran into complications. The first, and perhaps most serious, occurred when Leontyne Price, after being announced to star in the role of Elsa, withdrew for reasons which were never specified. "First she said she would, then she said she wouldn't," explains Mr. Marek, in as succinct a summation as has ever been uttered of the vagaries of sopranos and the frustrations of recording executives.

Lucine Amara, another Metropolitan Opera soprano, was quickly engaged to replace Miss Price. Miss Amara had never sung the part of Elsa on the stage (neither had Miss Price, for that matter), and although she is a soprano held in wide respect, she is not known as one whose name "sells" operatic recordings. Nevertheless, her rather distinctive vocal quality of pristine innocence was deemed just right for Wagner's aloof and maidenly heroine. Besides, the main sales push is expected to come from the presence of the Boston and Mr. Leinsdorf, who was renowned as a Wagnerian conductor in his years at the Metropolitan Opera. "We're thinking of calling it 'The Boston Symphony Plays Lohengrin' or something like that," says one RCA Victor executive, only half jokingly.

With its personnel problems settled, the Victor Lohengrin then proceeded to cast a long Wagnerian shadow over the Berkshire Music Festival. Usually the Boston Symphony's summers in the Tanglewood shed are devoted to symphonic music. This year, however, the final weekend in late August was given over to a concert version of Lohengrin in what was obviously a preliminary, not to say a rehearsal, for the recording sessions just ahead. Furthermore, instead of presenting the opera intact, the Tanglewood authorities put on one act a night, a procedure which led to the suggestion that the successive presentations be called "Low," "Hen," and "Grin." With a $6.50 nightly top, the cost of attending the complete opera came to $19.50, making it one of the most expensive Lohengrins on record. Attendance, not surprisingly, was noticeably below normal for Tanglewood's final weekend of the summer.

Nevertheless, when Mr. Leinsdorf and his performers, along with a large delegation of RCA engineers and executives, gathered the next day in Symphony Hall, Boston, all was serenity and confidence. In fact, it seemed almost as natural for the Boston to be recording Lohengrin in Symphony Hall as for the swan boats to be gliding across the lake in the not-too-distant Public Gardens. Mr. Leinsdorf, nattily clad in dark trousers and a white long-sleeved polo shirt, began the first of what was to prove a solid week of sessions by thanking the orchestra for its work at Tanglewood. "By your great skill and flexibility you liberated me to concentrate on the people who really needed me," he said, in an allusion to the singers and choristers especially imported for the production.

Symphony Hall had undergone changes for the recording session that made it almost unrecognizable. The front half of the orchestra floor had been cleared by ripping out the seats from rows A to W. Rows X to SS were left in place, but a giant curtain had been draped across the hall in front of them. Other drapes and wood panels had been arranged along the sides of the hall in patterns determined by the sound engineers. Temporary air-conditioning units had been installed, and their ducts protruded from the balconies. An array of microphones hung over the performers from booms that resembled gigantic fishing-yacht poles.

The Boston Symphony was on the cleared orchestra floor, seated in rising semicircular tiers around Mr. Leinsdorf, who stood on an elevated platform. On the stage at the orchestra's rear were the solo singers and the huge Chorus Pro Musica. The chorus plays a more vital role in Lohengrin than in most of Wagner's operas, and Mr. Marek wanted its impact to be even greater than in a live performance. The orchestra, too, was at more than full strength, for to the normal complement of 104 had been added 25 supplementary players, most of them to participate in the offstage fanfares and other special effects in which Lohengrin abounds.

His introductory speech over, Mr. Leinsdorf called out in a businesslike voice: "We begin Act Two, Scene One." A voice from the control booth echoed from a loudspeaker: "Opening of Act Two. Stand by. Take number one"; the tape machines began to turn, and the sessions were officially under way. It is almost axiomatic that operatic recordings nowadays are never made straight through, beginning with the overture and ending with the finale. Instead, the sessions are planned to conform to singers' schedules and engineering requirements.

Sandor Konya, the Hungarian tenor who sings the title role in the recording, was nowhere on the scene when the sessions began. His turn would come later in the week, and an unprecedented turn it would be, for no Lohengrin before has ever been recorded completely uncut. Among the passages restored are a fifty-six bar addition to Lohengrin's narrative, "In fernem Land," which Wagner, in a rare burst of self-discipline, permitted to be excised to shorten the first production in 1850.

Without Konya, the stage was left to Miss Amara as Elsa, and the two villains of the piece, Ortrud, sung by the Belgian mezzo Rita Gorr, and Frederick of Telramund, sung by the young American baritone William Dooley. It seemed a long way from Symphony Hall, Boston, with its battery of electronic equipment and its casually clad singers and musicians, to the citadel of Antwerp, with its armored knights and regally garbed ladies, but Wagner's orchestral colors and motives gradually began to work the transformation. The voices of Ortrud amd Telramund blended in their sinister duet of intrigue, vengefulness, and evil.

Mr. Leinsdorf played the scene almost to the end, but there were a few interruptions. Once he had to stop when the power momentarily failed; another time it was decided to defer temporarily a passage Miss Gorr was having trouble with. But a good twenty minutes of the act had been consigned to tape when the conductor announced a half-hour intermission. With Mr. Marek, the solo singers, and recording director Richard Mohr, he went upstairs to hear a playback on tape equipment which had been set up, of all places, in Symphony Hall's Ancient Instruments Room. All listened, following the score as intently as if they had never seen it before. When it was over, Mr. Marek was asked how much of the "take" he expected to use in the final recording. "None of it," he replied. "Not a bar."

"Why not?" the startled questioner asked.

"Because it's no good," said Mr. Marek firmly. "It's not a performance. There's no menace, no emotion, no contrast, no pronouncing of the text. They're not performing it."

Not everybody had repaired to the playback room. During the recess a pinochle game — a musicians' specialty — quickly started backstage. Several orchestra members began planning a golfing weekend after the recording sessions. Others wandered about, instruments in hand. Joseph Silverstein, who became concertmaster of the Boston three years ago, soon after Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch as conductor, was encountered in a corridor. He was wearing a horizontally striped sport shirt and was playing violin figurations. He stopped to talk about Lohengrin and the problems of recording it.

"We'll develop drive and excitement as we get going," he said. "A recording is always harder to play than an actual concert. The singers are a distance from the conductor; there's also a space between the orchestra and the conductor. It takes time to get acclimated; you find the balances as you go along. There's a kind of antiseptic atmosphere at a recording, with less excitement and less emotional involvement. Leinsdorf is very good at maintaining concert-hall tension. That's why he tries to record in long segments. Otherwise you record a lab specimen, not a performance."

The problem of distance was demonstrated as soon as the chorus joined in the recording session. Seated on the stage, perhaps seventy-five feet from the conductor and with the full orchestra interposed between them, the choristers kept lagging behind Leinsdorf's beat. Rather, they were following the sound of the orchestra as it reached their ears. Leinsdorf kept chiding them with growing impatience. Finally he put aside his baton and said sharply, "Light is faster than sound. Sound gets delayed. Watch me, please, for the beat, ladies and gentlemen. Don't believe your ear, believe your eye."

There were other increasingly testy exchanges as the day wore on and the afternoon proceedings gave way to a night session. The control room reported that the F-sharp on the kettledrums at the start of the scene was coming through as "a low rumble," and adjustments were made. "Drums, make the diminuendo longer," said Leinsdorf, calling out a moment afterward: "Horns, take more time for the grace notes." Later on, after slight lapses of intonation in the orchestra had occasioned several repetitions, Leinsdorf told his men: "With singers you can't repeat it five times because of these little inattentions. Now, this time is for keeps."

And so the music-making grew serious and the interruptions fewer. Scenes began to build, personalities to emerge, and the musical contours of the opera to take shape. However it had sounded in Tanglewood the day before, however it might sound in the finished recording a year hence, in Symphony Hall that day Lohengrin seemed to fill the empty auditorium with lyric radiance, making the early difficulties, the casting crisis, the Tanglewood controversy all seem remote and unimportant.

"Now that you're really under way, is there anything you would like to say?" Mr. Leinsdorf was asked.

"Well, yes," he said. "Listen to it." It seemed a reasonable request.

183

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

NOV 1965

they shall have music

THE BSO PLAYS LOHENGRIN

BY HERBERT KUPFERBERG

Some time next fall RCA Victor will send forth into a curious and possibly skeptical music world a new recording of Wagner's opera Lohengrin. It will be a Lohengrin like none other, with a passage in it that even Wagner never heard, with a leading soprano completely new to her role, with an oversized chorus of 169, and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has never before been involved in a complete opera recording.

Even now, with the actual recording sessions over, no one is quite sure of who thought of having the Boston do Lohengrin in the first place. George R. Marek, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division, says that the Boston Symphony wanted to do it, and adds: "We seldom argue." Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston's conductor, remembers the original suggestion as coming from another RCA Victor executive, although he himself, he says, eagerly accepted the idea.

Whoever originated the project, it quickly ran into complications. The first, and perhaps most serious, occurred when Leontyne Price, after being announced to star in the role of Elsa, withdrew for reasons which were never specified. "First she said she would, then she said she wouldn't," explains Mr. Marek, in as succinct a summation as has ever been uttered of the vagaries of sopranos and the frustrations of recording executives.

Lucine Amara, another Metropolitan Opera soprano, was quickly engaged to replace Miss Price. Miss Amara had never sung the part of Elsa on the stage (neither had Miss Price, for that matter), and although she is a soprano held in wide respect, she is not known as one whose name "sells" operatic recordings. Nevertheless, her rather distinctive vocal quality of pristine innocence was deemed just right for Wagner's aloof and maidenly heroine. Besides, the main sales push is expected to come from the presence of the Boston and Mr. Leinsdorf, who was renowned as a Wagnerian conductor in his years at the Metropolitan Opera. "We're thinking of calling it 'The Boston Symphony Plays Lohengrin' or something like that," says one RCA Victor executive, only half jokingly.

With its personnel problems settled, the Victor Lohengrin then proceeded to cast a long Wagnerian shadow over the Berkshire Music Festival. Usually the Boston Symphony's summers in the Tanglewood shed are devoted to symphonic music. This year, however, the final weekend in late August was given over to a concert version of Lohengrin in what was obviously a preliminary, not to say a rehearsal, for the recording sessions just ahead. Furthermore, instead of presenting the opera intact, the Tanglewood authorities put on one act a night, a procedure which led to the suggestion that the successive presentations be called "Low," "Hen," and "Grin." With a $6.50 nightly top, the cost of attending the complete opera came to $19.50, making it one of the most expensive Lohengrins on record. Attendance, not surprisingly, was noticeably below normal for Tanglewood's final weekend of the summer.

Nevertheless, when Mr. Leinsdorf and his performers, along with a large delegation of RCA engineers and executives, gathered the next day in Symphony Hall, Boston, all was serenity and confidence. In fact, it seemed almost as natural for the Boston to be recording Lohengrin in Symphony Hall as for the swan boats to be gliding across the lake in the not-too-distant Public Gardens. Mr. Leinsdorf, nattily clad in dark trousers and a white long-sleeved polo shirt, began the first of what was to prove a solid week of sessions by thanking the orchestra for its work at Tanglewood. "By your great skill and flexibility you liberated me to concentrate on the people who really needed me," he said, in an allusion to the singers and choristers especially imported for the production.

Symphony Hall had undergone changes for the recording session that made it almost unrecognizable. The front half of the orchestra floor had been cleared by ripping out the seats from rows A to W. Rows X to SS were left in place, but a giant curtain had been draped across the hall in front of them. Other drapes and wood panels had been arranged along the sides of the hall in patterns determined by the sound engineers. Temporary air-conditioning units had been installed, and their ducts protruded from the balconies. An array of microphones hung over the performers from booms that resembled gigantic fishing-yacht poles.

The Boston Symphony was on the cleared orchestra floor, seated in rising semicircular tiers around Mr. Leinsdorf, who stood on an elevated platform. On the stage at the orchestra's rear were the solo singers and the huge Chorus Pro Musica. The chorus plays a more vital role in Lohengrin than in most of Wagner's operas, and Mr. Marek wanted its impact to be even greater than in a live performance. The orchestra, too, was at more than full strength, for to the normal complement of 104 had been added 25 supplementary players, most of them to participate in the offstage fanfares and other special effects in which Lohengrin abounds.

His introductory speech over, Mr. Leinsdorf called out in a businesslike voice: "We begin Act Two, Scene One." A voice from the control booth echoed from a loudspeaker: "Opening of Act Two. Stand by. Take number one"; the tape machines began to turn, and the sessions were officially under way. It is almost axiomatic that operatic recordings nowadays are never made straight through, beginning with the overture and ending with the finale. Instead, the sessions are planned to conform to singers' schedules and engineering requirements.

Sandor Konya, the Hungarian tenor who sings the title role in the recording, was nowhere on the scene when the sessions began. His turn would come later in the week, and an unprecedented turn it would be, for no Lohengrin before has ever been recorded completely uncut. Among the passages restored are a fifty-six bar addition to Lohengrin's narrative, "In fernem Land," which Wagner, in a rare burst of self-discipline, permitted to be excised to shorten the first production in 1850.

Without Konya, the stage was left to Miss Amara as Elsa, and the two villains of the piece, Ortrud, sung by the Belgian mezzo Rita Gorr, and Frederick of Telramund, sung by the young American baritone William Dooley. It seemed a long way from Symphony Hall, Boston, with its battery of electronic equipment and its casually clad singers and musicians, to the citadel of Antwerp, with its armored knights and regally garbed ladies, but Wagner's orchestral colors and motives gradually began to work the transformation. The voices of Ortrud amd Telramund blended in their sinister duet of intrigue, vengefulness, and evil.

Mr. Leinsdorf played the scene almost to the end, but there were a few interruptions. Once he had to stop when the power momentarily failed; another time it was decided to defer temporarily a passage Miss Gorr was having trouble with. But a good twenty minutes of the act had been consigned to tape when the conductor announced a half-hour intermission. With Mr. Marek, the solo singers, and recording director Richard Mohr, he went upstairs to hear a playback on tape equipment which had been set up, of all places, in Symphony Hall's Ancient Instruments Room. All listened, following the score as intently as if they had never seen it before. When it was over, Mr. Marek was asked how much of the "take" he expected to use in the final recording. "None of it," he replied. "Not a bar."

"Why not?" the startled questioner asked.

"Because it's no good," said Mr. Marek firmly. "It's not a performance. There's no menace, no emotion, no contrast, no pronouncing of the text. They're not performing it."

Not everybody had repaired to the playback room. During the recess a pinochle game — a musicians' specialty — quickly started backstage. Several orchestra members began planning a golfing weekend after the recording sessions. Others wandered about, instruments in hand. Joseph Silverstein, who became concertmaster of the Boston three years ago, soon after Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch as conductor, was encountered in a corridor. He was wearing a horizontally striped sport shirt and was playing violin figurations. He stopped to talk about Lohengrin and the problems of recording it.

"We'll develop drive and excitement as we get going," he said. "A recording is always harder to play than an actual concert. The singers are a distance from the conductor; there's also a space between the orchestra and the conductor. It takes time to get acclimated; you find the balances as you go along. There's a kind of antiseptic atmosphere at a recording, with less excitement and less emotional involvement. Leinsdorf is very good at maintaining concert-hall tension. That's why he tries to record in long segments. Otherwise you record a lab specimen, not a performance."

The problem of distance was demonstrated as soon as the chorus joined in the recording session. Seated on the stage, perhaps seventy-five feet from the conductor and with the full orchestra interposed between them, the choristers kept lagging behind Leinsdorf's beat. Rather, they were following the sound of the orchestra as it reached their ears. Leinsdorf kept chiding them with growing impatience. Finally he put aside his baton and said sharply, "Light is faster than sound. Sound gets delayed. Watch me, please, for the beat, ladies and gentlemen. Don't believe your ear, believe your eye."

There were other increasingly testy exchanges as the day wore on and the afternoon proceedings gave way to a night session. The control room reported that the F-sharp on the kettledrums at the start of the scene was coming through as "a low rumble," and adjustments were made. "Drums, make the diminuendo longer," said Leinsdorf, calling out a moment afterward: "Horns, take more time for the grace notes." Later on, after slight lapses of intonation in the orchestra had occasioned several repetitions, Leinsdorf told his men: "With singers you can't repeat it five times because of these little inattentions. Now, this time is for keeps."

And so the music-making grew serious and the interruptions fewer. Scenes began to build, personalities to emerge, and the musical contours of the opera to take shape. However it had sounded in Tanglewood the day before, however it might sound in the finished recording a year hence, in Symphony Hall that day Lohengrin seemed to fill the empty auditorium with lyric radiance, making the early difficulties, the casting crisis, the Tanglewood controversy all seem remote and unimportant.

"Now that you're really under way, is there anything you would like to say?" Mr. Leinsdorf was asked.

"Well, yes," he said. "Listen to it." It seemed a reasonable request.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687

AUG 17 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TARBORO, N. C.
SOUTHERNER
D. 3,500

AUG 12 1966

'Lohengrin' Recording Session In Boston Done in Grand Style

BOSTON (AP) — The most quoted line from "Lohengrin" isn't in Wagner's opera. Tenor Leo Slezak said it one night when he lingered too long after singing his farewell. The swan and raft which bear Lohengrin away pulled into the wings on schedule, without him, and Slezak asked, "What time does the next swan boat leave."

And the most talked about line at the recording sessions of "Lohengrin" isn't on the record. There were Lucine Amara and Sandor Konya singing on the stage of Symphony Hall in Boston, getting more and more lyrical, more and more impassioned. As Elsa and Lohengrin, they have just been married; she wants to know his name; he doesn't want to tell her.

Just as the few spectators were thinking they'd never heard it sung better, conductor Erich Leindorf's voice cut through the music:

"Where is the man with the sword" Sabotage! Sabotage! You're all a bunch of dilettantes!" Then Leinsdorf phased out of English and into another of the many languages he knows.

A "Lohengrin" recording doesn't need a swan but it does need the sound of steel as Frederick breaks into the bridal chamber, sword drawn, where he is run through on Lohengrin's sword.

The offending scene was, of course, done again, this time with "the man with the sword" on a box in front of the microphone, facing his own assistant conductor, and bobbing his entire body up and down to the beat, to express his zealous concentration.

The rest of the recording went smoothly. It was hot in Boston, but nobody got sick, or tempermental; "good voice" was the general rule; recording sessions were all the serious business of making music but without undue tension; moments in between sessions were a mixture of studying the music and light-hearted banter.

CHEAPER IN EUROPE

Opera recordings are nearly always done in Europe — because they are so much cheaper there. A record company pays a soloist his fee no matter where the recording is done and as for everybody else — in Europe they don't belong to the American Federation of Musicians.

But RCA Victor decided to record an opera in America anyway. It picked a big one, "Logehgrin," and a giant of an orchestra, the Boston Symphony.

George R. Marek, head of RCA Victor Records said, "There are some things which just must be done. Wagner more than any other operatic composer used the orchestra in the widest sense of its capacities. Thus unless one had the opportunity to hear, one would always be curious to know how Wagner would sound performed by one of the world's finest orchestras.

"It is an instance when artistic curiosity overcame the natural barriers — notable cost. Of course 'Lohengrin' could have been recorded less expensively in Europe, but not the 'Lohengrin' I feel we have achieved with the Boston Symphony."

The president of the AFM, Herman D. Kenin, found the occasion so auspicious that he flew from Chicago to attend one of the recording sessions. (He was carrying a newspaper folded so that the first half of a headline, "LBJ Conducts," could be read. After formal words of greeting and mutual congratulations, conductor Leinsdorf quipped, "Be sure that he takes out a card."

RELEASE IN AUGUST

The last week in August 1965, the 104 member Boston Symphony, plus 25 extra players ($50.63 each for two hours of recording), the 160 voice semi-professional Chorus Pro Musica of Boston ($65 each for the week) and the Metropolitan Opera's Lucine Amara, Sandor Konya, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines and Calvin Marsh made music in the superb acoustics of Symphony Hall, Boston, for six days, six hours a day. There were creating the five-record, three hour and 45 minute complete 'Lohengrin," put on the market this month.

Conductor Leinsdorf said, "Our major intent is to do the work as I think it stands in all its romantic grandeur. My concept is a real romantic fairy tale and as such I am hoping that the recording will come out."

Season patrons of Symphony Hall would hardly have recognized the place. Chairs on risers, for the chorus covered most of the stage. The soloists stood in front of them.

Miss Amara sang with wide, caressing sweeps of her arms, fingers crossed on both hands. Konya pumped his right hand up and down, fist clenched. Miss Gorr opened her arms wide. Dooley stood, looking lean, and alert as a sailor on leave, arms folded across his chest.

The front half of the seats had been removed from the hall's main floor, and the orchestra sat there, facing Erich Leinsdorf who sat on a red leather stool atop a red-carpeted podium. A tripod at his right held a telephone on which he talked with the men in the upstairs control room.

Long plywood panels leaned side by side against the balconies, making two side walls; long maroon dropcloths hung from the balconies at back, making a rear wall. Seven balcony doors had been removed at each side and 14 air-conditioning units ($7,000 each) thrust through the door jams were running during each hour's 20-minute break from recording. Because they made noise, they couldn't operate during the recording itself.

The units also condensed humidity from the hall and dumped the water in buckets in the outside corridor.

The recording was done in large segments; sometimes an entire 40-minute period would be spent recording without interruption.

REPEAT PROCEDURE

In a typical passage after Leinsdorf stopped the music and before he started the retake, he told one instrumentalist that his B flat was a little high in the fourth bar of 48B; RCA producer Richard Mohr suggested by telephone that 48A cut from two harps to one.

Miss Amara said, "Can we do from the entrance of 55" Leinsdorf replied, "I'd be delighted. I don't want to tire her out. She is so brave. Everybody loves it."

In French, he told Miss Gorr, who is Belgian, that this retake did not include any singing.

Leinsdorf spoke in English to Miss Amara who is of Armenian heritage, born in Hartford, Conn., reared in California. He spoke in German to Konya, who is Hungarian, and Konya answered in English. He spoke English to Californian Dooley who answered in German, or, for Miss Gorr's benefit, French.

Konya was singing Lohengrin for the 202nd time. He said Wieland Wagner (the composer's grandson) is calling him the world's champion Lohengrin.

But recording is much different. Everything has to be perfected and perfect: The first little notes have to be projected. We're magnificently organized here. I wish I could do all recording with so much rehearsal and with Mr. Leinsdorf. I think we are getting a very good recording."

Konya made his debut at Bayreuth and at the Met as Lohengrin. However, he made his U.S. debut in San Francisco in 1[illegible] a year before the Met, in "The Girl of the Golden West."

"One critic wrote that I was a big success but I didn't walk like a cowboy."

Miss Amara had never sung her role before. She explained to Dooley with the vivacity she maintained all week, "I'm not that gullible. Why should I sing the role of a gullible person"

Dooley had never sung Frederick before, either. At 31 the part is still extremely heavy for him.

He said, "I've never recorded before, either. It's a new discipline for me, more difficult, but I'm enjoying it very much."

Miss Gorr, who has sung Ortrud many times, doesn't enjoy recording nearly as much as singing during a performance. "This makes me cery nervous. You haven't the warmth of the public."

CLOSED CIRCUIT TV

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein said that symphony members were concerned that musicians out in the halls and in the balconies (distant tower trumpets, etc.) come in on the beat. This was difficult because of the longer time it took their sound to reach the microphones. They played watching closed-circuit TV (The camera was set up behind the French horns.) or following an assistant conductor who watched closed-circuit TV.

Silverstein also cited a study that a music professor had done on the Boston Symphony one summer at Tanglewood. He told them that their sound was best when temperatures were between 71 and 78 degrees. At higher temperatures, the metal instruments went sharp, and with heat plus humidity, the strings went flat.

A few members of the orchestra kept thermometers under their chairs throughout the "Lohengrin" sessions. At one session they recorded a rise of 68 to 83 degrees. Usually it didn't get that hot in the hall but the corridors outside, where the air-conditioning units pushed the hot air, were sweltering.

The swords, which hadn't been forthcoming at a critical moment, belonged to the orchestra's tuba player, K. Vinal Smith, who had brought them up from his home in Vinalhaven, Maine. "They're of Civil War vintage," he explained eagerly. "We tried a theatrical agency, but their swords had no tips. We need the rasp of the blade coming out of the scabbard. They had iron in those days. We had to be square with people buying the record."

ATHENS, GA.
BANNER-HERALD
D. 7,500 S. 8,000

AUG 28 1966

Disc Data

Victor Releases New 'Lohengrin'

By PAUL DEE

The end of the normally torpid summer season for classical recordings is marked by RCA Victor's big, bright performance of Lohengrin (LM-LSC 6710, mono or stereo), in every regard a major effort. It is a must for the operaphile and highly recommended for others, especially those who think Wagner's music oppresive.

Above all, this new Lohengrin is lyrical in both conception and execution. Sandor Konya in the title role handles the vocal line with great sweetness and beauty. He makes his points musically rather than through the dramatic declamation essayed by the recent generation of Wagerian tenors. For the first time on records, Konya gives evidence that his enormous European reputation is based more on fact than on press-agentry.

Leinsdorf, the conductor, also stresses the lyrical elements in the score. Some may feel that this blunts the dramatic impact, but even the most feverish Wagnerian will be impressed with the unfalteringly crystalline flow of the music under Leinsdorf's hands. The Boston Symphony responds sensitively, making this one of the best played operas on records. RCA Victor's technical staff clothes all in bright, clear, superbly balanced sound.

Things scale down after these points of excellence are mentioned. Lucine Amara's light voiced Elsa is appropriate to the girlishness of the character in the early pages of the opera, but cannot sustain the dramatic requirements of the later ones. In general, however, she makes an important contribution to the lyric quality of the performance, turning her participation into an advantage rather than a defect. Other singers, including the great Rita Gorr, seem in bad voice and do detract.

It should be noted that the role of King Henry is taken by the American basso, Jerome Hines. Hines is scheduled for personal appearances in Atlanta, Athens, and other centers in the Southeast during the coming concert season. His voice remains impressive, except for an apparently growing difficulty at top.

Deutsche Grammophon's season opener is a two-disc survey of Hans Werner Henze's symphonic writings from the Symphony No. 1 of 1947 to the Symphony No. 5 of 1962 (DGG LPM 39203, mono; SLPM 139203, stereo). The composer himself leads the Berlin Philharmonic through these scores and, hence, they must be assumed to be definitive.

There is no question that Henze's is a major voice among contemporary composers. The present release strengthens that conviction. The voice is entirely his n. It is neither derivative nor experimental. The music could not have been written without Stravinsky, Schoenberg, or, especially, Messaien pointing the way, but it is unlike any of these. From the early work to the last, Henze sustains a unified and consistent view of the world. The terror and the confusion of our times are there and, obviously, deeply felt by the compassion. For all their moderism, these symphonies emerge almost as classical in feeling. In all, this is a richly rewarding release.

Angel's curtain raiser is nothing less than Beethoven's monumental Missa Solemnis (3679, mono or stereo). Otto Klemperer is at the helm of the New Philharmonia Orchestra and Chorus, along with a magnificent quartet of soloists—the standout of which is Marti Talvela, the bass whose meteoric progress has been increasingly noted in these columns.

I have heard Klemperer's statement of the Missa Solemnis, both in performance and on records, for a quarter of a century. My impression is that there has been remarkably little change in overall conception. There has, on the other hand, been a progressive ripening. This version is firmer in outline, freer in choice of tempos, and more sustained in grandeur. It is among the finest of Klemperer's achievements for the phonograph. As such, it is the recording of the Missa Solemnis to acquire, for it is easily supercedes all others in the catalog.

185

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,172 SUN. 299,377
AUG 28 1966

On the Records

Leinsdorf Conducts Boston Symphony, Chorus and Soloists In Brilliant Recording of Complete Wagner Opera 'Lohengrin'

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

SEVERAL WELL-SUBSTANTIATED CLAIMS have been made by RCA Victor for its brilliant new recording of the complete Wagner opera "Lohengrin" with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica and a cast headed by the Hungarian tenor, Sandor Konya.

This is the first American recording of a Wagner opera and it is the first complete opera recording by a major American symphony orchestra since the heyday of Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. It is the first complete "Lohengrin" recording. The principal "cut" restored is the continuation of Lohengrin's Act III narrative in which the hero explains why he came to Elsa's rescue and the role of the swan.

THE RECORDING was made in Boston's Symphony Hall during the last week of August last year after completion of a three-part concert performance with the same artists at Tanglewood. The concerts were attended by a total of 20,465 persons. For the recording, the 104 regular members of the orchestra were augmented by 25 additional instrumentalists and the Pro Musica Chorus of 120 members was increased to 180. On five Dynagroove LPs, the opera required three hours and 35 minutes to play. Details are outlined below.

JUST IN TIME for announcement this week is news from Alan W. Livingston, Capitol Records president, that he has signed a contract with the Soviet Union giving Capitol first rights to manufacture, license and distribute in the Western Hemisphere all recordings by Russian artists.

The recordings, primarily classical, will be released on a new label, "Melodiya/Angel," early next year. Among many celebrated artists and organizations whose recordings are included in the contract are Emil Gilels, Sviatoslav Richter, David and Igor Oistrakh, Mstislav Rostropovich, Moscow Philharmonic and Moscow Chamber Orchestras, the Bolshoi Theater Orchestra, Leonid Kogan, Galina Vishnevskaya, Rudolf Barshai, Kirill Kondrashin, Ivan Petrov and Grigori Sokolov.

Opera

RICHARD WAGNER: "LOHENGRIN" with SANDOR KONYA, tenor; LUCINE AMARA, soprano; WILLIAM DOOLEY, baritone; RITA GORR, mezzo-soprano; JEROME HINES, bass; CALVIN MARSH, baritone; BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, BOSTON CHORUS PRO MUSICA, ERICH LEINSDORF, conductor—RCA VICTOR LSC/LM-6710 (Five LPs boxed with notes and German-English text).

Complexities of undertaking such a task as this complete recording of "Lohengrin" are so manifold for conductor, producer and sound engineer that it is a marvel that the opera even approaches the magnificence with which it abounds.

Erich Leinsdorf, the man assuredly most responsible for success of the effort, skated on rather thin ice in his choice of singers in one or two instances but performances were so grandly dedicated by the vocalists as to modify satisfactorily most impressions of inadequacy.

The choice of Sandor Konya's tenor for the role of "Lohengrin" could not be better. This man's far-ranging voice, smooth and clear in all his registers and coupled with his vast experience in the part (more than 200 performances) is reason enough to rate the five-record set a valuable asset to any collection.

THE PRINCIPAL GAMBLE for Leinsdorf, as it appears to us, was in the selection of Lucine Amara for Elsa's soprano role. It was her first appearance in the part and it is certain that but for concentrated preparation, much of it coached by Leinsdorf, her delicate voice would not have measured up to the demands.

As it was, her vocal quality exactly fitted the characterization of Elsa, a young, dreamy girl with a vision of a fair knight in shining armor coming to realization. Pure, lovely tone and consummate grasp of the characterization transformed her slight strength into memorable beauty.

It might have been taken for granted that other members of the cast would be more than adequate and the results prove the point, generally. Jerome Hines as King Henry, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud and Calvin Marsh as the herald all are experienced and valuable operatic performers. For some reason, however, possibly because of the vastly augmented orchestral and choral forces arrayed with them, Jerome Hines and Rita Gorr sounded somewhat strained in their higher reaches but without seriously flawing the wonderful production.

IN EVERY OTHER RESPECT this "Lohengrin" is superb. Conductor Leinsdorf's genius for organization and control is everywhere in evidence. Orchestral and choral response are without peer, marvelously well cued and showing the benefit of concentrated rehearsal and the Tanglewood performances. Engineering was kept in pace with the artistic triumph, resulting in sound production and stereo separation of extraordinary brilliance even in the massive sequences when all musical forces were engaged.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
AUG 21 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Armenian Mirror-Spectator
WATERTOWN, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,000
AUG 6 1966

Two Operas are Broadcast

Even before its general release to the public, the new RCA-Victor recording of "Lohengrin" by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf with Lucine Amara as Elsa—as presented at Tanglewood last summer, will be heard over WGBH-FM in Boston on Sunday August 7 at 7:30 pm.

On Saturday, August 6 at 8 pm, the Tanglewood presentation of "The Magic Flute" with Ara Berberian as one of the soloists, will be heard live over WGBH.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
AUG 27 1966

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

WAGNER: LOHENGRIN
(5 12" LP's)
Various Artists / Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 6710 (M); LSC 6710 (S)

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf shines in this first Wagnerian opera to be recorded in the United States. Tenor Sandor Konya is probably the finest Lohengrin around. The expanded "In fernam Land" is a high spot of Konya's performance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
MR 31 1966

Discology: 'Lohengrin'

BSO's Newest Release Reveals Its Stature

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The concert performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" that ended the 1965 season at Tanglewood was made possible by RCA's desire for a recording, and that recording, made in Symphony Hall right after Tanglewood, is now released (RCA Victor LM/LSC 6710, 5 records).

The conductor is Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra the Boston Symphony, the chorus the Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, and the singers are Sandor Konya (Lohengrin), Lucine Amara (Elsa), William Dooley (Telramund), Rita Gorr (Ortrud), Jerome Hines (King), Calvin Marsh (Herald), William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Nobles), and Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages).

A word about "Lohengrin" itself: while it has a reputation for dullness, it seems to me that only a few pages, mostly associated with the king, are boring.

There is, on the contrary, much that is strikingly inventive, original, and powerful. One finds good things even where the language is at its most conventional, in the beautiful bridal chamber scene, the entrance of the nobles later with its harmonic energy, even such a thing as the third act Prelude when heard in context and played as well as it is here.

The second act, which is unflawed, is dominated by the dark sounds and supple declamation of the Ortrud-Telramund music (what a moment Ortrud's "Elsa"! is after "Euch Luften"!). And there is what Leinsdorf calls the silver scrim, the unique and astonishing timbre that characterizes so much of "Lohengrin" and whose most intense and perfect realization occurs in the Prelude. And while Wagner was to use off-stage spatial effects more subtly in "Tristan," nowhere, not even in "Meistersinger" or "Goetterdaemmerung" did he use them more effectively for sheer magnificence and excitement than in "Lohengrin."

"Lohengrin" is worth knowing, and knowing well. Given the scarcity of even tolerable performances in the opera house, a good recording is important, and the new performance, in spite of certain limitations, is of a quality to reveal the nature and the stature of the work.

Leinsdorf's command of the whole shape of "Lohengrin" is masterful and so is most of the actual conducting. There are a few moments of rhythmic slackness, for example, in the lifeless playing of the Prelude, a certain confusion about the "Welch ein Geheimniss" ensemble near the end of Act II, the vagueness of some of the Bridal Chamber duet. But these, though important, are exceptional flaws in an impressive achievement.

Konya has his moments. In the third act, from "Mein Herr und Koenig" to the end of his narrative (whose usually omitted second stanza is included, and to excellent effect), he is tremendously impressive, and his voice is beautiful. Musically he is a primitive. Modulations and chromaticisms throw his pitch off, and he is apt at any moment to fall into strange howling, sobbing, crooning. Technique and taste are erratic: what comes out is not necessarily bad, but as with most performers not easily reached through their brains, it is haphazard. In spite of the good moments and his experience, Konya is insufficiently musical or knightly to be a good Lohengrin.

Amara, though just a little monotonous and too tremulously suggestive of Lillian Gish, is a good Elsa, musical, attentive, and able to build a convincing and consistent characterization.

Gorr has just the personal force, intelligence, and imagination one wants in an Ortrud. The voice is also exciting as long as Wagner makes it comfortable for her. When she goes high, however—and her six page appearance at the end of the opera contains eight A's and an A sharp—she can only shriek desperately. That was true at Tanglewood also, but merely painful.

Dooley's baritone is a little dry, but it is by no means disagreeable, and the effect of his Telramund is brilliant dramatically and musically.

King Henry is a dreary part, but Hines' pompous and unsteady woofling does nothing for it. Marsh is an excellent Herald, but he is placed so far back that his voice seems smaller than it is and the general effect of his singing is less telling than it was in concert.

The chorus, whose role in an uncut "Lohengrin" is enormous, is excellent as to pitch and tone, but its German is only fair. The orchestral playing is splendid, whether in the firm sound of the brilliant tutti, or in subtleties like the soft cymbal strokes in the prelude or the chorus after Lohengrin's Grail Narrative.

The recording is generally well managed. Balances are clear, the stereo makes sense, and so does the placement of the singers (with the exception of my remark about the Herald and with the possible question that the sense of distance at Lohengrin's first entrance and final exit may be exaggerated.)

The off-stage fanfares are magnificent, and The Globe's own Grand Prix du Disque goes to BSO percussionist Arthur Press for his glorious imitation of a king smiting a shield with his sword.

The significant competition for this recording is Angel's not quite so well recorded or conducted (by Kempe), but with generally better principals (Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Gruemmer, Fischer-Dieskau, Christa Ludwig, Gottlob Frick).

CLASSICAL

Boston 'Lohengrin' Grand & Important

By JO REITER

The complete recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin," released by RCA Victor this month, is a grand and important production, truly a credit to all participants—Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, an impressive cast of singers and the recording engineers (RCA LM-6710, LSC-6710).

This five-record set grew out of the concert that ended last year's Tanglewood season and was soon after recorded in Symphony Hall. What resulted is a superb recording of Wagner's great romantic opera, "Lohengrin," a work certain to be better loved and understood because of this recording.

The cast includes Sandor Konya (Lohengrin), Lucine Amara (Elsa), William Dooley (Telramund), Rita Gorr (Ortrud), Jerome Hines (King Henry), Calvin Marsh (Herald), William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Nobles), and Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages).

Leinsdorf's interpretation of the score is a moving experience — the excitement of the preludes, the wonder of Lohengrin's entrance, the intensity of Ortrud's scenes in Act II, and the lyric beauty of the love duets.

The orchestra is excellent, with the luminous strings, firm woodwinds, a masterful percussion section and brilliant brasses. The offstage fanfares are as wonderful as the onstage trumpets which puncture the Herald's music. Leinsdorf convinces us that his "Lohengrin" has indeed the grandeur of a "romantic fairy tale."

THE SINGERS ARE all capable, and those in the two lead roles are impressive. Konya's Lohengrin is a joy. His voice is focused, and his phrasing sensitive. Amara's Elsa is convincing, for she sings throughout with ease, charm, and a developing intensity.

Gorr's Ortrud is successfully nasty in characterization, as Wagner called for, but unnecessarily unpleasant vocally, especially in the sustained, forced notes of her upper register.

Dooley is not a "heldenbariton," for the top of his voice does not match the dark weighty sound of his lower register; but his dramatic ability is apparent. Hence, Telramund comes across clearly.

ERICH LEINSDORF
Matchless concept

Hines sings the King's role with no great distinction, while Marsh's portrayal of the Herald is intelligently sung and projected.

ALTHOUGH THE Boston Pro Musica singers do a commendable job with the numerous choral and poly-choral sections recurring throughout the opera, their faulty German diction detracts from an otherwise fine performance.

The only other complete "Lohengrin" available in stereo (and this opera is made for current stereo reproduction) is on Angel with Rudolf Kempe conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Chorus of the Vienna State Opera, and a more distinguished cast (Thomas, Grummer, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig and Frick). However, Kempe's overall conception cannot match Leinsdorf's — and RCA's sound production is magnificent.

185

Courier EXPRESS
BUFFALO
Western New York's
Greatest Newspaper
D. 158,172 SUN. 299,377

AUG 28 1966

On the Records

Leinsdorf Conducts Boston Symphony, Chorus and Soloists In Brilliant Recording of Complete Wagner Opera 'Lohengrin'

By CHARLES F. KINZLY

SEVERAL WELL-SUBSTANTIATED CLAIMS have been made by RCA Victor for its brilliant new recording of the complete Wagner opera "Lohengrin" with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica and a cast headed by the Hungarian tenor, Sandor Konya.

This is the first American recording of a Wagner opera and it is the first complete opera recording by a major American symphony orchestra since the heyday of Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. It is the first complete "Lohengrin" recording. The principal "cut" restored is the continuation of Lohengrin's Act III narrative in which the hero explains why he came to Elsa's rescue and the role of the swan.

THE RECORDING was made in Boston's Symphony Hall during the last week of August last year after completion of a three-part concert performance with the same artists at Tanglewood. The concerts were attended by a total of 20,465 persons. For the recording, the 104 regular members of the orchestra were augmented by 25 additional instrumentalists and the Pro Musica Chorus of 120 members was increased to 180. On five Dynagroove LPs, the opera required three hours and 35 minutes to play. Details are outlined below.

JUST IN TIME for announcement this week is news from Alan W. Livingston, Capitol Records president, that he has signed a contract with the Soviet Union giving Capitol first rights to manufacture, license and distribute in the Western Hemisphere all recordings by Russian artists.

The recordings, primarily classical, will be released on a new label, "Melodiya/Angel," early next year. Among many celebrated artists and organizations whose recordings are included in the contract are Emil Gilels, Sviatoslav Richter, David and Igor Oistrakh, Mstislav Rostropovich, Moscow Philharmonic and Moscow Chamber Orchestras, the Bolshoi Theater Orchestra, Leonid Kogan, Galina Vishnevskaya, Rudolf Barshai, Kirll Kondrashin, Ivan Petrov and Grigori Sokolov.

Opera

RICHARD WAGNER: "LOHENGRIN" with SANDOR KONYA, tenor; LUCINE AMARA, soprano; WILLIAM DOOLEY, baritone; RITA GORR, mezzo-soprano; JEROME HINES, bass; CALVIN MARSH, baritone; BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, BOSTON CHORUS PRO MUSICA, ERICH LEINSDORF, conductor—RCA VICTOR LSC/LM-6710 (Five LPs boxed with notes and German-English text).

Complexities of undertaking such a task as this complete recording of "Lohengrin" are so manifold for conductor, producer and sound engineer that it is a marvel that the opera even approaches the magnificence with which it abounds.

Erich Leinsdorf, the man assuredly most responsible for success of the effort, skated on rather thin ice in his choice of singers in one or two instances but performances were so grandly dedicated by the vocalists as to modify satisfactorily most impressions of inadequacy.

The choice of Sandor Konya's tenor for the role of "Lohengrin" could not be better. This man's far-ranging voice, smooth and clear in all his registers and coupled with his vast experience in the part (more than 200 performances) is reason enough to rate the five-record set a valuable asset to any collection.

THE PRINCIPAL GAMBLE for Leinsdorf, as it appears to us, was in the selection of Lucine Amara for Elsa's soprano role. It was her first appearance in the part and it is certain that but for concentrated preparation, much of it coached by Leinsdorf, her delicate voice would not have measured up to the demands.

As it was, her vocal quality exactly fitted the characterization of Elsa, a young, dreamy girl with a vision of a fair knight in shining armor coming to realization. Pure, lovely tone and consummate grasp of the characterization transformed her slight strength into memorable beauty.

It might have been taken for granted that other members of the cast would be more than adequate and the results prove the point, generally. Jerome Hines as King Henry, William Dooley as Telramund, Rita Gorr as Ortrud and Calvin Marsh as the herald all are experienced and valuable operatic performers. For some reason, however, possibly because of the vastly augmented orchestral and choral forces arrayed with them, Jerome Hines and Rita Gorr sounded somewhat strained in their higher reaches but without seriously flawing the wonderful production.

IN EVERY OTHER RESPECT this "Lohengrin" is superb. Conductor Leinsdorf's genius for organization and control is everywhere in evidence. Orchestral and choral response are without peer, marvelously well cued and showing the benefit of concentrated rehearsal and the Tanglewood performances. Engineering was kept in pace with the artistic triumph, resulting in sound production and stereo separation of extraordinary brilliance even in the massive sequences when all musical forces were engaged.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

AUG 21 1966

CLASSICAL

Boston 'Lohengrin' Grand & Important

By JO REITER

The complete recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin," released by RCA Victor this month, is a grand and important production, truly a credit to all participants—Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Chorus Pro Musica prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, an impressive cast of singers and the recording engineers (RCA LM-6710, LSC-6710).

This five-record set grew out of the concert that ended last year's Tanglewood season and was soon after recorded in Symphony Hall. What resulted is a superb recording of Wagner's great romantic opera, "Lohengrin," a work certain to be better loved and understood because of this recording.

The cast includes Sandor Konya (Lohengrin), Lucine Amara (Elsa), William Dooley (Telramund), Rita Gorr (Ortrud), Jerome Hines (King Henry), Calvin Marsh (Herald), William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Nobles), and Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages).

Leinsdorf's interpretation of the score is a moving experience — the excitement of the preludes, the wonder of Lohengrin's entrance, the intensity of Ortrud's scenes in Act II, and the lyric beauty of the love duets.

The orchestra is excellent, with the luminous strings, firm woodwinds, a masterful percussion section and brilliant brasses. The offstage fanfares are as wonderful as the onstage trumpets which puncture the Herald's music. Leinsdorf convinces us that his "Lohengrin" has indeed the grandeur of a "romantic fairy tale."

THE SINGERS ARE all capable, and those in the two lead roles are impressive. Konya's Lohengrin is a joy. His voice is focused, and his phrasing sensitive. Amara's Elsa is convincing, for she sings throughout with ease, charm, and a developing intensity.

Gorr's Ortrud is successfully nasty in characterization, as Wagner called for, but unnecessarily unpleasant vocally, especially in the sustained, forced notes of her upper register.

Dooley is not a "heldenbariton," for the top of his voice does not match the dark weighty sound of his lower register; but his dramatic ability is apparent. Hence, Telramund comes across clearly.

Hines sings the King's role with no great distinction, while Marsh's portrayal of the Herald is intelligently sung and projected.

ALTHOUGH THE Boston Pro Musica singers do a commendable job with the numerous choral and poly-choral sections recurring throughout the opera, their faulty German diction detracts from an otherwise fine performance.

The only other complete "Lohengrin" available in stereo (and this opera is made for current stereo reproduction) is on Angel with Rudolf Kempe conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Chorus of the Vienna State Opera, and a more distinguished cast (Thomas, Grummer, Fischer-Dieskau, Ludwig and Frick). However, Kempe's overall conception cannot match Leinsdorf's — and RCA's sound production is magnificent.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Armenian
Mirror-Spectator
WATERTOWN, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,000

AUG 6 1966

Two Operas are Broadcast

Even before its general release to the public, the new RCA-Victor recording of "Lohengrin" by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf—with Lucine Amara as Elsa—as presented at Tanglewood last summer, will be heard over WGBH-FM in Boston on Sunday August 7 at 7:30 pm.

On Saturday, August 6 at 8 pm, the Tanglewood presentation of "The Magic Flute" with Ara Berberian as one of the soloists, will be heard live over WGBH.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

AUG 27 1966

CLASSICAL SPOTLIGHT

WAGNER: LOHENGRIN
(5 12" LP's)
Various Artists / Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor LM 6710 (M); LSC 6710 (S)

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf shines in this first Wagnerian opera to be recorded in the United States. Tenor Sandor Konya is probably the finest Lohengrin around. The expanded "In fernam Land" is a high spot of Konya's performance.

ERICH LEINSDORF
Matchless concept

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

JUN 31 1966

Discology: 'Lohengrin'

BSO's Newest Release Reveals Its Stature

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The concert performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" that ended the 1965 season at Tanglewood was made possible by RCA's desire for a recording, and that recording, made in Symphony Hall right after Tanglewood, is now released (RCA Victor LM/LSC 6710, 5 records).

The conductor is Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra the Boston Symphony, the chorus the Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, and the singers are Sandor Konya (Lohengrin), Lucine Amara (Elsa), William Dooley (Telramund), Rita Gorr (Ortrud), Jerome Hines (King), Calvin Marsh (Herald), William DuPree, John Glenn Paton, William Ledbetter, Eugene Thamon (Nobles), and Helene Farras, Barbara Smith Conrad, Judith Keller, Batyah Godfrey (Pages).

A word about "Lohengrin" itself: while it has a reputation for dullness, it seems to me that only a few pages, mostly associated with the king, are boring.

There is, on the contrary, much that is strikingly inventive, original, and powerful. One finds good things even where the language is at its most conventional, in the beautiful bridal chamber scene, the entrance of the nobles later with its harmonic energy, even such a thing as the third act Prelude when heard in context and played as well as it is here.

The second act, which is unflawed, is dominated by the dark sounds and supple declamation of the Ortrud-Telramund music (what a moment Ortrud's "Elsa"! is after "Euch Lueften"!). And there is what Leinsdorf calls the silver scrim, the unique and astonishing timbre that characterizes so much of "Lohengrin" and whose most intense and perfect realization occurs in the Prelude. And while Wagner was to use off-stage spatial effects more subtly in "Tristan," nowhere, not even in "Meistersinger" or "Goetterdaemmerung" did he use them more effectively for sheer magnificence and excitement than in "Lohengrin."

"Lohengrin" is worth knowing, and knowing well. Given the scarcity of even tolerable performances in the opera house, a good recording is important, and the new performance, in spite of certain limitations, is of a quality to reveal the nature and the stature of the work.

Leinsdorf's command of the whole shape of "Lohengrin" is masterful and so is most of the actual conducting. There are a few moments of rhythmic slackness, for example, in the lifeless playing of the Prelude, a certain confusion about the "Welch ein Geheimniss" ensemble near the end of Act II, the vagueness of some of the Bridal Chamber duet. But these, though important, are exceptional flaws in an impressive achievement.

Konya has his moments. In the third act, from "Mein Herr und Koenig" to the end of his narrative (whose usually omitted second stanza is included, and to excellent effect), he is tremendously impressive, and his voice is beautiful. Musically he is a primitive. Modulations and chromaticisms throw his pitch off, and he is apt at any moment to fall into strange howling, sobbing, crooning. Technique and taste are erratic: what comes out is not necessarily bad, but as with most performers not easily reached through their brains, it is haphazard. In spite of the good moments and his experience, Konya is insufficiently musical or knightly to be a good Lohengrin.

Amara, though just a little monotonous and too tremulously suggestive of Lillian Gish, is a good Elsa, mucical, attentive, and able to build a convincing and consistent characterization.

Gorr has just the personal force, intelligence, and imagination one wants in an Ortrud. The voice is also exciting as long as Wagner makes it comfortable for her. When she goes high, however—and her six page appearance at the end of the opera contains eight A's and an A sharp—she can only shriek desperately. That was true at Tanglewood also, but merely painful.

Dooley's baritone is a little dry, but it is by no means disagreeable, and the effect of his Telramund is brilliant dramatically and musically.

King Henry is a dreary part, but Hines' pompous and unsteady woofling does nothing for it. Marsh is an excellent Herald, but he is placed so far back that his voice seems smaller than it is and the general effect of his singing is less telling than it was in concert.

The chorus, whose role in an uncut "Lohengrin" is enormous, is excellent as to pitch and tone, but its German is only fair. The orchestral playing is splendid, whether in the firm sound of the brilliant tutti, or in subtleties like the soft cymbal strokes in the prelude or the chorus after Lohengrin's Grail Narrative.

The recording is generally well managed. Balances are clear, the stereo makes sense, and so does the placement of the singers (with the exception of my remark about the Herald and with the possible question that the sense of distance at Lohengrin's first entrance and final exit may be exaggerated.)

The off-stage fanfares are magnificent, and The Globe's own Grand Prix du Disque goes to BSO percussionist Arthur Press for his glorious imitation of a king smiting a shield with his sword.

The significant competition for this recording is Angel's not quite so well recorded or conducted (by Kempe), but with generally better principals (Jess Thomas, Elisabeth Gruemmer, Fischer-Dieskau, Christa Ludwig, Gottlob Frick).

186

WINTERFEST

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,293
NOV 30 1966

Something For Everyone At Winterfest

By ALTA MALONEY

Winterfest is in the works—that was the burden of a press conference called yesterday to discuss plans for the eight-day festival sponsored by the Cultural Foundation of Boston.

Lollipops and highball glasses — both emblazoned with the festival's dynamic trade mark — were given out, an indication of the wide range of audience to be reached.

FROM FEB. 19 THROUGH 26

Francis W. Sidlauskas, director of Winterfest '67, listed both the tangibles and intagibles of the program which will run from Feb. 19 through 26.

Martyn Green is so much a tangible, in his scheduled concert and production of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Trial by Jury;" that he was in attendance.

Beverly Sills, the Boston soprano who has signed for her debut at the Vienna Opera, was also there. She will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Feb. 23 at Symphony Hall in Haydn's "Creation" Mass.

Since the War Memorial Auditorium will be available for only five performances this season. Mr. Sidlauskis said, a "cultural shuttle" will help spread activities about the city.

One such will be the Charles Playhouse production of Bertoit Brecht's "Mother Courage," which he said would not be suitable for the auditorium anyway.

The Boston Pops will be heard at Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler conducting, and a work has been commissioned for the occasion on Feb. 20.

There will be a Folkfest with nationally prominent performers and the New England Conservatory Chorus will appear, fresh fro mits Russian tour.

Jacques D.'Amboise, the Boston Ballet and others will present a dance program as a "Salute to Jacob's Pillow," center of the Commonwealth's summer dance activities.

100 OR MORE EXHIBITS

There will be more than 100 exhibits and craft demonstrations, in which participants will include the Shaker Museum of Canterbury, N.H., the Museum of Fine Arts, Willimastown's Clark Art Institute, the Weavers Guild, the New England Sculptors Association and the Embroiderers Guild.

Expo '67 will be represented as well as activities of other governments, and seminars and lectures are being arranged on a variety of subjects such as the BRA, medicine, world affairs, theater, arts, law, government and literature.

Special for the children will be Punch and Judy Puppet Shows, and for the esoteric there will be an electronic music concert. And for some outstanding Bostonians there will be a gain this year the Boston Medals for distinguished achievement.

WINTERFEST TREAT—Christel Ibsen, 21, Miss Winnie Fest, shares emblem-decorated all-day sucker with Chadsworth, also known as Lloyd Llama, 4 months old. (Bill Brett Photo)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
NOV 30 1966

Winterfest '67 --Shorter Stay, Wider Scope

Globe Critic

Smog has been prevalent over Boston, but big, crystal-clear snowflakes were everywhere at the Sheraton-Boston Tuesday.

"Winterfest, '67" is on the way.

The snowflake is the emblem for Boston's eventful mid-Winter cultural potpourri. An estimated 550,000 attended its initial 10-day stand in Boston Auditorium last February.

Some changes are being made this year. The festival of the performing and visual arts, plus lectures, seminars and discussion groups, will be limited to an eight-day run, only five of them in the auditorium.

"We'll be shorter, but broader, covering a wider gamut of human activities," said Eli Goldston. He is general chairman of "Winterfest" for the second year.

He told a press conference the first three days of the Feb. 19-26 fete will be spread throughout the Back Bay area. There will be performances at Symphony Hall, Jordan Hall, the Charles Playhouse (where "Mother Courage" will be playing), New England Hall and John Hancock Hall.

The '67 budget also will be smaller, "somewhere between $175,000 and $200,000 in order to keep expenses and income exactly in line," Goldston said.

Goldston who also heads Winterfest's originator and sponsor, the Cultural Foundation of Boston, also told of hopes to erase last year's modest $3000 debt.

Total budget for '66 was $225,000. Of this, $150,000 was pledged by business firms, foundations and individuals; the remainder came from tickets, advertisements and sale of programs.

"Again we'll offer something for everyone," said Francis W. Sidlauskas, executive director of the foundation and again Winterfest's executive director: "The B.S.O., Pops, New Orleans jazz, many and varied exhibits, specially commissioned works in music, literature graphics and the dance, plus lots of activities for the kids."

Specifically, they include a B.S.O. concert with Boston's Beverly Sills as soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston pops in a specially commissioned work; Martyn Green in concert and in a production of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Trial by Jury"; Jacques d'Ambroise and the Boston Ballet in a "Salute to Jacob's Pillow"; the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus performing the program it is now giving on a tour of Russia; and a "Folkfest," featuring nationally prominent singers and instrumentalists. In addition, there will be Punch and Judy shows early and often every day; folk concerts and ethnic dances; an electronic music concert, and performances by local drama groups and orchestras, as yet unnamed.

There also will be more than 100 fine arts and crafts ehibits, already one-third over subscribed, says Sidlauskis. They run the gamut from antique autos to animals from the Children's Zoo at Franklin Park.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Chronicle
NEEDHAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 6,302
DEC 29 1966

Bos. Symphony Orchestra To Perform at Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Courier
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,678
DEC 29 1966

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Perform At Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Roxbury Gazette
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,015
DEC 29 1966

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Perform At Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Dorchester Beacon
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,390
DEC 29 1966

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Perform At Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
South Boston Gazette
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,263
DEC 29 1966

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Perform At Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,433
DEC 29 1966

Symphony Concert Is Part Of Winterfest

Chronicle-Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,441
DEC 29 1966

Symphony to Perform at Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,433
DEC 8 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Hyde Park Tribune
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 4,400
DEC 28 1966

Symphony To Perform At Winterfest

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Mattapan Tribune
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,784
DEC 28 1966

Symphony To Perform At Winterfest

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Jamaica Plain Citizen
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,336
DEC 28 1966

Symphony To Perform At Winterfest

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Independent
LITTLETON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,150
DEC 28 1966

Boston Symphony To Perform at Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Nashoba Free Press
HARVARD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,750
DEC 28 1966

Boston Symphony To Perform at Winterfest '67

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,404
DEC 27 1966

BSO To Perform At Winterfest

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald
ARLINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,500
DEC 30 1966

Boston Symphony To Perform

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789
DEC 24 1966

BSO Concert At Winterfest

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
DEC 21 1966

Leinsdorf to Conduct At Winterfest '67

News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Circ. 15,882
DEC 24 1966

Winter Concert Symphony Plays At Winterfest

BOSTON — Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special Winterfest '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, chairman, Boston Gas Company, and general chairman of Winterfest, has announced.

The program will consist of Haydn's "Creation" Mass with four, soloists and the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

A second feature of the concert will be a Brahms violin concerto performed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

Winterfest Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other Back Bay locations.

The eight-day cultural festival, fashioned after last year's successful Winterfest program which attracted a half-million people to the Auditorium, offers an exciting array of cultural, entertainment, and educational events including amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 square feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting Feb. 22 at the Auditorium; lectures, discussions, and seminars on timely topics; film festival; folkfest; special children's programs; and many other special events.

187

Pennysaver
Peabody, Mass.
0-47
New England Newsclip
JAN 18 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT WINTERFEST '67

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Symphony Orchestra To Perform At Winterfest '67

Bulletin
EASTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,814
JAN 5 1967

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
JAN 1 1967

Post Gazette
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 21,500
JAN 13 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WINTERFEST

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special WINTERFEST '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, chairman, Boston Gas Co., and general chairman of WINTERFEST, has announced.

The program will consist of Haydn's "Creation" Mass with four soloists and the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

A second feature of the concert will be a Brahms violin concerto performed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other Back Bay locations.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Herald
ARLINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,500
JAN 26 1967

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
JAN 29 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest Concert Feb. 20

The Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting will present a special Winterfest concert on Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, according to Eli Goldston, chairman.

Featured will be the premiere of a "Winterfest Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra," one of four works in the field of music, poetry, and the graphic arts specially commissioned for winterfest.

Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog," is the composer of the new piece, which will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

This is the first concerto for a five-stringed banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned, according to Manuel Greenhill, Seeger's manager. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score.

Winterfest Week in Boston is scheduled frmm Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other locations throughout the City. Planned as a civic and cultural festival in the tradition of great festivals offering the widest possible range of cultural, entertainment and educational attractions, the Winterfest '67 events include amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 square feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22, and running through Feb. 26 at the Auditorium; lectures, seminars, and discussions on timely topics; special children's programs; a film festival; and many other special events.

DORCHESTER ARGUS-CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,300
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest Tickets On Sale Feb. 6

Tickets priced at $3, $2, and $1 will go on sale Monday, February 6, at the War Memorial Auditorium for Boston's second edition of WINTERFEST, scheduled at the Auditorium and other points throughout the City from February 19-26.

Mayor John F. Collins heads the WINTERFEST committee as Honorary Chairman, with Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, as General Chairman of the eight-day festival.

The WINTERFEST box office at the Auditorium will be open from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. daily.

At the same time, tickets will go on sale at Jordan Hall and Symphony Hall for WINTERFEST events scheduled at these locations. These performances, also priced at $3, $2, and $1, are the New England Conservatory Chorus presenting its Russian tour program, Sunday, February 19, at 8:30 p.m. at Jordan Hall; Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting, Monday, February 20, at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Thursday, February 23, at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

128 World
NORWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 10,000
JAN 11 1967

Rita's Route

By RITA TOOHI

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special WINTERFEST '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, and general chairman of WINTERFEST, has announced.

The program will consist of Haydn's "Creation" Mass with four soloists and the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

A second feature of the concert will be a Brahms violin concerto performed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other Back Bay locations.

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
WEEKLY INDEPENDENT
CIRC. 8,200
JAN 18 1967
New England Newsclip

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
JAN 6 1967

BSO at Winterfest

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special Winterfest '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23, at 8:30 p.m., at Symphony Hall. Haydn's "Creation" Mass will be performed with the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

Boston Pops at Winterfest

The Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting will present a special WINTERFEST concert on Monday, February 20, at 8:30 PM at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, and general chairman of WINTERFEST Week in Boston, has announcd.

Featured will be the premiere of a "Winterfest Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra," one of four works in the field of music, poetry, and the graphic arts specially commissioned for WINTERFEST.

Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog," is the composer of the new piece which will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

This is the first concerto for a five-stringed banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned, according to Manuel Greenhill, Seeger's manager. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other locations throughout the City. Planned as a civic and cultural festival in the tradition of great festivals offering the widest possible range of cultural, entertainment, and educational attractions, the WINTERFEST '67 lineup of events include amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 sq. feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22, and running through Feb. 26 at the Auditorium; lectures, seminars, and discussions on timely topics; special children's programs; a film festival; and many other special events.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest visitors to hear, see firsts

By a staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor
Boston

A poem, a banjo concerto, a lithograph print, and a woodcut—what do they have in common?

They're works which have been specially commissioned for Winterfest, Boston's civic-cultural festival scheduled this year from Feb. 19 to Feb. 26.

A poem by Pulitzer-Prize winner Richard G. Eberhart will be read opening day, Sunday, Feb. 19 at the concert of the New England Conservatory Chorus, 8:30 p.m. at Jordan Hall.

Mr. Eberhart is professor of English and poet-in-residence at Dartmouth College. He has won several literary awards and received the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry last year for his book "Richard Eberhart: Selected Poems 1930-1965."

Banjo concerts next

The next day, Monday, Feb. 20, folk-singer-banjoist Pete Seeger will play the specially commissioned banjo concerto with the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score for Mr. Seeger.

Earl Robinson, composer of the concerto, has written several film scores and the musical "Sandhog." The Winterfest concert is at Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m.

In the graphic arts, George Lockwood, a lithographer who operates the Impressions Workshop, Inc., Boston, has been commissioned by Winterfest and the Boston Public Library to do a stone lithograph print. The limited printing of 100 copies will be on sale during Winterfest.

Mr. Lockwood's Impressions Workshop is the only independent graphics shop in the area, and one of two in the United States. Others are connected with universities and private foundations.

New woodcut made

Also to be unveiled at Winterfest is an original woodcut by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young artist from Kyoto, Japan, who now is teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City.

To commemorate the "sister city" relationship between Boston and Kyoto, the woodcut was commissioned by the Sister City Committee, in collaboration with the Boston Public Library and in consultation with the Department of Asiatic Art, Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. Fifty copies of the wood block print will be on sale.

Sinclair Hitchings, curator of prints at the Boston Public Library, said that the library is pleased to collaborate with Winterfest in commissioning Mr. Lockwood and Miss Matsubara.

"We feel Winterfest is giving strong impetus to art by placing it within the range of many people, and not just a few," he added.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600
047
JAN 25 1967
New England Newsclip

New Orleans Jazz At Winterfest '67

Authentic New Orleans jazz lovers will appreciate this year's "Winterfest" as perhaps their last chance to hear this inventive, highly personal and emotional art, fast dying out as young musicians choose other expression channels.

The Eurka Brass Band and Storyville Ramblers will lead a jam session at the War Memorial Auditorium on Thursday, Feb. 23, at 8:30 p.m., according to Eli Goldston, chairman of the eight-day festival.

New Orleans jazz has become known for its perfect blending of several improvised melodies, all played simultaneously. Each musician shifts from one melody of his own into another without any interchange of clues. The whole is improvised.

The ten-man Eurka Brass Band, led by 75-year-old trumpet player Percy Humphrey, is famous for mock funeral processions through the narrow streets of the New Orleans French Quarter. Marshalls are Matthew "Fats" Houston and Booker T. Glass. Other members are Kid Sheik and Peter Bocage, trumpet; Oscar "Chicker" Henry and Humphrey's brother Earl, trombone; Humphrey's other brother, Willie, clarinet; Emmanuel Paul, tenor saxophone; William G. Brown, sousaphone and Cie Frazier and Noel "Papa" Glass son of Booker T. Glass, drummers.

The Storyville Ramblers, a smaller jazz group led by Kid Sheik on trumpet, will include Louis Nelson, trombone; Cap'n John Handy, alto saxophone and clarinet; Fred "Archie" Minor, banjo; Chester Zardis, string bass; James "Sing" Miller, piano and Alex Bigard, drums.

On February 19 at 8:30 p.m. in the Jordan Hall, the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will present a Russian program, just recently performed by the group in Russia during a tour there.

The Boston Pops, directed by Arthur Fiedler will present a commisioned work Feb. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. A folk specialist will also play.

The Feb. 21 program is still indefinite.

On Feb. 22 in the War Memorial Auditorium, the Boston and Cambridge Ballet Companies will present 'Salute to Jacob's Pillow," featuring Jacques d'Amboise. Included will be modern dancers, Alonzo Riviera of Mexico and The Great Bhasker of India.

Besides the jazz program at the War Memorial Auditorium Feb. 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also play that evening at Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will be conducting.

A Folk Fest will be featured Feb. 25 at the W.M. Auditorium with prominent international folk figures.

Martyn Green, a Gilbert and Sullivan actor, will be the feature of Feb. 25 at the W.M. Auditorium, with "Trial By Jury."

For further information, contact Patricia Lynch, 523-5005.

Chili sauce stains? Sponge and cleanse w[illegible]. Hot water will [illegible]

C 64

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

128 World
NORWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 10,000
JAN 4 1967

Winterfest '67 Plans More Variety Than Last Season

BOSTON - A display of the cultural treasures of Massachusetts cities ... national ballet stars ... Boston's famous Pops and Symphony orchestras ... historian Arnold Toynbee heading an array of lecturers and panelists ...

These are just a few of the many attractions planned for Boston's second Winterfest, scheduled for Feb. 19 - 26.

A preliminary peek at the Winterfest '67 program given by Eli Goldston, Boston Gas Co. chairman and general chairman of the event, shows it packed with "something for everyone" - major performances, exciting exhibits, and important discussion programs.

Described by Goldston as "shorter and broader" than the 1966 extravaganza which attracted over a half-million persons to Boston's War Memorial Auditorium, Winterfest '67 will run only 8 days instead of 10, but it will be extended to encompass activities throughout the Back Bay area and beyond.

"Winterfest comes again during the school vacation period," Goldston announced, "and it will present a kaleidoscope of entertainment and education for youngsters and their parents.

Included in the varied exhibit program will be art from the Museum of Fine Arts, the Sterling and Francine Clark Institute,

187

Pennysaver
Peabody, Mass.
C-47
New England Newsclip
JAN 18 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT WINTERFEST '67

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Symphony Ochestra To Perform At Winterfest '67
PAGE
PAGE ONE

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Bulletin
EASTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,814
JAN 5 1967

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
JAN 1 1967

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Post Gazette
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 21,500
JAN 13 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WINTERFEST

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special WINTERFEST '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, chairman, Boston Gas Co., and general chairman of WINTERFEST, has announced.

The program will consist of Haydn's "Creation" Mass with four soloists and the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

A second feature of the concert will be a Brahms violin concerto performed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other Back Bay locations.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald
ARLINGTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,500
JAN 20 1967

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
JAN 29 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest Concert Feb. 20

The Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting will present a special Winterfest concert on Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 p m. at Symphony Hall, according to Eli Goldston, chairman.

Featured will be the premiere of a "Winterfest Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra," one of four works in the field of music, poetry, and the graphic arts specially commissioned for winterfest.

Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog," is the composer of the new piece, which will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

This is the first concerto for a five-stringed banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned, according to Manuel Greenhill, Seeger's manager. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score.

Winterfest Week in Boston is scheduled frmm Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other locations throughout the City. Planned as a civic and cultural festival in the tradition of great festivals offering the widest possible range of cultural, entertainment and educational attractions, the Winterfest '67 events include amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 square feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22, and running through Feb. 26 at the Auditorium; lectures, seminars, and discussions on timely topics; special children's programs; a film festival; and many other special events.

DORCHESTER ARGUS-CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,300
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest Tickets On Sale Feb. 6

Tickets priced at $3, $2, and $1 will go on sale Monday, February 6, at the War Memorial Auditorium for Boston's second edition of WINTERFEST, scheduled at the Auditorium and other points throughout the City from February 19-26.

Mayor John F. Collins heads the WINTERFEST committee as Honorary Chairman, with Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, as General Chairman of the eight-day festival.

The WINTERFEST box office at the Auditorium will be open from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. daily.

At the same time, tickets will go on sale at Jordan Hall and Symphony Hall for WINTERFEST events scheduled at these locations. These performances, also priced at $3, $2, and $1, are the New England Conservatory Chorus presenting its Russian tour program, Sunday, February 19, at 8:30 p.m. at Jordan Hall; Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting, Monday, February 20, at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Thursday, February 23, at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
128 World
NORWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 10,000
JAN 11 1967

Rita's Route

By RITA TOOHI

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special WINTERFEST '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 8:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, and general chairman of WINTERFEST, has announced.

The program will consist of Haydn's "Creation" Mass with four soloists and the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

A second feature of the concert will be a Brahms violin concerto performed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other Back Bay locations.

TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
WEEKLY INDEPENDENT
CIRC. 8,200
JAN 18 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Pops at Winterfest

The Boston Pops Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conducting will present a special WINTERFEST concert on Monday, February 20, at 8:30 PM at Symphony Hall, Eli Goldston, Chairman, Boston Gas Company, and general chairman of WINTERFEST Week in Boston, has announced.

Featured will be the premiere of a "Winterfest Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra," one of four works in the field of music, poetry, and the graphic arts specially commissioned for WINTERFEST.

Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog," is the composer of the new piece which will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

This is the first concerto for a five-stringed banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned, according to Manuel Greenhill, Seeger's manager. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score.

WINTERFEST Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26 at the War Memorial Auditorium and other locations throughout the City. Planned as a civic and cultural festival in the tradition of great festivals offering the widest possible range of cultural, entertainment, and educational attractions, the WINTERFEST '67 lineup of events include amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 sq. feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22, and running through Feb. 26 at the Auditorium; lectures, seminars, and discussions on timely topics; special children's programs; a film festival; and many other special events.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
JAN 6 1967

BSO at Winterfest

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special Winterfest '67 concert on Thursday, Feb. 23, at 8:30 p.m., at Symphony Hall. Haydn's "Creation" Mass will be performed with the Rutgers University Choir. Soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Ara Berberian, bass.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
JAN 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest visitors to hear, see firsts

By a staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

A poem, a banjo concerto, a lithograph print, and a woodcut—what do they have in common?

They're works which have been specially commissioned for Winterfest, Boston's civic-cultural festival scheduled this year from Feb. 19 to Feb. 26.

A poem by Pulitzer-Prize winner Richard G. Eberhart will be read opening day, Sunday, Feb. 19 at the concert of the New England Conservatory Chorus, 8:30 p.m. at Jordan Hall.

Mr. Eberhart is professor of English and poet-in-residence at Dartmouth College. He has won several literary awards and received the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry last year for his book "Richard Eberhart: Selected Poems 1930-1965."

Banjo concerts next

The next day, Monday, Feb. 20, folk-singer-banjoist Pete Seeger will play the specially commissioned banjo concerto with the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score for Mr. Seeger.

Earl Robinson, composer of the concerto, has written several film scores and the musical "Sandhog." The Winterfest concert is at Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m.

In the graphic arts, George Lockwood, a lithographer who operates the Impressions Workshop, Inc., Boston, has been commissioned by Winterfest and the Boston Public Library to do a stone lithograph print. The limited printing of 100 copies will be on sale during Winterfest.

Mr. Lockwood's Impressions Workshop is the only independent graphics shop in the area, and one of two in the United States. Others are connected with universities and private foundations.

New woodcut made

Also to be unveiled at Winterfest is an original woodcut by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young artist from Kyoto, Japan, who now is teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City.

To commemorate the "sister city" relationship between Boston and Kyoto, the woodcut was commissioned by the Sister City Committee in collaboration with the Boston Public Library and in consultation with the Department of Asiatic Art, Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. Fifty copies of the wood block print will be on sale.

Sinclair Hitchings, curator of prints at the Boston Public Library, said that the library is pleased to collaborate with Winterfest in commissioning Mr. Lockwood and Miss Matsubara.

"We feel Winterfest is giving strong impetus to art by placing it within the range of many people, and not just a few," he added.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600
047
JAN 25 1967
New England Newsclip

New Orleans Jazz At Winterfest '67

Authentic New Orleans jazz lovers will appreciate this year's "Winterfest" as perhaps their last chance to hear this inventive, highly personal and emotional art, fast dying out as young musicians choose other expression channels.

The Eurka Brass Band and Storyville Ramblers will lead a jam session at the War Memorial Auditorium on Thursday, Feb. 23, at 8:30 p.m., according to Eli Goldston, chairman of the eight-day festival.

New Orleans jazz has become known for its perfect blending of several improvised melodies, all played simultaneously. Each musician shifts from one melody of his own into another without any interchange of clues. The whole is improvised.

The ten-man Eurka Brass Band, led by 75-year-old trumpet player Percy Humphrey, is famous for mock funeral processions through the narrow streets of the New Orleans French Quarter. Marshalls are Matthew "Fats" Houston and Booker T. Glass. Other members are Kid Sheik and Peter Bocage, trumpet; Oscar "Chicken" Henry and Humphrey's brother Earl, trombone; Humphrey's other brother, Willie, clarinet; Emmanuel Paul, tenor saxophone; William G. Brown, sousaphone and Cie Frazi er and Noel "Papa" Glass son of Booker T. Glass, drummers.

The Storyville Ramblers, a smaller jazz group led by Kid Sheik on trumpet, will include Louis Nelson, trombone; Cap'n John Handy, alto saxophone and clarinet; Fred "Archie" Minor, banjo; Chester Zardis, string bass; James "Sing" Miller, piano and Alex Bigard, drums.

On February 19 at 8:30 p.m. in the Jordan Hall, the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will present a Russian program, just recently performed by the group in Russia during a tour there.

The Boston Pops, directed by Arthur Fiedler will present a commisioned work Feb. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. A folk specialist will also play.

The Feb. 21 program is still indefinite.

On Feb. 22 in the War Memorial Auditorium, the Boston and Cambridge Ballet Companies will present 'Salute to Jacob's Pillow," featuring Jacques d'Amboise. Included will be modern dancers, Alonzo Riviera of Mexico and The Great Bhasker of India.

Besides the jazz program at the War Memorial Auditorium Feb. 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also play that evening at Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will be conducting.

A Folk Fest will be featured Feb. 25 at the W.M. Auditorium with prominent international folk figures.

Martyn Green, a Gilbert and Sullivan actor, will be the feature of Feb. 25 at the W.M. Auditorium, with "Trial By Jury."

For further information, contact Patricia Lynch, 523-5005.

Chili sauce stains? Sponge and cleanse w[illegible] Hot water will [illegible]

C64

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
128 World
NORWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 10,000
JAN 4 1967

Winterfest '67 Plans More Variety Than Last Season

BOSTON - A display of the cultural treasures of Massachusetts cities ... national ballet stars ... Boston's famous Pops and Symphony orchestras ... historian Arnold Toynbee heading an array of lecturers and panelists ...

These are just a few of the many attractions planned for Boston's second Winterfest, scheduled for Feb 19 - 26.

A preliminary peek at the Winterfest '67 program given by Eli Goldston, Boston Gas Co. chairman and general chairman of the event, shows it packed with "something for everyone" - major performances, exciting exhibits, and important discussion programs.

Described by Goldston as "shorter and broader" than the 1966 extravaganza which attracted over a half-million persons to Boston's War Memorial Auditorium, Winterfest '67 will run only 8 days instead of 10, but it will be extended to encompass activities throughout the Back Bay area and beyond.

"Winterfest comes again during the school vacation period," Goldston announced, "and it will present a kaleidoscope of entertainment and education for youngsters and their parents.

Included in the varied exhibit program will be art from the Museum of Fine Arts, the Sterling and Francine Clark Institute,

188

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 105,700
FEB 19 1967
New England Newsclip

Winterfest '67: From Banjo To Brahms

By JOHN R. THORNTON

BOSTON'S WINTERFEST, which attracted more than 500,000 interested citizens to Prudential Center last winter, is with us again. It opens officially today with Lorna Cook de Varon directing the New England Conservatory Chorus in a concert at Jordan Hall at 8:30 p.m.

The first Winterfest drew some sharp criticism on its confused scheduling, but the Culture Foundation's new staff appears to have benefited from these comments and has worked out a much more practical calendar.

This year the major dramatic and concert events have been scheduled at various places around the city, a move that will relieve overcrowding at the sprawling War Memorial.

On Tuesday evening, Arthur Fiedler will conduct a special Winterfest concert at Symphony Hall, beginning at 8:30 p.m., and if things work out as planned the "Pops" Orchestra will perform an unusual world premiere.

Composer Earl Robinson has been commissioned to write a Concerto for 5-String Banjo and Orchestra, with folk singer Pete Seeger as instrumentalist.

A few days ago it seemed the concerto might have to be canceled, owing to lack of rehearsal time, but such last moment confusion is invariably overcome.

Seeger, the father of American folk singers, is an accomplished artist and sort of singing historian as well as our leading exponent of the 5-string banjo.

The banjo, developed in the early days of settlement by the American Negro, is perhaps our most authentic native instrument. With the surge of interest in folk singing during the past decade, it has regained its popularity, although it is still regarded mainly as an instrument of accompaniment.

If Robinson has written a superior score, the Winterfest premiere could help place it in a new light.

THE WAR MEMORIAL Auditorium will have its first large scale performing arts event on Tuesday when the combined Boston and Cambridge ballet groups present "A Salute to Jacob's Pillar."

Jacques D'Amboise of the New York City Ballet will be a featured soloist, along with Mexico's Alonza Rivera and Indian dancer Bhaskav.

On Thursday Leinsdorf will direct a performance of Haydn's great "Creation" Mass, with the Rutgers University Choir, and after intermission the BSO's highly talented concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, will perform the Brahms Violin Concerto. This concert at Symphony Hall starts at 8:30 p.m.

Silverstein, heard here a few weeks ago when the Boston Chamber Players concertized at UMP's Luther Bonney Auditorium, could have become world famous as a violin soloist but instead chose to be an ensemble player. Whenever he does play solo, Bostonians rush to the box office, for he is a truly remarkable musician.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

JAZZ FANS will be happy to know that a large New Orleans jazz concert takes place at War Memorial Auditorium on Thursday with two performances, matinee at 2 o'clock and evening concert at 8:30.

This is not a hastily drummed up affair, but rather is Jazz From the Beginning, with the Old Guard of New Orleans, the exuberant "Eureka Brass Band" and the "Storyville Ramblers," scheduled to hold "gut bucket" sessions.

This may be a final opportunity to hear in this region jazz as it was born more than 50 years ago at New Orleans in the ancient French Quarter.

Many of the same men who helped begin the tradition of true American jazz are in the Eureka Brass Band, which still marches through New Orleans in mock funeral processions.

Percy Humphrey, now 75, will lead the band. His Marshalls include Matthew "Fats" Houston and Booker T. Glass. Other members are "Kid" Sheik, Peter Bocage, Oscar "Chicken" Henry, Humphrey's brothers, Willie and Earl, Emanuel Paul, William Brown, Cie Frazier and Noel "Papa" Glass.

"Kid" Sheik will also lead the smaller Storyville group which numbers among its members Louis Nelson, "Cap'n" John Handy, "Archie" Minor, Chester Zardia, "Sing" Miller and Alex Bigard.

Original New Orleans jazz has one unique feature that once heard can never be forgotten. The group plays from three to five different melodies at the same time, yet blends to perfection.

Another unusual feature is "collective improvization," with each musician shifting from one melody to another without cue interchange.

The matinee jazz session saves the day for me, for if these groups had scheduled just an evening performance it would have meant a choice between Silverstein and Percy Humphrey, between Brahms and original jazz, a test of the musical soul.

THE MOST FASCINATING aspect of Winterfest are its framework, its method of operation and above all, its reasons for being.

At the very moment when the Hub-of-the-Universe was admitting to shameful de-escalation of the arts, a group of Boston business men rose out of ruins of the bankrupt Boston Garden Art Festival and organized this winter gala.

They formed "The Cultural Foundation of Boston Inc.," helped to bankroll and administrate the first 1966 event and startled even themselves with the turnout of half a million.

In addition to the concerts and dance events mentioned, more than 120,000 square feet of space will contain art and artisan exhibits at the Memorial. There will also be lectures, seminars, special children's programs, a film festival and many special events.

Martin Green, of Gilbert and Sullivan fame, will stage a performance of "Trial By Jury;" there will be a special folk song concert on Saturday, and ten selected drama groups will stage productions.

Members of our own Greater Portland Arts Council, city officials, PSO trustees, arts, music and drama followers would do well to visit Winterfest this week.

Close observation could give us all some fine ideas for an eventual Greater Portland Arts Festival. Wouldn't THAT be something!

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
MAR 5 1967
New England Newsclip

More Is Less

The Cultural Circus of Winterfest

By KEVIN KELLY

The most significant triumph of Winterfest is that it proved a conclusive cliche: More is less.

After a week of spreading culture before the masses, more specifically what is considered culture by the Winterfest board of directors, we were given the tabulation of daily attendance. Thousands came and each day the number mounted. Even when it snowed, they still came, herding themselves to the War Memorial building for the chance of grazing on culture.

But what they were offered (whether it was all free-for-the-taking or not has very little to do with it) was an indiscriminate melange, a Poverty Program presented as a Culture Circus, a little of this, a little of that, and nothing of much merit.

Now I'm well aware Winterfest is a democratic idea, possibly even a sincere attempt to do something for the people of Boston and its suburbs. It occurs to me, however, that it is a political idea gone wrong, an idea that perhaps could go nowhere but wrong in an age when culture is sold like a popular item at the local supermarket. In his perceptive book "Acid Test," critic John Simon has specified the dilemma: "Culture has become so widespread as to have, for most practical purposes attentuated itself out of existence. The fault is not only the public's or the educator's: There is also too much around us today that needs, or seems to need, keeping up with . . ."

Winterfest would appear to be dedicated solely to the notion that we must keep up with the race. What is important is not culture in depth, not a single, perhaps significant response to a given art form, but a cluster of superficial responses to a Disneyland display of everything from an Ellsworth Kelly lithograph (courtesy of the Harcus-Krakow Gallery) to a juvenile display of hysteria in a Happening (courtesy or discourtesy, I'm not sure which, of the Caravan Theater).

Simon has suggested that we have all been copped by culture and that the copping has created a "knowledgeably mindless mediocrity." At any cocktail party, for example, or in any theater lobby during intermisison, there is an endless chatter of instant-reference. There is talk of Kline, Kandinsky and Warhol in the same breath with Tuesday Weld, the Monkees and Mae West. Soupy Sales shares words with Moliere. Anita Ekberg and the Venus di Milo are matched. Antonioni waltzes at the same speed as Otto Preminger, as Bach and the Beatles jostle William Burroughs.

The names are heard frequently enough, although it can be of help (should the intermission stretch) to know something about the actor, artist, artisan in question, a word or two, perhaps even a chic periphrastic phrase about his revelance to the scene. Greater knowledge, in the slim, slick spread of culture, isn't really demanded. It's correct to be hip, but to be too hip implies scholastic boorishness. Ambrose Bierce described a bore as someone who tells you how he is when you ask, "How are you?" In a similar way never ask a sophisticate in our culture-minded generation for anything more than a slick, quick answer on cultural questions for fear of the same boredom. It is better to know a great many things with casual ease than to know only a few with deeper conviction.

So goes the prevailing attitude, an attitude mirrored by Winterfest.

And here, precisely, is where Winterfest makes its most serious mistake: It has set up a superficial mass demonstration without regard for quality of any kind (I exempt, here, the Boston Symphony's performance of the Haydn "Creation" Mass, the week's one, isolated highpoint). This mistake is magnified when culture becomes blithely confused with civic pride, when local amateurs pervade the program, not as peripheral attractions (as they were, for prime example, at the Boston Arts Festivals) but as the main events. Skim the scheduled program for Montreal's Expo '67. In program, at least, it is a dazzling array of the world's leading opera houses and theaters. While the Expo '67 events may amount to a clutter of activity, they are spread over a full year, and the performance level promises a high degree of professionalism.

It appears now that Winterfest will not be held next year, at least not at the War Memorial building. It is to be moved elsewhere and called either Muni-fest or City-fest and presumably carry on the tradition of the fest-ering parent. I respectfully submit that the tradition such as it has been, should be analyzed and altered. The goal should be directed to quality rather than quantity, to a significant responsive attendance rather than a numbers total of the herd passing the gate. Winterfest is a workable idea which, so far, has been poorly worked. If it gave us less on a higher standard, it would come closer, I think, to fulfilling its potential.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
FEB 5 1967

Winterfest Puts a Bostonian Accent on Culture

By JOHN H. FENTON

BOSTON — Culture, traditionally considered as much of a natural resource as codfish and banking in Boston, will get another boost here on Feb. 19. The date marks the opening of the second annual Winterfest, an eight-day program of music, drama, lectures and art displays.

Although the activities will take place mainly in the War Memorial Auditorium in the Prudential Center, Winterfest events also will be held in Symphony and Jordan Halls, two music centers within a reasonable walking distance, and at several other locations.

Most Performances Free

The festival is aimed at stimulating the interest of small children, folk-singing teen-agers and adults with more sophisticated tastes in the fine arts. The prices for the few performances that are not free will range from $1 to $3, with children's tickets offered at 50 cents. Moreover, the sponsors of Winterfest, the Cultural Foundation of Boston, Inc., will distribute about $10,000 in tickets to Boston children through a local antipoverty agency.

Performers and visiting lecturers include Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra; Pete Seeger, the folksinger; Arnold Toynbee, the English historian, and Richard G. Eberhart, poet-in-residence at Dartmouth College.

8-Day Run

Last year, Winterfest attracted about 500,000 people during its 10-day run. The 1967 edition, which will be two days shorter, is expected to match, if not surpass, that figure.

The major performances include the New England Conservatory Chorus at Jordan Hall on Feb. 19; the Boston Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Feb. 20; a ballet and modern dance program, with Jacques d'Amboise, at the War Memorial Auditorium on Feb. 22 and a concert by the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall on Feb. 23.

Aerial Photos of New England

BACK BAY PANORAMA—The new Boston, with Prudential Center in foreground.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
FEB 10 1967
New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

The city of Boston has its own way of overcoming the mid-winter doldrums. For all those who are not able to go in search of the sun, there is Winterfest. The second annual festival of the arts is due to begin officially on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22 and run through Feb. 26. There are, however, several events scheduled for the beginning of that week, and at least two of them will be performed by some of Boston's favorite organizations.

The New England Conservatory Chorus opens the week on Sunday evening, Feb. 19 at Jordan Hall, with a performance of the music they sang on their tour of Russia this fall. The Soviet Ambassador to the United States, Anatoliy F. Dobrynin, has been invited to attend the concert, and he has indicated that he hopes to be able to come. Valentin M. Kemenev, Cultural Counselor at the Russian Embassy, will be there to represent his country.

Many members of The Friends of the New England Conservatory will be planning to attend the event. Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr. of Chestnut Hill is chairman of this active organization, and among those on her committee are Mrs. John H. Carter of Weston, Mrs. Charles B. Barnes of Westwood, Mrs. Frederick J. Stare of Wellesley, Mrs. Paul C. Reardon of Hingham, Mrs. Charles M. Lombard of Needham, Mrs. Nicholas W. Danforth of Weston, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestunt Hill and Mrs. Henry Wheeler Jr. of Weston.

On Monday evening, Feb. 20, Boston's beloved Pops Orchestra, conducted by Anthur Fiedler, will give a special Winterfest at Symphony Hall. This will be a glimpse of springtime delights to come for many, for spring and the Pops are synonymous.

Thursday, Feb. 23, sees performances by two more groups that are a permanent part of the Boston scene. The Charles Playhouse will perform "Peter and the Wolf" at the War Memorial Auditorium, and at Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special performance of Haydn's "Creation Mass" conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with Milton's Beverly Sills (Mrs. Peter Greenough), Beverly Wolff, Placido Domingo and Ara Berberian as soloists.

189

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,200
FEB 20 1967
New England Newsclip

SUBURBAN EREE PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY
FEB 2 1967
New England Newsclip

BOSTON: JAPANESE STYLE—To commemorate the "sister city" relationship enjoyed since 1959 between Boston and Kyoto, Japan, and to add new impetus to the many cultural exchange programs between the two cities, the Boston-Kyoto City Committee has commissioned an original wood block print which is being unveiled at Winterfest. The print, created by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young Kyoto artist who is now teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City, is also being offered for sale during Winterfest. A limited edition of 50 prints has been made. The print features Boston's North End Mall, the statue of Paul Revere and the Old North Church.

Special works for festival—

Poet, composer, and artist commissioned by Winterfest

CITY RECORD
BOSTON, MASS.
OFF. BOSTON PUBLICATION
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,200
FEB 4 1967
New England Newsclip

Poet, Composer, Artist Aiding Winterfest

A poet, composer, and artist have been commissioned by Winterfest to create special works to be presented during the eight-day civic-cultural festival scheduled for Boston from February 19 to 26. Mayor John F. Collins heads the Winterfest Committee as honorary chairman with Eli Goldston, chairman, Boston Gas Company, as general chairman of the event.

They are Pulitzer Prize winner Richard G. Eberhart, Professor of English and poet-in-residence at Dartmouth College; composer Earl Robinson, who has written several film scores and the musical "Sandhog"; and George Lockwood, a lithographer who operates the Impressions Workshop, Inc., Boston.

Professor Eberhart was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry last year for his book "Richard Eberhart: Selected Poems 1930-1965." His Winterfest poem will be read opening day of Winterfest, Sunday, February 19, at the concert scheduled by the New England Conservatory Chorus at Jordan Hall at 8.30 P.M. Winner of several literary awards, Professor Eberhart is a reviewer for the New York Times Book Review. He was appointed by former President Eisenhower to the Advisory Committee on the Arts for the National Cultural Center in Washington in 1959 and served as consultant in poetry at the Library of Congress from 1959 to 1961.

(Continued on page 138)

Mr. Robinson has been commissioned to compose a concerto for five stringed banjo and orchestra. It will be premiered at the special Winterfest concert of the Boston Pops Orchestra, Monday, February 20, at Symphony Hall, at 8.30 P.M. The composition, the first concerto ever written for five stringed banjo and orchestra, will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score for Seeger.

Winterfest and the Boston Public Library have commissioned Mr. Lockwood to do a stone lithograph print, which will have a limited printing. The 100 copies made of this print — a semi-symbolic tree done in a delicate, sensitive technique typical of the artist — will be on sale during Winterfest. Mr. Lockwood's Impressions Workshop is the only independent graphics shop in the area, and one of the two in the country. Others are connected with universities and private foundations. He has taught at Smith College, Amherst, University of Florida, the Worcester Museum School, the Massachusetts College of Art, and most recently, the Rhode Island School of Design. In Boston, he has had one-man shows at the Kanegis and Tragos galleries.

Also to be unveiled at Winterfest is an original wood block print ship between Boston and Kyoto, Sister City Committee to commemorate the "sister city" relationship between Boston and Kyoto, Japan. The print will be created by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young Kyoto artist, who is now teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City. The Sister City Committee has commissioned the print in collaboration with the Boston Public Library and in consultation with the department of Asiatic Art of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

Miss Matsubara, a Fulbright Scholar, who has been teaching "Hanga," wood block cutting, and printing at Pratt since 1965, will create a wood block print representative of the City of Boston. Fifty copies will be on sale at Winterfest.

Sinclair Hitchings, Curator of Prints at the Boston Public Library working with the Winterfest Committee on the commissioning of the Matsubara and Lockwood prints, said the purchase price of the prints will be $15.

"The Library is pleased to collaborate with Winterfest in the commissioning of these high caliber artists," said Mr. Hitchings. "We feel Winterfest is giving strong impetus to art by placing it within the range of many people, and not just a few," he added.

Mr. Hitchings also disclosed that 25 copies of an abstract color print, done by one of Japan's leading artists, Hodaka Yoshida of Tokyo, have been obtained and will also be offered for sale at Winterfest.

The eight-day cultural festival, fashioned after last year's successful Winterfest program which attracted a half-million people to the Auditorium, offers an exciting array of cultural, entertainment, and educational events, including amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 square feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting February 22 at the Auditorium; lectures, discussions, and seminars on timely topics; film festival; folkfest; special children's proprams; and many other special events.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
FEB 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Music To Shape A Winterfest By

By Peter M. Knapp

"As Quiet As" a stageful of musicians, might be another completion of Michael Colgrass' witty musical simile. The 35-year-old Chicago-born composer has fashioned a delightful suite of program music literally out of a children's exercise.

The work, premiered at last summer's Tanglewood season and composed on a Fromm Music Foundation commission, formed the centerpiece of the Boston Symphony's program on Tuesday under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. The provocative title and the composition's literal content come from a series of answers by fourth-grade children asked to complete the sentence, "Let's be as quiet as . . ." Some of the replies: "a leaf turning colors;" "children sleeping;" "the first star coming out."

Unpretentious

Colgrass' composition is dedicated to children, and is just as unpretentious as that — something of a novelty in today's ultra-serious musical workshops. "As Quiet As" is as refreshing as, well, "a soft rainfall" to use another of Colgrass' seven sections.

Colgrass employs modern sound-language. If there is a touch of "cuteness" in the score's literal musical translations of the happenings he describes (such as the nursery-rhyme tinkling in "Children Sleeping"), it is more intentional than gauche.

His leaf "turns color" through the simple but effective technique of a sustained brass note imperceptibly gathering instrumental "color" through the gradual addition of other instruments; the "soft rainfall" patters through violin finger pizzicato; the "first star" flickers, shimmers and builds to an intense glare through an ethereal crescendo; "an ant walking" amusingly skitters and lurches through chirping strings and glissandi. "Time Passing" presents fragments of Haydn, Ravel, Sibelius and jazz juxtaposed against an orchestral haze in a complex section requiring two conductors; Charles Wilson assisted Leinsdorf here.

For scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Leinsdorf selected portions from the original ballet score, ignoring the three suites Prokofiev prepared. This, too, is "program music" of a sort, though both objective and subjective; the chilling funeral music for Juliet, for example, is a sublime musical evocation of horror and tragedy.

Though much of Part I seemed bloodless, Leinsdorf warmed up in the "Dance of Love," and Part II was ardently, and at times excitingly, performed by the orchestra. Cellist Martin Hoberman, who began the evening at the first cello desk, showed his versatility in the Prokofiev suite by playing saxophone and mandolin.

The concert opened with a big-scaled, driving, rather hard reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2. While Leinsdorf's direction was taut and his conception consistent, it all sounded too heavy, too loud and too inflexible for early Beethoven.

189

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,200
FEB 20 1967
New England Newsclip

SUBURBAN EREE PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY
FEB 2 1967
New England Newsclip

BOSTON: JAPANESE STYLE—To commemorate the "sister city" relationship enjoyed since 1959 between Boston and Kyoto, Japan, and to add new impetus to the many cultural exchange programs between the two cities, the Boston-Yyoto City Committee has commissioned an original wood block print which is being unveiled at Winterfest. The print, created by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young Kyoto artist who is now teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City, is also being offered for sale during Winterfest. A limited edition of 50 prints has been made. The print features Boston's North End Mall, the statue of Paul Revere and the Old North Church.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
FEB 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Music To Shape A Winterfest By

By Peter M. Knapp

"As Quiet As" a stageful of musicians, might be another completion of Michael Colgrass' witty musical simile. The 35-year-old Chicago-born composer has fashioned a delightful suite of program music literally out of a children's exercise.

The work, premiered at last summer's Tanglewood season and composed on a Fromm Music Foundation commission, formed the centerpiece of the Boston Symphony's program on Tuesday under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. The provocative title and the composition's literal content come from a series of answers by fourth-grade children asked to complete the sentence, "Let's be as quiet as . . ." Some of the replies: "a leaf turning colors;" "children sleeping;" "the first star coming out."

Unpretentious

Colgrass' composition is dedicated to children, and is just as unpretentious as that — something of a novelty in today's ultra-serious musical workshops. "As Quiet As" is as refreshing as, well, "a soft rainfall" to use another of Colgrass' seven sections.

Colgrass employs modern sound-language. If there is a touch of "cuteness" in the score's literal musical translations of the happenings he describes (such as the nursery-rhyme tinkling in "Children Sleeping"), it is more intentional than gauche.

His leaf "turns color" through the simple but effective technique of a sustained brass note imperceptibly gathering instrumental "color" through the gradual addition of other instruments; the "soft rainfall" patters through violin finger pizzicato; the "first star" flickers, shimmers and builds to an intense glare through an ethereal crescendo; "an ant walking" amusingly skitters and lurches through chirping strings and glissandi. "Time Passing" presents fragments of Haydn, Ravel, Sibelius and jazz juxtaposed against an orchestral haze in a complex section requiring two conductors; Charles Wilson assisted Leinsdorf here.

For scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Leinsdorf selected portions from the original ballet score, ignoring the three suites Prokofiev prepared. This, too, is "program music" of a sort, though both objective and subjective; the chilling funeral music for Juliet, for example, is a sublime musical evocation of horror and tragedy.

Though much of Part I seemed bloodless, Leinsdorf warmed up in the "Dance of Love," and Part II was ardently, and at times excitingly, performed by the orchestra. Cellist Martin Hoherman, who began the evening at the first cello desk, showed his versatility in the Prokofiev suite by playing saxophone and mandolin.

The concert opened with a big-scaled, driving, rather hard reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2. While Leinsdorf's direction was taut and his conception consistent, it all sounded too heavy, too loud and too inflexible for early Beethoven.

Special works for festival—

Poet, composer, and artist commissioned by Winterfest

CITY RECORD
BOSTON, MASS.
OFF. BOSTON PUBLICATION
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,200
FEB 4 1967
New England Newsclip

Poet, Composer, Artist Aiding Winterfest

A poet, composer, and artist have been commissioned by Winterfest to create special works to be presented during the eight-day civic-cultural festival scheduled for Boston from February 19 to 26. Mayor John F. Collins heads the Winterfest Committee as honorary chairman with Eli Goldston, chairman, Boston Gas Company, as general chairman of the event.

They are Pulitzer Prize winner Richard G. Eberhart, Professor of English and poet-in-residence at Dartmouth College; composer Earl Robinson, who has written several film scores and the musical "Sandhog"; and George Lockwood, a lithographer who operates the Impressions Workshop, Inc., Boston.

Professor Eberhart was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry last year for his book "Richard Eberhart: Selected Poems 1930-1965." His Winterfest poem will be read opening day of Winterfest, Sunday, February 19, at the concert scheduled by the New England Conservatory Chorus at Jordan Hall at 8.30 P.M. Winner of several literary awards, Professor Eberhart is a reviewer for the New York Times Book Review. He was appointed by former President Eisenhower to the Advisory Committee on the Arts for the National Cultural Center in Washington in 1959 and served as consultant in poetry at the Library of Congress from 1959 to 1961.

(Continued on page 138)

Mr. Robinson has been commissioned to compose a concerto for five stringed banjo and orchestra. It will be premiered at the special Winterfest concert of the Boston Pops Orchestra, Monday, February 20, at Symphony Hall, at 8.30 P.M. The composition, the first concerto ever written for five stringed banjo and orchestra, will be performed by folk singer-banjoist Pete Seeger and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. A vocal solo is incorporated into the concerto score for Seeger.

Winterfest and the Boston Public Library have commissioned Mr. Lockwood to do a stone lithograph print, which will have a limited printing. The 100 copies made of this print — a semi-symbolic tree done in a delicate, sensitive technique typical of the artist — will be on sale during Winterfest. Mr. Lockwood's Impressions Workshop is the only independent graphics shop in the area, and one of the two in the country. Others are connected with universities and private foundations. He has taught at Smith College, Amherst, University of Florida, the Worcester Museum School, the Massachusetts College of Art, and most recently, the Rhode Island School of Design. In Boston, he has had one-man shows at the Kanegis and Tragos galleries.

Also to be unveiled at Winterfest is an original wood block print ship between Boston and Kyoto, Sister City Committee to commemorate the "sister city" relationship between Boston and Kyoto, Japan. The print will be created by Miss Naoko Matsubara, a young Kyoto artist, who is now teaching in the United States at Pratt Institute, New York City. The Sister City Committee has commissioned the print in collaboration with the Boston Public Library and in consultation with the department of Asiatic Art of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

Miss Matsubara, a Fulbright Scholar, who has been teaching "Hanga," wood block cutting, and printing at Pratt since 1965, will create a wood block print representative of the City of Boston. Fifty copies will be on sale at Winterfest.

Sinclair Hitchings, Curator of Prints at the Boston Public Library working with the Winterfest Committee on the commissioning of the Matsubara and Lockwood prints, said the purchase price of the prints will be $15.

"The Library is pleased to collaborate with Winterfest in the commissioning of these high caliber artists," said Mr. Hitchings. "We feel Winterfest is giving strong impetus to art by placing it within the range of many people, and not just a few," he added.

Mr. Hitchings also disclosed that 25 copies of an abstract color print, done by one of Japan's leading artists, Hodaka Yoshida of Tokyo, have been obtained and will also be offered for sale at Winterfest.

The eight-day cultural festival, fashioned after last year's successful Winterfest program which attracted a half-million people to the Auditorium, offers an exciting array of cultural, entertainment, and educational events, including amateur and professional performances in music, drama, and dance; 120,000 square feet of exhibits and "live" demonstrations, starting February 22 at the Auditorium; lectures, discussions, and seminars on timely topics; film festival; folkfest; special children's proprams; and many other special events.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

WINTERFEST CONCERT

presented by

Cultural Foundation of Boston

February 23, 1967

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER
Conductor

Monday Evening, February 20, 1967, at 8:30
WINTERFEST CONCERT
presented by
CULTURAL FOUNDATION OF BOSTON
SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
JAN 8 1967
New England Newsclip

under the marquee

By GEORGE McKINNON

WINTERFEST, '67, the cultural and fun cold-weather festival, again will jog Winter-weary Bostonians in an eight-day whirl of music, dance, theater, demonstrations and seminars.

The second Winterfest will run from Feb. 19 to 26, with the majority of events, exhibits and seminars in the War Memorial Auditorium and exhibition halls.

The performing arts will be represented by everything from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Orleans jazz, folk music, live theater and ballet.

A UNIQUE FEATURE of the second Winterfest will be the premiere of the "Winterfest Concerto for Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra."

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall in a special concert Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 during which the concerto will be introduced.

Pete Seeger, folk singer and banjoist, will be featured performer in the concerto commissioned by the Winterfest. Composer is Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog." It is the first concerto for five-string banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned and a vocal score is incorporated into the score.

WINTERFEST CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf conducting, will be the feature Thursday evening at Symphony Hall. The program will feature Haydn's Creation Mass, with soloists Beverly Sills, Beverly Wolff, Placido Domingo and Ara Berberian, and the Rutgers University Choir.

Joseph Silverstein will be soloist in the Brahms violin concerto.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
FEB 21 1967
New England Newsclip

FIEDLER AND HIS POPS IN A BANJO CONCERTO

By McLAREN HARRIS

Banjo concertos are not what one could call a common commodity. In fact, they are in a similar class to the Hoffnung Concerto for Two Vacuum Cleaners and Electric Floor Polisher—as rare as eyebrows on eggs.

So upon being informed that a creature of the former species was to have its advent at Monday night's Winterfest concert by the Boston Pops at Symphony Hall, we felt obliged to show up and sample the sound.

The sounds are by Earl Robinson, songwriter and composer of film scores. His concerto was performed by Eric Weissberg on the old and venerated five-string banjo, with the Pops conducted by Arthur Fiedler. In truth, the jaunty, four-movement work is more of an orchestral piece with banjo obbligato than a concerto. The solo instrument's dominance is mostly confined to cadenzas opening the second and fourth movements and an introductory statemet in the first; elsewhere the banjo mixes it up with the ensemble in echoes and other exchanges, ocasionally turning to a subservient role of accompanist to the orchestra's longer lines.

After the first notes the banjo starts out alone, joined progressively by woodwinds, strings and brass; the strolling pizzicati of the second movement, after a chain or echoes, lead into the "scherzo," a sort of square dance a la Count Basie. The work concludes with a ballad-like finale, in which the crescendos, diminuendos, string and brass colors betray the composer's movie-score background. There is a vocal line which croons about this beautiful earth; Pete Seeger, originally scheduled to play the banjo part, sang instead.

Well, Banjo concertos aren't likely to be the coming thing, for the tone of the instrument being what it is, either it gets covered up when matched by full orchestra or stands out like a gawky sunflower. But there it was, and Weissberg and Fiedler and Seeger and the Pops did it, and the audience appeared to enjoy it, and now we can enter it into the record books.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
FEB 21 1967
New England Newsclip

Interlude with Winterfest

To break the gloom of February comes Winterfest, now in progress for the second year. Boston's cultural festival this year has everything from seminars to opera for highbrow, lowbrow, young and old. Included are such offerings as the Boston Symphony performing Haydn's "Creation Mass" and the Eureka Brass Band from Preservation Hall in New Orleans blowing Dixieland from out of the South and out of the past. Last year, Winterfest drew over 500,000. This year should top that and we hope it lasts for years to come. Winterfest is a tribute to the Cultural Foundation, the city and the state and it breaks the bleak hibernation between Christmas and Easter.

SUBURBAN FREE PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY
FEB 16 1967
New England Newsclip

1 COLUMN CUTLINE
FOLK SINGER Pete Seeger will perform a specially commissioned "Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra" at the Winterfest Concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra on Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 pm at Symphony Hall. Winterfest Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

WINTERFEST CONCERT

presented by

Cultural Foundation of Boston

February 23, 1967

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER
Conductor

Monday Evening, February 20, 1967, at 8:30
WINTERFEST CONCERT
presented by
CULTURAL FOUNDATION OF BOSTON
SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600

JAN 8 1967 New England Newsclip

under the marquee

By GEORGE McKINNON

WINTERFEST, '67, the cultural and fun cold-weather festival, again will jog Winter-weary Bostonians in an eight-day whirl of music, dance, theater, demonstrations and seminars.

The second Winterfest will run from Feb. 19 to 26, with the majority of events, exhibits and seminars in the War Memorial Auditorium and exhibition halls.

The performing arts will be represented by everything from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New Orleans jazz, folk music, live theater and ballet.

A UNIQUE FEATURE of the second Winterfest will be the premiere of the "Winterfest Concerto for Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra."

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops Orchestra in Symphony Hall in a special concert Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 during which the concerto will be introduced.

Pete Seeger, folk singer and banjoist, will be featured performer in the concerto commissioned by the Winterfest. Composer is Earl Robinson, writer of several film scores and the musical "Sandhog." It is the first concerto for five-string banjo and orchestra ever to be commissioned and a vocal score is incorporated into the score.

WINTERFEST CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf conducting, will be the feature Thursday evening at Symphony Hall. The program will feature Haydn's Creation Mass, with soloists Beverly Sills, Beverly Wolff, Placido Domingo and Ara Berberian, and the Rutgers University Choir.

Joseph Silverstein will be soloist in the Brahms violin concerto.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

FEB 21 1967 New England Newsclip

FIEDLER AND HIS POPS IN A BANJO CONCERTO

By McLAREN HARRIS

Banjo concertos are not what one could call a common commodity. In fact, they are in a similar class to the Hoffnung Concerto for Two Vacuum Cleaners and Electric Floor Polisher —as rare as eyebrows on eggs.

So upon being informed that a creature of the former species was to have its advent at Monday night's Winterfest concert by the Boston Pops at Symphony Hall, we felt obliged to show up and sample the sound.

The sounds are by Earl Robinson, songwriter and composer of film scores. His concerto was performed by Eric Weissberg on the old and venerated five-string banjo, with the Pops conducted by Arthur Fiedler. In truth, the jaunty, four-movement work is more of an orchestral piece with banjo obbligato than a concerto. The solo instrument's dominance is mostly confined to cadenzas opening the second and fourth movements and an introductory statemet in the first; elsewhere the banjo mixes it up with the ensemble in echoes and other exchanges, ocasionally turning to a subservient role of accompanist to the orchestra's longer lines.

After the first notes the banjo starts out alone, joined progressively by woodwinds, strings and brass; the strolling pizzicati of the second movement, after a chain or echoes, lead into the "scherzo," a sort of square dance a la Count Basie. The work concludes with a ballad-like finale, in which the crescendos, diminuendos, string and brass colors betray the composer's movie-score background. There is a vocal line which croons about this beautiful earth; Pete Seeger, originally scheduled to play the banjo part, sang instead.

Well, Banjo concertos aren't likely to be the coming thing, for the tone of the instrument being what it is, eihter it gets covered up when matched by full orchestra or stands out like a gawky sunflower. But there it was, and Weissberg and Fiedler and Seeger and the Pops did it, and the audience appeared to enjoy it, and now we can enter it into the record books.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

FEB 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Interlude with Winterfest

To break the gloom of February comes Winterfest, now in progress for the second year. Boston's cultural festival this year has everything from seminars to opera for highbrow, lowbrow, young and old. Included are such offerings as the Boston Symphony performing Haydn's "Creation Mass" and the Eureka Brass Band from Preservation Hall in New Orleans blowing Dixieland from out of the South and out of the past. Last year, Winterfest drew over 500,000. This year should top that and we hope it lasts for years to come. Winterfest is a tribute to the Cultural Foundation, the city and the state and it breaks the bleak hibernation between Christmas and Easter.

SUBURBAN FREE PRESS
AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

FEB 16 1967 New England Newsclip

1 COLUMN CUTLINE
FOLK SINGER Pete Seeger will perform a specially commissioned "Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra" at the Winterfest Concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra on Monday, Feb. 20, at 8:30 pm at Symphony Hall. Winterfest Week in Boston is scheduled from Feb. 19-26.

191

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

FEB 27 1967

New England Newsclip

SMART SET

Compliments For Boston

By ROSE WALSH

Last Thursday from two different sources I heard well-deserved compliments about Boston. Mrs. Wilhelm von Keudell, slim, young, vivacious wife of the new German Consul who, with her husband, were honor guests at a tasting of fine German wines at the Statler-Hilton has only been in Boston since September. Shortly after their arrival here from Moscow, the consul was fortunate enough to find a home in Wellesley Hills.

THE SECOND Boston compliment came Thursday evening from Frank G. Wangeman, vice-president of the Hilton Hotel Corp. and of the Waldorf-Astoria who was the guest of "competition" Robert Brush of the Sheraton Corp. at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Winterfest Concert in Symphony Hall.

At the subsequent reception in the Art Gallery, Mr. Wangeman, talking with Harry Ellie Dickson, first violinist in the BSO, was enthusiastic about the evening. "Boston has a very warm feeling about music," he said. "In New York we have a fine Symphony Orchestra but the audience is not as responsive."

Just at that time the Eureka Marching Band from New Orleans blasting out "The Saints Come Marching In", climbed up the stairs to the reception (they were special guests). Proudly led by Grand Marshal Mathew (Fats) Houston his broad bosem adorned with a wide satin ribbon caught with a huge cluster of roses, and waving a fur-lined fan, the Eurekas were a sensation.

An amused Bostonian remarked, "Some of the old Friday afternoon Symphony Concert subscribers would turn over in their graves at this innovation." But the big brass band played on and high-stepped its way through the aisle formed by the black-tie, long-gowned guests.

In the gathering were dynamic Winterfest general chairman Eli Goldston and Mrs. Goldston; Mayor and Mrs. John Collins, Ralph Lowell, the Henry E. Foleys, the Dan Nyboes, Talcott M. Banks, G. I. Rohrbough, the Diggory Venns and Perry Rathbones (during the concert intermission he had gone to the Players' Room to catch the color TV presentation of "The Age of Rembrandt"); and others.

Incidentally, Harry Ellis Dickson, who is assistant conductor of Boston Pops and conductor of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, is writing a book. When I asked him what the title was going to be he said, "No one will understand it, but I am going to entitle it, "More Dolce." This was an expression frequently used by the great conductor Serge Koussevitsky when he was rehearsing the orchestra. Harry doesn't expect to have the book ready for a couple of years.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100

FEB 21 1967

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Pickin' with the Pops

By Dorothy Newell

The Boston Pops came out of hibernation a little too early for a Winterfest concert last night, a little sluggish and a little sour.

To liven a program of the same old songs, conductor Arthur Fiedler brought on a new work, the first-of-its-kind, concerto for five-string Banjo and orchestra. And he replaced tired old Pete Seeger, who said he "just wasn't up to it," with 27-year-old Eric Weissberg, whose forte is folk.

But the new piece by Earl Robinson failed to move in two of the four movements, even after Seeger's sales pitch for the banjo-playing art.

Soloist Weissberg's obvious talent was hampered by a cast on his fingering hand (broken wrist in a cycle accident), by the lesser role into which he was cast with the orchestra, and possibly by the ruffled dress shirt and tuxedo, which seemed a little out of character.

Only in the third movement, with its gay scherzo spirit and hints of both square dance and jazz, did the audience catch a glimpse of what might have been with a more worthy vehicle, and more than a morning's rehearsal with the orchestra.

The work closed on a sour note, which was also sad. Originally Seeger was to both play and sing the theme, "How Can I Keep From Singing?" which Robinson meant as a natural development from the preceding movement.

Now, Weissberg plays well, but he doesn't sing. So Seeger and Robinson sang the three verses of the old Quaker hymn to Weissberg's accompaniment, flubbing the key line, "Love is the hope of all the earth and the heavens," and losing the effect of the finale in unheard whispers. You can forgive Seeger, but Robinson? He should know the score.

The soloists all obviously needed more practice. One "fan" said the performance "set banjo back 10 years." But that isn't likely. Like the concert guitar, the banjo has promise. And maybe they can try a soloist's tall chair in the future.

The Pops had performed in its traditional style Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," March No. 1 in D; Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" by Rossini, "Largo," from "Xerxes" by Handel, and the vibrant Suite from "Gaiete Parisienne" by Offenbach.

Only the tambourines and cymbals seemed out of step and the violins a bit fuzzy at times.

But taking a cue from the banjo fiasco, the orchestra started to slip in earnest. The baritones bobbled badly in the rousing "Little Bit of Luck" segment of a "My Fair Lady" medley. The players kept relative time so far behind Fiedler one wonders if they could have performed the piece without him just as well.

A prominent piccolo squeek in the finale, Ravel's "Bolero," was followed by someone stumbling out the exit door, disgusted, and drums so loud they couldn't get louder — but did.

In spite of the weather, the audience was not warmed by the programmed performance.

The Pops seemed to sense this and thoroughly redeemed itself with no less than five encores, each more appreciated than the other:

The prelude to Act II of Lohengrin; Batman theme music with sound effects, feathers and a parachuting Bat Boy; "Mame;" "The Shadow of Your Smile," (tribute to a delighted audience), and finally, a magnificent performance of Souza's "Stars and Stripes Forever," in which the piccolos compensated for all previous errors. Foot-tapping and clapping rocked the whole row in the hall which was set up for symphony.

Then the orchestra padded away to wish Robinson and Seeger and Weissberg better luck next time, and to crawl back into the cave 'til spring.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

FEB 18 1967

New England Newsclip

SOMETHING FOR ALL

By Ed Madden

Going to Winterfest?

WERE YOU planning to buy a three-dollar ticket to any Winterfest event?

Forget it. There aren't any left.

The performance of the Boston Pops and the Boston Symphony Orchestras are sold out, too.

But let's concentrate on what you CAN see!

Lots.

You can choose from 67 performances, eight seminars and more than 80 exhibits. And it's not just for you. It's for your kids, too. They might enjoy it more than you. But you'll never know if you don't bring them.

Winterfest week runs from Sunday to Sunday, Feb. 19-26. Performances, exhibits, demonstrations, a film festival, seminars, lecturers and workshops are all part of it. Most events cost between 50 cents and $3. A few go as high as $5 and many are free.

Most of the events are taking place at the War Memorial Auditorium between the 22d and 26th. But watch the schedule carefully. All events of the first three days, plus others during the last five days, will be put on around the metropolitan area.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS, the Winterfest is a dream-come-true. Voice, instrument and electronic concerts, recitals and musicals are featured. The not-too-old but not-too-young set will go for the jazz, folk and country music on the program. Opera, ballet, stage plays . . . can there be more?

There is.

Here's one right out of the program: "Total theater concept involving audience participation. Presented by Caravan Theater of Cambridge. Audience is requested to take part; bring food or snack."

For those who'd like a capsulized Winterfest, the "Salute to Winterfest" next Monday, at the State Street Bank will present a sampling of Winterfest events. Ticket price for the Salute includes food and drink.

Air pollution, the Police and the New England Megalopolis are among the topics to be discussed in seminars.

BELIEVE IT or not, part of the Winterfest will take place in a coffee house. Poetry will be discussed at the Unicorn Coffee House on the afternoon of Washington's birthday. One of the sessions will be led by a well-known priest-poet.

And then there are the exhibits. Painting and sculpture, of course. Also weaving demonstrations, pottery making, mobile construction, jewelry, stained glass, furniture. Consuls of eight countries have arranged homeland exhibits.

But what happed to Fantasticks?

The Dramaturgy Guild of Boston was going to put on two performances. According to the Winterfest director, Frank Sidlauskas, verbal approval had been received from the producer of the original play, which will be playing shortly at the Shubert. Later he changed his mind, and denied permission. In its place, "Exodus in Easter" will be played.

Winterfest provides a once-a-year opportunty for Bostonians. If you feel you don't know much about music, theater, etc., what better time to start learning? And you won't be alone. Frank Sid says the majority of ticket buyers are people who don't usually attend this type of function.

And isn't that why we have the Winterfest?

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

FEB 21 1967

New England Newsclip

Banjo Goes Symphonic for Winterfest

By ROBERT GUSTAFSON

The red geraniums bloomed atop Symphony Hall for a few hours Monday evening as the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, made its contribution to Winterfest '67.

A large part of the evening was given over to Pops staples ranging from "Pomp and Circumstance" to Ravel's "Bolero." All were performed with Fiedlerian eclat.

But the highlight of the evening was the first performance of a work commissioned by Winterfest '67. "Concerto for Five-String Banjo and Orchestra" by Earl Robinson.

As Robinson, the composer of "Ballad for Americans" and "Lonsome Train," remarked, "This is the first time that the banjo has crossed over into the world of symphonic music."

It was a most successful journey. Pete Seeger, who was scheduled to perform as banjo soloist but unable to do so, introduced the composition together with a brief, illustrated, history of the banjo and also introduced the soloist Eric Weissberg.

The work began with a reflective dialogue between banjo and flutes which were soon joined by woodwinds and strings. It shortly moved into a spirited square dance form with jazz overtones which brought out some delightful blues banjo.

After a brisk three-finger picking statement by the banjo, the Concerto worked its way into its final movement with the singing of "How Can I Keep From Singing" by Messrs. Robinson and Seeger.

"Concerto for Five-String Banjo and Orchestra" is a piece of Americana with brashness, impudence, wit, tenderness, and charm, and is unabashedly romantic.

Mr. Wesissberg, aware of his pioneering role, was equal to his task, both in the area of technique and sensitivity. banjo-player, and Mr. Weiss-It is a difficult work for any berg obviously is one of great skill.

Mr. Robinson and Mr. Weiss Mr. Robinson and Mr. Weissberg made an otherwise pleasant evening an exciting one, and the capicity audience responded appreciatively and enthusiastically.

Together they capped a warm Spring night inside Symphony Hall which made the return to the cold, wet streets outside almost bearable.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

FEB 9 1967

New England Newsclip

entertainment and the arts

Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra at 8:30 p.m., Feb. 20 in Symphony Hall. Featured will be the "Winterfest Concerto for a Five-Stringed Banjo and Orchestra" with Pete Seeger, soloist.

Ballet Scheduled

Wednesday, Feb. 22, a program of ballet and modern dance is scheduled at 8:30 p.m. in the War Memorial Auditorium. Participating will be the New York City, Boston, and Cambridge Ballets, and modern dancers Alonzo Rivera of Mexico and The Great Bhaskar of India.

A special Winterfest concert will be given Feb. 23 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Eric Leinsdorf will conduct.

047

Winterfest to Open Sunday

SUBURBAN FREE PRESS AND RECORDER
NATICK, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

FEB 9 1967

New England Newsclip

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 16,200

047

FEB 14 1967

New England Newsclip

HERALD (e)
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,050

FEB 14 1967

New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100

FEB 14 1967

New England Newsclip

Hub Winterfest Expects 500,000

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston's eight-day feast of culture known as Winterfest opens Sunday.

The festival of entertainment and education sponsored for the second year by the Cultural Foundation of Boston is expected to attract in excess of a half-million persons.

The esthetic binge includes arty jazz and jazzy art laced with doses of ballet, symphony, comedy, folk singing, opera and drama.

The programs are designed for the high brow and low brow and youngsters and oldsters alike. Seventy percent of the scheduled performances are aimed at the young or young-at-heart.

For the small fry, there will be puppets, a dog-training show, musicals like the "Wizard of Oz" and plays such as "Pinocchio" and "Heidi."

Many of the performances will be in the War Memorial Auditorium. Others will be held at Symphony Hall, Jordan Hall or other nearby halls, all within walking or subway commuting distance of each other.

The festival will open with a concert by the 55-voice New England Conservatory Chorus which recently returned from a State Department - sponsored concert tour of Russia.

Attractions on following days include the Boston Pops Orchestra, a dance program entitled "A Salute to Jacob's Pillow," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comedian Bill Cosby, a folk concert and Gilbert and Sullivan's Trial by Jury."

The Boston Pops concert will include the premiere of a specially commissioned banjo concerto performed by folk instrumentalist Pete Seegar.

But lots more is packed between the main events. There will be the reading of a Winterfest - commissioned poem entitled "Boston," an electronic music concert, a piano recital, dog drills, the performance of a steel orchestra, a hill-billy band, New Orleans jazz, African dances, story hours, a karate exhibition and theater in virtually all its dimensions.

If symphony or jazz isn't your cup of tea, you can attend seminars or workshops on such topics as Air Pollution, Poetry, "Megalopolis in New England" or "A Healthy Life for the Middle Aged."

CHAMBER PLAYERS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
SEP 25 1966

Conservatory Chorus To Sing in Russia

By MARGO MILLER
Globe Critic

The New England Conservatory Chorus will spend five weeks touring the Soviet Union in November and December. The 51 singers are being sent under the auspices of the Cultural Exchange Program of the U.S. Department of State and the U.S.S.R.

For the century-old conservatory it will be both the longest tour undertaken and the initial visit to Russia by an American college of music.

For Boston it will be the second time a musical institution has been selected for cultural exchange. The Boston Symphony spent five days in Russia in September 1956, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players expect to tour there for five weeks in May 1967.

What is known these days at the conservatory as "the Russian chorus" has become a "unit apart from everyone else at the school," according to Lorna Cooke deVaron, choral director and tour conductor. She has nothing but praise for the group's enthusiasm. They came back to school two weeks early. Five hours a day went into chorus and section rehearsals. Russian lessons and "make-up work" for classes they will miss have consumed the other hours. Yet the singers found time to copy in and learn the German to a Brahms work whose edition had arrived and been rehearsed in English. "Ordinarily they wouldn't do this on their own," said Mrs. deVaron. "But they came to me and said the German would be more appropriate."

The German brings to ten the number of languages the conservatory chorus will sing in. The programs are conventionally arranged — groups of motets and madrigals, a somewhat longer work (Bach's motet "Singet dem Herrn," Schubert's Deutsche Messe in F), folk songs from America, Israel, Latin America and Russia. American music leapfrogs from one of Billing's fuguing tunes of 1794 to contemporary psalm settings by Virgil Thomson and Charles Ives and a number, very popular with Russian audiences, the "Alleluia" of Harvard's Randall Thompson.

Russia's own liturgical music, by the way, provided Leningrad with one of the most talked-about concerts of recent times. Unadvertised, unannounced as to content, but whispered about as something special, the choral program drew a capacity audience. But officially, of course, visiting Americans may not take part in this thaw concerning Russian sacred music. What the Russians did ask for, however, were American show tunes. They will get Gershwin ("Of Thee I Sing," "Porgy and Bess"), Loesser ("Guys and Dolls"), as well as theater music from Bernstein ("The Lark,"), Copland ("The Tender Land") and Britten "Peter Grimes"). Nor is the extracurricular department forgotten: the conservatory chorus includes two folk guitarists and two jazz pianists.

Programming has another consideration — practicality. Actually fifteen of the chorus are instrumentalists who are doubling as singers in a cappella work and elsewhere providing a tiny orchestra of three violins, viola, cello, two flutes, two horns, bassoon and harpsichord. Some reorchestration had to be done. Two movements of the Sessions Mass will use organ, where available, instruments, when not.

Exactly why the controversy was chosen for the Russian tour is not known. Mrs. deVaron speculates that the State Department has alternated visits by professional choruses, like the Robert Shaw Chorale, and student groups, like the Oberlin College Choir. The conservatory was host in 1960 to composers Shostakovitch and Kabalevsky at a school assembly. The usually shy Shostakovich surprised everyone by making from the stage a short speech in Russian, urging the students to keep up the good work and wishing them good fortune.

Mrs. deVaron recalls the speech as making her "dewy-eyed and sentimental." But she supposed the State Department bid came as the result of a 1962 concert at a music educators conference in Atlantic City, when Werner Lawson, of Howard University and a member of the State Department's selection committee, told her the conservatory ought to do more touring.

Touring Russia, while gratifying to an institution's prestige, is expensive and complicated. The itinerary for Nov. 7 - Dec. 11, is not yet known. The size and acoustic peculiarities of the halls may enhance or swallow a small chorus. Concerts five times a week take their toll more on vocalists than instrumentalists. Mrs. deVaron is also curious about which music will pall, which will continue to interest her performers, after such constant repetition.

The U.S.S.R. picks up the tab for board and transportation in Russia, and a one-way plane ticket. The United States pays the other plane fare, as well as concert costs and board in Spain, where the chorus performs Nov. 1-6. But the conservatory finds itself with about $14,000 of hidden expenses. These include the Russian lessons, opening the dormitory early in September, publicity, gifts (of music and souvenirs), a conductor who will substitute in the conservatory for Mrs. deVaron, and the double set of exams, one for the stay-at-homes, one for the Russian chorus who still have to face the Blue Books, tour or not.

Certain students on the tour will have to forego income here from church jobs and freelance work. The conservatory, therefore, is making an exception to its free ticket policy for the chorus' first concert of the season, Oct. 28, in Jordan Hall. In the nature of a gala benefit for these students, the concern will be a preview of some of the tour music. Deputies from the Soviet, American and Spanish governments will attend and there will be appropriate speeches.

In the meantime, the Russian chorus (on lend also to the Boston Symphony for performances this week of the Mahler Third Symphony) is studying suitcase logistics. The helpful State Department is issuing everybody a navy blue blazer and suggesting a warm, practical and simple wardrobe for off-stage wear. Concert garb will be tuxedos or black gowns, relieved at the neckline by a colored, velour cowl. Mrs. deVaron was told that academic gowns, which many traveling choruses find the solution, would not be suitable for "young professionals."

The El Paso Times
D. 58,290 SUN. 82,650
OCT 9 1966

records

The connoisseur of the serious music, that which was composed and is played with crystalline balance, exquisite touch and total perfection, music per se, has a friend in the recent release by RCA Victor of The Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing music of Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Fine, Carter and Piston. It is beautifully packaged with notes by Peter Ustinov. The musicians, each a principal in the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Erich Leinsdorf, plus pianist Claude Frank, are virtuosos and here they provide a most intimate portrait of chamber music breaching the centuries. A flying flute sounds in Mozart's "Quartet in D for Flute and Strings," the oboe stars in the "Quartet in F of Oboe and Strings," the piano is most prominent in Brahms' "Quartet in C Minor for Piano and Strings" and Beethoven's beauty is once again revealed in his "Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola." Then it jumps many years to composers of this century, these selections being more brief but equally interesting as to composition style and performance, their being primarily more modern, less vibrant, more dramatic. They include Fine's "Fantasia for String Trio," "Copland's "Vitebsk, Study on A Jewish Theme," Carter's "Woodwind Quintet" and Piston's "Divertimento for Nine Instruments". It is RCA Victor's traditionally excellent recording quality, three disks plus a discussion record.

Continuing with the virtuoso, Columbia has recorded Isaac Stern, violinist, with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra in Dvorak's Concerto in A Minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 53, and the briefer Romance, Op. 11. These works are representative of a lesser known side of this composer's genius, played here by one of the greatest violinists of today and an orchestra that is always inspired by the forceful Ormandy. Lacking the gaiety of much of Dvorak, this recording reveals a deeper feeling, sometimes sombre, with unusual passages in which the violinist glories. It is excellent.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
NEW YORK PARK EAST
Thursday, September 1, 1966

Chamber Players To Present Concerts

A series of six concerts will be presented by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday afternoons at 4 p.m. at the 500-seat main gallery of the Parke-Bernet Galleries, 980 Madison Avenue, beginning on October 16.

The opening concert, featuring Claude Frank, pianist, will include works by Mozart, Piston, Heiden and Beethoven. Other concerts will be on November 20, January 22, February 12, March 5 and April 16.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, September 18, 1966

Chamber

MUSIC BY MOZART, BEETHOVEN, BRAHMS, COPLAND, FINE, CARTER and PISTON—Three LPs boxed with notes by PETER USTINOV)—RCA VICTOR LSC/LM-6167.

If, as some say, there is a resurgence of interest in chamber music, such an enterprise as this by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be credited with an assist.

Most real music lovers always have regarded chamber music as a little world by itself, a fact skirted by Peter Ustinov in his interesting program notes to the three LPs in which he points out that "chamber music possesses the most lasting of sound's satisfactions" and "once he has discovered it, the real music lover never tires of it."

The program is varied, ranging from the classical era to the 20th Century. It starts with Mozart's Quartet in D for Flute and Strings (K. 285) and the Quartet in F for Oboe and Strings (K. 370). Brahms is represented by the Quartet in C Minor for Piano and Strings (Op. 60) and Beethoven by the Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola (Op. 25).

LATER WORKS—Moving into this century, the Boston instrumentalists occupy themselves with the late Irving Fine's "Fantasia for String Trio," "Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk—Study of a Jewish Theme," for violin, cello and piano, Elliott Carter's "Woodwind Quintet" for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, and Walter Piston's "Divertimento for Nine Instruments" (two violins, flute, obie, clarinet, bassoon, viola, cello and bass).

The virtuoso musicians involved include Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn, and Claude Frank, piano.

As a bonus, the box contains a 10-inch LP featuring excerpts from some of the compositions and discussion concerning them by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Silverstein, the concertmaster, and Ustinov.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206
OCT 23 1966

Records feature ensembles

The race is to chamber music. The Schwann catalog, that Bible of record collectors, noted it wasn't Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 that was recorded most last year, but Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 Sated with limousine-sized ensembles, audiences are switching to music of compact-car dimension.

To the performers, chamber music is the final dimension. It frees the individual but makes him more responsive to his fellow players.

SENSE OF NOVELTY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recognized the trend and the feeling of the players when it organized two years ago its own Chamber Players from among the first desks. The group has played two seasons, surveying a variety of music, some of which is heard in a three-record album, "The Boston Symphony Chamber Players," (RCA Victor LSC 6167).

Given the variety of players available, their repertory is nearly limitless and one of the pleasures of this album is its sense of novelty. The Beethoven Serenade in D is for flute, viola and violin, a combination as rare as the rollicking mood of the composer. Doriot Anthony Dwyers leads the fun with violinist Joseph Silverstein and violist Burton Fine offering well matched support.

Mrs. Dwyer's playing is a source of life in each work she joins, in this case, four of the eight in the set.

The wind players offer exuberant readings in the Elliot Carter Quintet, Piston's Divertimento and the Mozart quartets with flute and oboe. Ralph Gomberg is the oboist in the Mozart Quartet, K. 370. The reading here is rather small and subdued, however tidily organized.

The major work of the album is the Brahms Piano Quartet in C minor with Silverstein, Fine, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Claude Frank. The performance is richly colored and Frank's participation provides a bold leadership or base, depending on the moment.

The album includes Irving Fine's personal and passionate Fantasia for string trio and Copland's "Vitebsk." In all the recorded sound is near and almost overbright.

New York Post
D. 324,256 SUN. 243,637
SEP 26 1966

Boston Symphony Ensemble Opens Concert Series Oct. 16

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will open a subscription series of six concerts Oct. 16 at 4 p.m., at the Parke-Bernet Galleries, 980 Madison Av. The program will include chamber music works for strings and woodwinds by Mozart, Walter Piston, Bernard Heiden and Beethoven. The group is headed by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407
SEPT 9 1966

Symphony to Preview Series

Music director Howard Mitchell will outline the Washington National Symphony's 1966-67 concert series for the press and Symphony ticket holders on Sept. 21 in the National Press Club at 8:30 p.m.

A formal rededication of renovated Constitution Hall opens the new season. Van Cliburn will be the soloist featured in the first pair of concerts, conducted by Mr. Mitchell, on Oct. 11 and 12.

Other highlights of the season include the Boston Symphony, the Beethoven Piano Concerto Festival, Copland's Music Festival, violinist Isaac Stern and Russian cellist Rostropovich.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
NEW YORK POST
Saturday, September 17, 1966

Boston Chamber Players To Give Benefit Concerts

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give six concerts in a subscription series in Parke-Bernet's Main Gallery Sunday afternoons at 4 p.m. The series will benefit Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

The first concert, scheduled for Oct. 16, will feature works by Mozart, Beethoven, Walter Piston and Bernard Heiden. The other performances will take place Nov. 20, Jan. 22, Feb. 12, March 5 and April 16.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 1,337,277
SEP 18 1966

PARKE-BERNET LISTS A NEW MUSIC SERIES

The Parke-Bernet Galleries, which experimented last season with presenting musical events on its premises, will sponsor this year a six-concert subscription series by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The ensemble of first-desk players from the Boston orchestra will play in the 500-seat Main Gallery at 980 Madison Avenue near 76th Street on Sunday afternoons at 4.

At the opening program Oct. 16 and at the closing one April 16, the full group will perform. In between, the size of the ensemble will vary with the needs of the music to be played. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra, heads the players, and Claude Frank, pianist, will take part in several programs.

The other concert dates are Nov. 20, Jan. 22, Feb. 12 and March 5. Subscriptions are $30 for the series, with proceeds going to the Lincoln Center Fund for Education and Creative Artistic Advancement.

After the series, the ensemble will tour the Soviet Union for six weeks under the auspices of the State Department's Office of Cultural Presentations.

193

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Dennis
Yarmouth Register
YARMOUTHPORT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,078
OCT 21 1966

Van Cliburn, B.S.O. etc.?

Propose concerts at D-Y as summer experiment

The group determined to promote classical music in the central Cape area proposed a celebrity series of concerts next summer at the Dennis-Yarmouth Regional High School. Response of the School Committee was favorable, but the members hardly jumped at the idea.

John K. Davenport and Ronald Perera made the presentation. They said they were prepared to make commitments for the following artists to appear next summer.

Pianist Van Cliburn, Violinist Isaac Stern, Pianist Eugene Istonen, Cellist Leonard Rose, The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, possibly Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops Orchestra.

The request was for use of the school grounds for five concerts. Mr. Davenport asked the committee for an expression of intent so he could make the commitments. The School Committee took the matter under advisement and asked Mr. Davenport to present detailed plans.

Superintendent Alfred R. Kenyon pointed out the school grounds were not enclosed, and urged Mr. Davenport to explore the Barnstable High School where the athletic fields are enclosed.

Mr. Davenport accepted the suggestion, but said his heart was really in the Yarmouth or Dennis area.

To date the committee behind the music enterprise has had no luck in securing a site. They attempted to locate near the Cape Playhouse in Dennis under the aegis of the Raymond Moore Foundation which owns the property, but this was turned down by the Board of Appeals due to traffic congestion and the expression of many residents of the village that they did not want concerts there.

The latest proposal is to erect a temporary, portable, concert stage which could seat under partial cover an audience of about 1,000. Beyond this there would be lawn area where concert-goers could sit on blankets and beyond this an area where visitors could listen in their automobiles.

The proposal is to sell advance subscriptions which, together with the guarantee of private sponsors, would cover the essential costs. In event of foul weather scheduled concerts could be moved into the gymnasium which subscribers could be accommodated. Good weather would mean the audience could swell beyond the numbers of subscribers.

The proposal fixes on the baseball field.

The present group spearheaded by Mr. Davenport and Mr. Perera is yet uncorporated and is not part of the Raymond Moore Foundation, Mr. Davenport said.

Mr. Perera said the celebrity series was regarded as an experiment to determine if a permanent center for graphic and performing arts is warranted.

The committee tackled regular business as follows:

Voted to give use of the gym Dec. 27 or Dec. 28 to the Dennis-Yarmouth-Jaycees for a fee of $200 plus costs of janitors and police to present the Fabulous Magicians, a professional basketball show.

Voted to purchase four electric typewriters, a calculator and other commercial course equipment in accordance with recommendations of the administration and Commercial Course Departments.

Voted to spend $2,547 from contingency to buy a mixer and bakery over for the cafeteria, a matter which has been under consideration for years.

Expressed intention of studying with caution future purchase or lease of data processing equipment.

Voted to accept $520.20 reimbursement, "handout" in the words of Chairman Nathaniel Wixon, for purchase of Guidance Dept. equipment.

Learned of lack of interest in adult education program. Only two registered for free medical self-help class, two for stenography and two for machine tools. Twelve registered for typing and this course will be given.

Reviewed duties of police officers and football and basketball games, decided a third man should be available to patrol the parking lot during basketball games.

Answered questions of Milton Cole, sitting in as representative of the Yarmouth Finance Committee.

Went into executive session to discuss the cafeteria.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,293
OCT 5 1966

[redacted] Newton is chairman of the Silver Anniversary tribute to more than 500 ladies who have been annual contributors to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years or more. [redacted] The concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be held in the Museum's Tapestry Room. During the reception to follow, tea will be served in the Dutch Room and sparkling wine in the Raphael Room. Tea tables will be decorated with red and gold chrysanthemums reminiscent of the Golden Trumpet Ball at Symphony Hall last year.

It's almost 64 years since Mrs. Jack Gardner opened Fenway Court to her many friends and 50 members of the Boston Symphony played for the guests.

Mrs. Rosenfeld gave a delightful luncheon at her home in Chesnut Hill for members of the Council of Friends who addressed the invitations. Those present included Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich of Marblehead, Mrs. William McCormick of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, Mrs. Hans Estin of Manchester, Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman of Cambridge, Mrs. George E. Bates of Beacon St. and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, co-chairman with Mrs. Cabot of the Council.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
OCT 23 1966

Chamber Players Perform Nov. 2

The program has been announced for the first of five concerts which the Boston Symphony String Quartet and Chamber Players will give in Jordan Hall under sponsorship of the orchestra and the New England Conservatory. The Chamber Players will perform Wednesday, Nov. 2, at 8:30.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Quintet for Woodwinds and Piano, Op. 16, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn, and Claude Frank at the piano. The program will continue with Hindemith's Quintet for Woodwinds, performed by Mrs. Dwyer, Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt and Stagliano. The final number will be the Quartet for Piano and Strings, Op. 47 by Schumann, with Frank Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello.

Subsequent programs in the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series will be given Jan. 4 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet, which is the quartet-in-residence of the New England Conservatory; Feb. 8 by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players; March 8 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet and March 29 by the Chamber Players with Frank as guest pianist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
OCT 9 1966

B.S.O. Chamber Music

Five Wednesday evening concerts—"The Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series"—will be presented by the orchestra and the New England Conservatory in the conservatory's Jordan Hall.

Two of the five concerts will be done by the Boston Symphony String Quartet. The ensemble, quartet-in-residence at the conservatory, is made up of Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello.

Three concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, all of whom are principals in the orchestra: Messrs. Silverstein, Fine and Eskin; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn. Claude Frank will join the Chamber Players in two programs as guest pianist.

The Chamber Music Series will begin Wednesday, Nov. 2, with a program by the Chamber Players, Frank at the piano. The remaining dates are: Jan. 4, String Quartet; Feb. 8, Chamber Players; Mar. 8, String Quartet; and Mar. 29, Chamber Players with Frank. The program for the Nov. 2 concert will be announced.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 66,826 SUN. 200,259
OCT 30 1966

Boston Chamber Group Presented

By RUTH TRIPP

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players are now on records and the RCA release LN-6167 has all nine of them, in different combinations, playing the kind of music which, supposedly, brings the greatest joy to the hearts of symphonists. An interesting booklet accompanies the three records and in it is a foreword by Peter Ustinov.

His comment about chamber music is interesting. He says, "If opera corresponds to the novel, and if the song is the counterpart of the poem, chamber music is the diary, the confession, or perhaps, in its less personal form, the short story."

We have as members of the group, Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn. Claude Frank is guest pianist when the score calls for piano and when an added violin is needed, Alfred Krips is elected. The nine players on the cover photograph are all first desk members of the parent orchestra.

The program includes two Mozart numbers, the Quartet in D for Flute and Strings, K. 285 and the Quartet in F for Oboe and Strings, K. 370, the Brahms Quartet in C minor for Piano and Strings, Op. 60; Beethoven's Serenade for Flute, Violin and Viola; Irving Fine's Fantasia for String Trio (1957); Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk"—Study on a Jewish Theme (1929); Elliott Carter's Woodwind Quintet (1948) and Walter Piston's Divertimento for Nine Instruments. The playing is superb and here is chamber music with excellence plus the added joy which is apparent in the making of this rare music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY of the earlier days is represented beautifully in an RCA Victor "Treasury of Immortal Performances." The album VCM-6174 is full of memories. The music is played under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky and represents recordings done at Symphony Hall in Boston with one exception, a Carnegie Hall performance.

This booklet's pictures are rare. Some are photographs reproduced and others are Burnham line drawings. The composite picture of the whole orchestra is wonderful. Burgin, Bedetti, Alfred Zighera and dozens of other musicians, some retired and some no longer here, are on the stage of Symphony Hall as we always used to see them. Of course the Brahms, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Hanson, Foote and Shostakovich works are wonderful but the surprise of the picture and the recollections it stirred up make this a real find. It makes you glad you were growing up within reach of Boston.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
OCT 9 1966

New Chamber Music Series Is Planned

The New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra will join this season in presenting a series of five Wednesday evening programs in Jordan Hall, entitled the "Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series."

Two of the five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony String Quartet, which is the quartet-in-residence at the Conservatory, with Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello.

Three concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, all of whom are principal players in the orchestra: Messrs. Silverstein, Fine and Eskin; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, horn. Claude Frank will join the Chamber Players in two programs as guest pianist.

THE BOSTON Symphony Chamber Music Series will begin Wednesday, Nov. 2 with a program by the Chamber Players, Mr. Frank at the piano. The remaining dates are as follows: Jan. 4, Boston Symphony String Quartet; Feb. 8, Boston Symphony Chamber Players; March 8, Boston Symphony String Quartet; and March 29, Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Claude Frank, pianist. The program for the Nov. 2 concert will be announced shortly.

Subscription tickets for the series will be available at the Jordan Hall Box Office at $18, $15, $12 and $9. Mail orders are now being accepted.

The symphony itself is out of town this week, presenting four concerts in the New York area. These programs mark the beginning of the orchestra's 80th consecutive season of concerts in New York.

The next Symphony Hall concert will be Tuesday evening, Oct. 18, the [illegible] program of the "[illegible]

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
MILWAUKEE, WISC.
D. 364,362 SUN. 551,968
OCT 9 1966

Classical Records

Boston Ensemble First Rate

By GERALD KLOSS
Of The Journal Staff

THE Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of first chair men in the orchestra, offer eight works by composers ranging from Mozart and Beethoven to Aaron Copland and Elliott Carter in a splendid three record Victor album (LM-6167). Also included is a 10 inch long play record in which the music is discussed by conductor Erich Leinsdorf, violinist Joseph Silverstein of the ensemble and that ubiquitous jack of all arts, Peter Ustinov, with illustrative excerpts from each of the pieces.

Mozart is represented by his quartet in D for flute and strings (K. 285) and the quartet in F for oboe and strings (K 370) — both models of classical grace and clarity. Pianist Claude Frank is the guest artist in Brahms' quartet in C minor for piano and strings. Beethoven's entry is the serenade in D for flute, violin and viola.

This is music, of course, that speaks for itself, and the commentary, while interesting, is rather superfluous. The 20th century works are something else again, and here the recorded discussion aids the average listener's appreciation. The selections are Irving Fine's fantasia for strings, composed in 1957; Copland's "Vitebsk," a 1929 study on a Jewish theme, for violin, cello and piano; Carter's 1948 woodwind quintet and Walter Piston's 1946 divertimento for nine instruments.

These are not especially knotty works, but they are not ones to set the listener whistling the themes, either. They have the carefully worked out scheme and regard for technical nuance that characterizes much of contemporary music, and the Bostonians are as adept in tracing the tricky, arid lines as they are bringing out the swell and flow of melody in the Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms compositions. The ensemble is only two years old, but in terms of balance and blend, it sounds like a veteran group. Sound is excellent.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 146,403 SAT. 134,613
OCT 8 1966

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

Concert

An unusual touch is given a new album by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with the inclusion of a 10-inch bonus record containing a commentary by Peter Ustinov, a chamber music buff who is much better known nationally as a comedian. Ustinov exchanges views with Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Orchestra, and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra and head of the chamber players. The album proper consists of three 12-inch records, boxed and accompanied by extensive notes. The eight pieces performed includes quartets and other chamber music by Mozart, Brahms, Beethoven, Copland and Piston, among others. RCA Victor, LM-LSC 6167

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 635,619
OCT 17 1966

Boston Players Concert

The auction room at the Parke-Bernet Galleries is small, intimate, informal as concert halls go, and the performers are practically in the audience's laps.

It follows then, that yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players was just what that sort of event ought to be. The playing was warm and polished, and the players, seen very close up with all their facial expressions, gave the feeling of sharing the afternoon with their listeners.

The program they shared was no great shakes, but that didn't matter. Reicha's Woodwind Quintet in E flat (Op. 88, No. 2), Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956), Wilson Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings and Beethoven's Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola (Op. 25) were given in so charming and ingratiating a manner, and in such trim order that every moment was exceedingly pleasant.

The Reicha, basically a silly little piece, became delightfully quaint. During the Piston, one was absorbed by the quick reactions of the performers to each other. In the Coker, one was overwhelmed by each player's individual virtuosity. The Beethoven, which is usually just pretty funny in a lightly exaggerated way, became pretty, too.

The Bostonians will give five more concerts at Parke-Bernet, their only local appearances this season.

Members of the group heard yesterday were Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist; James Stagliano, French horn player; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Burton Fine, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

Mahler's Third Played By Boston Symphony

There was a treat for Mahler fans on Saturday night when the Boston Sympathy Orchestra opened its 1966-67 series of Carnegie Hall concerts with Mahler's Symphony No. 3 in D minor. There was no time for anything else, of course, for this six-movement essay in musical rhetoric lasts almost two hours including time for an intermission between the first and second movements.

It is curious that a work so long-winded and repetitious and so cluttered with banalities should continue to fascinate conductors and listeners, but it does. Perhaps, it is because just about the time you think you can't stand anymore of it, something happens that is arresting. That something usually has a noble sound that arouses thoughts of magnanimity, redemption and other such things.

The performance conducted by Erich Leinsdorf seemed to do about as much as any could to make the event seem worth the effort. Mahler's superb orchestration projected clearly, and healthy tempos kept the music from bogging down in its own excesses.

Shirley Verrett sang the solo of the fourth movement beautifully. She was joined in the fifth movement by the Boston Boychoir (John Oliver, director) and the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus (Lorna Cooke deVaron, director). Both groups made admirable contributions.

ALLEN HUGHES.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
OCT 30 1966

WEDNESDAY

Concerts

BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players—Jordan Hall, 30 Gainsboro st., Boston; presented by New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra; 8:30 p.m.; tickets at box office.

LYNN BLAIR, soprano—Newton Junior College, College Hall, Washington pk., Newtonville, 8:15 p.m.; free.

NEW ENGLAND Jewish Music Forum—Congregation Kehillath Israel; program, "Songs of Many Lands," Brookline; soloist, Martha Schlamme; 8:30 p.m.; non-members

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 115,966
OCT 23 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,836
NOV 23 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221
NOV 25 1966

Bostonians To Begin Chamber Music Series

The Rhode Island Chamber Music Concerts will present the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. at the Rhode Island School of Design auditorium. Members of the ensemble, all first desk players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Claude Frank, piano.

They will play the Beethoven Quintet in E flat major for Piano and Woodwinds; Hindemith's Quintet for Woodwinds, Op. 24, No. 2, and the Brahms Trio in E flat for Piano, Violin and Horn. Tickets may be purchased by writing to Brown University, Box 1903, Providence 02912, or at Avery Piano Company. Remaining tickets will be sold at the RISD auditorium box office after 6:30 p.m on the night of the performance Nov. 30.

Boston Chamber Players To Feature Claude Frank

The New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the details of the first program in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series, which will take place at Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, Nov. 2.

It will be the first in a new series of five concerts sponsored jointly by the Orchestra and the Conservatory, in which the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston String Quartet will be heard.

Principal Players

The Nov. 2 program will be given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players who are all principal players in the Orchestra, and Claude Frank, guest pianist.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Quintet for Woodwinds and Piano, Op. 16, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; and Claude Frank at the piano.

The program will continue with Hindemith's Quintet for Woodwinds, performed by Mrs. Dwyer, and Messrs. Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt and Stagliano.

The final number will be the Quartet for Piano and Strings, Op. 47 by Schumann, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; and Mr. Frank at the piano.

Other Programs

Subsequent programs in the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series will be given January 4 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet, which is the quartet-in-resident of the New England Conservatory; Feb. 8 by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players; March 8 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet; and March 29 by the Chamber Players with Claude Frank as guest pianist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789
NOV 3 1966

BSO Chamber Players Open Their 3d Season

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Their third season was begun by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall last night when these nine gifted musicians were presented in a thoroughly enjoyable concert by the New England Conservatory of Music. Three delightful facets of music were offered—classical, contemporary and late romantic.

Beethoven's quintet for piano and winds (Op. 16, in E flat), an early work, probably composed about 1796-97, bears striking resemblance in format and instrumentation to Mozart's more celebrated quin-tet in the same key (KV-452), showing how much Beethoven was influenced by the older composer at this early stage of his career. An inferior work to its congener, it treads carefully, though with pulsating ambition, the rigid paths of classical format.

Paul Hindemith

However, this is not to say that Beethoven contrives his effects in a Mozartean manner. It requires playing with verve, relying less, except in the slow movement, on smooth turning of phrases. In last night's performance, the virtuosity of the wind players—Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn, matched Claude Frank's exceptional flair for the piano part.

Nowhere in his finer musical output has the prolific Paul Hindemith exhibited a pawkier sense of humor than in his Kleine Kammermusic (Op. 24, No. 2) for wind quintet, composed in 1922. A divertimento in spirit, it is by no means easy going even for so talented an ensemble as the BSO first-chair players, the quartet mentioned in the preceding paragraph plus Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flautiste.

There are effects which cause many difficulties in performance. An example is the waltz, no "Wine, Women and Song", that, wherein Mrs. Dwyer trilled on the piccolo, a notoriously shrill instrument, intoning with all the measured elegance of John Lemonne in "Wind Amongst the Trees' for solo flute.

After the interval, stringed instruments had their glorious turn, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, teamed with Pianist Frank in Gabriel Faure's delightfully impressive piano quartet (Op. 15, in C minor). Almost all Faure music is elegant—as elegant as the portrait John Singer Sargent painted of this somewhat neglected minor master.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
NOV 3 1966

Boston Symphony players

By Clifford Barnes

The music played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, on Wednesday night at Jordan Hall, appealed in turn to the ear, the mind, the heart. Not that Beethoven, Hindemith, and Faure don't contain elements of all three in their work. The compositions on this program simply fell into these categories.

Since chamber music for wind ensembles was popular when Beethoven arrived in Vienna, he wrote to fill the market. Such a work is the Quintet in E-flat major for piano, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, Op. 16. It was designed to give immediate aural pleasure, and so it did as played by Claude Frank, Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Sherman Walt, and James Stagliano.

The piano has the most important role in this work, though there were effective horn and bassoon solos in the Andante cantabile, Mr. Frank led the way in some fine dynamic shading.

The themes of the opening Allegro were carefully interwoven. Each instrumentalist brought out his solo line, then merged into the ensemble. It was a pleasure to hear wind players with such good intonation. Mr. Stagliano played some tricky French horn passages with obvious ease.

Youthful works

Beethoven was 26 when he wrote this quintet. Hindemith was one year older when he completed his Quintet for wind instruments, Op. 24, No. 2. He, too, was interested in composing music for musicians who needed new repertoire.

The actual title of the work, "Kleine Kammermusik," gives a hint of the composer's intention. These are five little vignettes in alternating moods. While the aural pleasure cannot be denied (the harmonic content is no real barrier), the playful delight derives from an appeal to the mind.

There is no piano in this work. Doriot Anthony Dwyer was the fifth member of the ensemble, playing the flute in all but one movement. Hindemith scored his little waltz for piccolo.

The third section, "Placid and simple," was enhanced by solo passages on the oboe and bassoon. The next movement, "Rapid," was an intense conversation with each instrument insisting on a point. A "Very lively" finale left everyone in total agreement.

Musical sophistication

The Fauré Piano Quartet in C minor, Op. 15, is a more sophisticated work than the other two, perhaps because the composer was older when he wrote it. The romantic sweep of each movement definitely appeals to the emotions.

Mr. Frank, at the piano, was joined by Joseph Silverstein, violinist, Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Eskin cellist. Here each musician made an equal contribution to the musicmaking. The soulful lament of the strings against the chiming of the piano was particularly impressive.

Fauré's music has sentiment, but it would be difficult to find sentimentality. A sense of reticence prevents that. In this work there is a kind of sternness, for that's what the key of C minor meant to Fauré. He was sensitive to moods of different tonalities.

Yet the second movement Scherzo bubbled along, and the joy of the ensemble playing together spread over the audience.

TOWN AND COUNTRY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 91,700
NOV 1966

The musical season has been resumed at Parke-Bernet with recitals by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday afternoons at 4. The next is set for November 20. As usual, there will be important exhibitions of works of art from forthcoming sales. Proceeds go to Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
NOV 3 1966

Symphony Group Does Well by Faure

By McLAREN HARRIS
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players put the emphasis upon music for winds to open their third season Wednesday night at Jordan Hall—Beethoven's Quintet for piano and winds, Op. 16, and Hindemith's Wind Quintet, Op. 24, No. 2—then reverted to the more familiar idiom of the piano quartet, for a conclusion.

The choice of works made the evening enlightening, in its own way: we observed Beethoven in Mozartian costume, Hindemath at work with his non-Baroque counterpoint and Faure proving himself one of the most underrated composers in French musical history.

Classic Technique

The Beethoven E flat Quintet is a crystal line model of classic technique: triad-based themes, sectioned forms with textural contrast and motivic development. Melodic leads find their way occasionally into bassoon and horn parts, more often into clarinet and obe, but mostly rest with the piano; the last movement is virtually a miniatiree concerto. Ralph Gomberg (oboe) Gino Cioffi (Clarinet), Sherman Walt (bassoon), James Stagliano (horn) and Claude Frank (piano) treated their material with mutual respect in an unassuming dialogue

Mr. Frank distinguished himself with his sturdy, controlled pianism and a well-conceived ensemble role. He is referred to as "guest pianist" at these recitals, though he seems a semi-permanent, and welcome, fixture with the Chamber Players.

Always Adventure

The five-movement Hindemith Quintet is artfully wrought in its tonal combinations and is masterful in instrumental exploitation as the finest works of the genre—if lacking a genius' marks of thematic invention and dramatic imagination. His forms verge on the classic but his counterpoint is mostly non-imitative, more akin to 19th Century practices of countermelody. But Hindemith is always an adventurer; the quintet is playful, energetic and quiescent. The players—Doriot Anthony Dyer, flute, joined Messrs. Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt and Stagliano—are very good at this sort of thing; both they and the audience found pleasures in pure technical proficiency and exploration.

That Faure, he could write. His C minor Piano Quartet has at once a rhapsodic sweep and a symphonic bearing in its setting of strings now with, now against the keyboard. The four movements differ in expression but are alike in sublimity, lyric felicity, instrumental polish. Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, joined Mr. Frank, and not notwithstanding the space accorded it here, this must be accounted the evening's highlight, with full-toned eloquence, deft exchanges and dynamic sincerity.

The Program:

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, consisting of Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; and guest pianist, Claude Frank, presented the 3rd season's first concert Wednesday night at Jordan Hall.

Quintet in E flat for piano winds, Op. 16 — Beethoven
Quintet for Winds, Op. 24, No. 2 — Hindemith
Piano Quartet in C minor, Op. 15 — Faure

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald
CRANSTON, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 5,498
NOV 23 1966

Boston Symphony Chamber Players At RISD Nov. 30

The Rhode Island Chamber Music Concerts will present the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the Rhode Island School of Design Auditorium on Wednesday, November 30, at 8:30 p.m.

Tickets may be purchased by applying to Brown University, Box 1903, Providence, R. I. 02912, or Avery Piano Company, Weybosset Street, Providence. Any remaining tickets will be sold at the box office after 6:30 p.m. on the evening of the performance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 635,619
OCT 17 1966

Boston Players Concert

The auction room at the Parke-Bernet Galleries is small, intimate, informal as concert halls go, and the performers are practically in the audience's laps.

It follows then, that yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players was just what that sort of event ought to be. The playing was warm and polished, and the players, seen very close up with all their facial expressions, gave the feeling of sharing the afternoon with their listeners.

The program they shared was no great shakes, but that didn't matter. Reicha's Woodwind Quintet in E flat (Op. 88, No. 2), Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956), Wilson Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings and Beethoven's Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola (Op. 25) were given in so charming and ingratiating a manner, and in such trim order that every moment was exceedingly pleasant.

The Reicha, basically a silly little piece, became delightfully quaint. During the Piston, one was absorbed by the quick reactions of the performers to each other. In the Coker, one was overwhelmed by each player's individual virtuosity. The Beethoven, which is usually just pretty funny in a lightly exaggerated way, became pretty, too.

The Bostonians will give five more concerts at Parke-Bernet, their only local appearances this season.

Members of the group heard yesterday were Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist; James Stagliano, French horn player; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Burton Fine, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

Mahler's Third Played By Boston Symphony

There was a treat for Mahler fans on Saturday night when the Boston Sympathy Orchestra opened its 1966-67 series of Carnegie Hall concerts with Mahler's Symphony No. 3 in D minor. There was no time for anything else, of course, for this six-movement essay in musical rhetoric lasts almost two hours including time for an intermission between the first and second movements.

It is curious that a work so long-winded and repetitious and so cluttered with banalities should continue to fascinate conductors and listeners, but it does. Perhaps, it is because just about the time you think you can't stand anymore of it, something happens that is arresting. That something usually has a noble sound that arouses thoughts of magnanimity, redemption and other such things.

The performance conducted by Erich Leinsdorf seemed to do about as much as any could to make the event seem worth the effort. Mahler's superb orchestration projected clearly, and healthy tempos kept the music from bogging down in its own excesses.

Shirley Verrett sang the solo of the fourth movement beautifully. She was joined in the fifth movement by the Boston Boychoir (John Oliver, director) and the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus (Lorna Cooke deVaron, director). Both groups made admirable contributions.

ALLEN HUGHES.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
OCT 30 1966

WEDNESDAY

Concerts

BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players—Jordan Hall, 30 Gainsboro st., Boston: presented by New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra; 8:30 p.m.; tickets at box office.

LYNN BLAIR, soprano—Newton Junior College, College Hall, Washington pk., Newtonville, 8:15 p.m.; free.

NEW ENGLAND Jewish Music Forum—Congregation Kehillath Israel; program, "Songs of Many Lands," Brookline; soloist, Martha Schlamme; 8:30 p.m.; non-members.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 115,966
OCT 23 1966

Boston Chamber Players To Feature Claude Frank

The New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the details of the first program in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series, which will take place at Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, Nov. 2.

It will be the first in a new series of five concerts sponsored jointly by the Orchestra and the Conservatory, in which the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston String Quartet will be heard.

Principal Players

The Nov. 2 program will be given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players who are all principal players in the Orchestra, and Claude Frank, guest pianist.

The concert will open with Beethoven's Quintet for Woodwinds and Piano, Op. 16, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; and Claude Frank at the piano.

The program will continue with Hindemith's Quintet for Woodwinds, performed by Mrs. Dwyer, and Messrs. Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt and Stagliano.

The final number will be the Quartet for Piano and Strings, Op. 47 by Schumann, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; and Mr. Frank at the piano.

Other Programs

Subsequent programs in the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series will be given January 4 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet, which is the quartet-in-resident of the New England Conservatory; Feb. 8 by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players; March 8 by the Boston Symphony String Quartet; and March 29 by the Chamber Players with Claude Frank as guest pianist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,836
NOV 23 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221
NOV 25 1966

Bostonians To Begin Chamber Music Series

The Rhode Island Chamber Music Concerts will present the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. at the Rhode Island School of Design auditorium. Members of the ensemble, all first desk players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Claude Frank, piano.

They will play the Beethoven Quintet in E flat major for Piano and Woodwinds; Hindemith's Quintet for Woodwinds, Op. 24, No. 2, and the Brahms Trio in E flat for Piano, Violin and Horn. Tickets may be purchased by writing to Brown University, Box 1903, Providence 02912, or at Avery Piano Company. Remaining tickets will be sold at the RISD auditorium box office after 6:30 p.m. on the night of the performance Nov. 30.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789
NOV 3 1966

BSO Chamber Players Open Their 3d Season

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Their third season was begun by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall last night when these nine gifted musicians were presented in a thoroughly enjoyable concert by the New England Conservatory of Music. Three delightful facets of music were offered—classical, contemporary and late romantic.

Beethoven's quintet for piano and winds (Op. 16, in E flat), an early work, probably composed about 1796-97, bears striking resemblance in format and instrumentation to Mozart's more celebrated quin-tet in the same key (KV-452), showing how much Beethoven was influenced by the older composer at this early stage of his career. An inferior work to its congener, it treads carefully, though with pulsating ambition, the rigid paths of classical format.

Paul Hindemith

However, this is not to say that Beethoven contrives his effects in a Mozartean manner. It requires playing with verve, relying less, except in the slow movement, on smooth turning of phrases. In last night's performance, the virtuosity of the wind players—Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn, matched Claude Frank's exceptional flair for the piano part.

Nowhere in his finer musical output has the prolific Paul Hindemith exhibited a pawkier sense of humor than in his Kleine Kammermusic (Op. 24, No. 2) for wind quintet, composed in 1922. A divertimento in spirit, it is by no means easy going even for so talented an ensemble as the BSO first-chair players, the quartet mentioned in the preceding paragraph plus Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flautiste.

There are effects which cause many difficulties in performance. An example is the waltz, no "Wine, Women and Song", that, wherein Mrs. Dwyer trilled on the piccolo, a notoriously shrill instrument, intoning with all the measured elegance of John Lemonne in "Wind Amongst the Trees' for solo flute.

After the interval, stringed instruments had their glorious turn, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, teamed with Pianist Frank in Gabriel Faure's delightfully impressive piano quartet (Op. 15, in C minor). Almost all Faure music is elegant—as elegant as the portrait John Singer Sargent painted of this somewhat neglected minor master.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
NOV 3 1966

Boston Symphony players

By Clifford Barnes

The music played by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, on Wednesday night at Jordan Hall, appealed in turn to the ear, the mind, the heart. Not that Beethoven, Hindemith, and Fauré don't contain elements of all three in their work. The compositions on this program simply fell into these categories.

Since chamber music for wind ensembles was popular when Beethoven arrived in Vienna, he wrote to fill the market. Such a work is the Quintet in E-flat major for piano, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, Op. 16. It was designed to give immediate aural pleasure, and so it did as played by Claude Frank, Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Sherman Walt, and James Stagliano.

The piano has the most important role in this work, though there were effective horn and bassoon solos in the Andante cantabile, Mr. Frank led the way in some fine dynamic shading.

The themes of the opening Allegro were carefully interwoven. Each instrumentalist brought out his solo line, then merged into the ensemble. It was a pleasure to hear wind players with such good intonation. Mr. Stagliano played some tricky French horn passages with obvious ease.

Youthful works

Beethoven was 26 when he wrote this quintet. Hindemith was one year older when he completed his Quintet for wind instruments, Op. 24, No. 2. He, too, was interested in composing music for musicians who needed new repertoire.

The actual title of the work, "Kleine Kammermusik," gives a hint of the composer's intention. These are five little vignettes in alternating moods. While the aural pleasure cannot be denied (the harmonic content is no real barrier), the playful delight derives from an appeal to the mind.

There is no piano in this work. Doriot Anthony Dwyer was the fifth member of the ensemble, playing the flute in all but one movement. Hindemith scored his little waltz for piccolo.

The third section, "Placid and simple," was enhanced by solo passages on the oboe and bassoon. The next movement, "Rapid," was an intense conversation with each instrument insisting on a point. A "Very lively" finale left everyone in total agreement.

Musical sophistication

The Fauré Piano Quartet in C minor, Op. 15, is a more sophisticated work than the other two, perhaps because the composer was older when he wrote it. The romantic sweep of each movement definitely appeals to the emotions.

Mr. Frank, at the piano, was joined by Joseph Silverstein, violinist, Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Eskin cellist. Here each musician made an equal contribution to the musicmaking. The soulful lament of the strings against the chiming of the piano was particularly impressive.

Fauré's music has sentiment, but it would be difficult to find sentimentality. A sense of reticence prevents that. In this work there is a kind of sternness, for that's what the key of C minor meant to Fauré. He was sensitive to moods of different tonalities.

Yet the second movement Scherzo bubbled along, and the joy of the ensemble playing together spread over the audience.

TOWN AND COUNTRY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 91,700
NOV 1966

The musical season has been resumed at Parke-Bernet with recitals by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday afternoons at 4. The next is set for November 20. As usual, there will be important exhibitions of works of art from forthcoming sales. Proceeds go to Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
NOV 3 1966

Symphony Group Does Well by Faure

By McLAREN HARRIS
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players put the emphasis upon music for winds to open their third season Wednesday night at Jordan Hall—Beethoven's Quintet for piano and winds, Op. 16, and Hindemith's Wind Quintet, Op. 24, No. 2—then reverted to the more familiar idiom of the piano quartet, for a conclusion.

The choice of works made the evening enlightening, in its own way: we observed Beethoven in Mozartian costume, Hindemath at work with his non-Baroque counterpoint and Faure proving himself one of the most underrated composers in French musical history.

Classic Technique

The Beethoven E flat Quintet is a crystal line model of classic technique: triad-based themes, sectioned forms with textural contrast and motivic development. Melodic leads find their way occasionally into bassoon and horn parts, more often into clarinet and obe, but mostly rest with the piano; the last movement is virtually a miniaturee concerto. Ralph Gomberg (oboe) Gino Cioffi (Clarinet), Sherman Walt (bassoon), James Stagliano (horn) and Claude Frank (piano) treated their material with mutual respect in an unassuming dialogue

Mr. Frank distinguished himself with his sturdy, controlled pianism and a well-conceived ensemble role. He is referred to as "guest pianist" at these recitals, though he seems a semi-permanent, and welcome, fixture with the Chamber Players.

Always Adventure

The five-movement Hindemith Quintet is artfully wrought in its tonal combinations and is masterful in instrumental exploitation as the finest works of the genre — if lacking a genius' marks of thematic invention and dramatic imagination. His forms verge on the classic but his counterpoint is mostly non-imitative, more akin to 19th Century practices of countermelody. But Hindemith is always an adventurer; the quintet is playful, energetic and quiescent. The players—Doriot Anthony Dyer, flute, joined Messrs. Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt and Stagliano—are very good at this sort of thing; both they and the audience found pleasures in pure technical proficiency and exploration.

That Faure, he could write. His C minor Piano Quartet has at once a rhapsodic sweep and a symphonic bearing in its setting of strings now with, now against the keyboard. The four movements differ in expression but are alike in sublimity, lyric felicity, instrumental polish. Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, joined Mr. Frank, and not notwithstanding the space accorded it here, this must be accounted the evening's highlight, with full-toned eloquence, deft exchanges and dynamic sincerity.

The Program:

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, consisting of Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; and guest pianist, Claude Frank, presented the 3rd season's first concert Wednesday night at Jordan Hall.

Quintet in E flat for piano winds, Op. 16	Beethoven
Quintet for Winds, Op. 24, No. 2	Hindemith
Piano Quartet in C minor, Op. 15	Faure

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald
CRANSTON, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 5,498
NOV 23 1966

Boston Symphony Chamber Players At RISD Nov. 30

The Rhode Island Chamber Music Concerts will present the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the Rhode Island School of Design Auditorium on Wednesday, November 30, at 8:30 p.m.

Tickets may be purchased by applying to Brown University, Box 1903, Providence, R. I. 02912, or Avery Piano Company, Weybosset Street, Providence. Any remaining tickets will be sold at the box office after 6:30 p.m. on the evening of the performance.

195

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 29,049

NOV 3 0 1966

Boston Players Expected To Present Outstanding Musical Treat Here Sunday

Boston Players Here Sunday

The String Trio of the famous Boston Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are shown, left to right: Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello, and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster.

By JOHN R. THORNTON

The Boston Symphony Players will appear at Luther Bonney Auditorium at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in a concert sponsored by UMP that promises to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season.

Ever since its official organization more than a year ago, the Boston Players have performed all over the country, have become in a very short time a group in great public demand.

Because of the uniqueness of their ensemble, the players represent enormous flexibility, are able to present unusual concerts of literature that is mostly ignored.

TAKING ADVANTAGE of their special situation, able to draw upon a vast library of fine music of various combinations, the BP group offers stunning virtuosity to support their seldom heard repertoire.

The move began initially some years back, when the "first players" or leaders, who do not participate in the long Boston Pops season each spring, sought to form a top rank ensemble that would tour at that time of year.

But once the organization was recognized and supported by BSO management, they began to be immediately booked at all months of the year. Their most extensive trips, however, take place in May and June.

In addition to their public concerts, the BP's often direct master classes or clinics at colleges and universities where they are engaged, and have made their first recording for a nationally known company, due for release this spring.

THESE "FIRST CHAIR" MUSICIANS who will appear at Luther Bonney Hall Sunday are among the finest instrumentalists in the United States.

Ralph Gomberg, principal oboist; Sherman Walt, first bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Burton Fine, first viola; Jules Eskin, principal cellist, all star performers with the Boston Symphony, will be featured in a program of special attraction.

Luise Vosgerchian, a nationally known soloist, who has appeared with the BSO more than 25 times, noted for her readings of the keyboard scores of Maine's Pulitzer prize winner, Dr. Walter Piston, will be the pianist for the group.

Luise Vesgerchian

Mrs. Vosgerchian, it will be remembered, was featured here two seasons ago, when she played the Piston Concertino for Piano and Orchestra with the Portland Symphony.

She has appeared frequently in solo recital at Town Hall, New York; Jordan Hall, Boston; Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass., has toured extensively in Europe and the United States.

Two years ago, while working on an engineering project at Dartmouth College, where she was a teacher and soloist in residence at The Hopkins Center, she appeared as a member of the trio in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto.

THE FLUTIST AND VIOLINIST failed to show up for a rehearsal so Mrs. Vosgerchian played the famous score as a piano concerto. She dumbfounded the Dartmouth Symphony and its director, Mario DiBonaventura, with her delicacy of touch, sustained a glowing legato line that drew all orchestra members to their feet for a prolonged cheer of gratitude.

Silverstein became concertmaster on the resignation of Richard Burgin who had been the first violin leader for more than 25 years. At the time he was playing in the back stand of the seconds, but so marvelous was his virtuosity that he jumped all the way to the post in one leap.

He is a fine soloist in his own right, placing third in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition. In 1965 he was elected a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Burton Fine for years played in the violin section of the BSO, and when Joseph DePasquale, former first viola, moved to the Philadelphia Symphony, a nationwide search was conducted for his replacement.

DURING THE AUDITIONS, Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops saw Fine practicing backstage at Symphony Hall on a viola. Dickson was astonished, asked why a violinist was using a viola.

"Every man," replied Fine," has the opportunity once in his life to make a damned fool of himself. This is mine."

He then went before Erich Leinsdorf, played briefly, and won the coveted post of first viola of the Boston Symphony.

Jules Eskin became first cello when Sammy Mayes left with DePasquale for the Philadelphia Orchestra. Eskin was former first cellist for the Cleveland Orchestra. For three years he played with Pablo Casals at Puerto Rico and Marlboro, Vt.

RALPH GOMBERG is the youngest of seven children, five of whom graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music, became at 17 first oboe of the All America Youth Orchestra directed by Stokowski. He joined the BSO under Charles Munch as first oboe in 1949, is one of the finest oboe players in the world. His brother, Harold, is first oboe of the New York Philharmonic.

Sherman Walt never meant to be a bassoonist, was forced to learn the instrument in high school, became first bassoon of the Chicago Symphony until he moved to Boston in 1952.

Several years ago I produced a recording of five Vivaldi concerti for bassoon and orchestra with Walt that became a national best seller.

The Boston Players begin their concert with Zachau's Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, continue with Schubert's magnificent Trio No. 1 in B Flat for violin, viola, and cello.

Poulenc's witty Trio for oboe, bassoon, and piano, will conclude the first half of the concert.

FOLLOWING INTERMISSION, Silverstein, Fine and Eskin will play Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E Flat, Opus 3, a lengthy six movement score that is too often overlooked.

I would hope that every serious musician and music lover in the area would make the Boston Players' concert an absolute date, for it is seldom that virtuosity of their calibre is offered in Portland.

The Boston Symphony has long been noted for having the finest leaders in the land, and the concert itself represents a stunning vehicle for their musicianship.

More than 25 leading Maine artists will exhibit at a three-day festival of art opening Monday at the Sheraton-Eastland. Sponsored by the Zonta Club of Portland, proceeds will be used for nursing scholarships.

On loan from Farnsworth Museum of Rockland will be an Andrew Wyeth canvas valued at $10,000. Other paintings owned and loaned will include works of the late William Zorach, Stephen Etnier, Raphael Soyer, Gene Klebe, Laurence Sisson, the late Andrew Winter, N.A., and the late Alexander Bower, N.A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

NOV 6 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 105,712

NOV 2 7 1966

To Perform Here

Sherman Walt, left, principal bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe, will perform works by Zachau and Poulene during a concert of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Bonney Hall Auditorium, University of Maine in Portland, next Sunday. Also appearing will be pianist Luise Vosgerchian.

CLASSICAL

BSO Chamber Players Debut

By JO REITER

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players offer a distinctive program — Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms as well as four contemporary works—in a handsome three-record debut album on RCA Victor (LM-6167, LSC-6167).

Obviously (and intelligently) designed to expand the chamber-music-record audience, the album's promotional jacket includes a 10-inch discussion disc involving Erich Leinsdorf, Joseph Silverstein and Peter Ustinov.

Ustinov's opinions are available again in the notes he has written for the rather elaborate and generously - illustrated booklet that also contains brief biographical sketches of the players. (All of this is of course only a sophisticated but amusing kind of advertising.)

WHAT SHOULD really sell the album is the superb performance of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

The core of this fairly new group, formed in 1964 under the advisory direction of Erich Leinsdorf, consists of first-chair players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They are Joseph Silverstein (violin), Burton Fine (viola), Jules Eskin (cello), Georges Moleux (bass), Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute), Ralph Gomberg (oboe), Gino Cioffi (clarinet), Sherman Walt (bassoon) and James Stagliano (horn).

Pianist Claude Frank is guest artist with the group in the piano chamber music literature. And when the music calls for it, associate members from the Boston Symphony Orchestra are asked to join (e.g., in this recording Alfred Krips, violinist, is heard in Walter Piston's Divertimento for Nine Instruments).

The Chamber Players' versatility is apparent from the repertory included in these three records.

Mozart is represented by two quartets involving a woodwind and strings: the Quartet in D for Flute and Strings, K. 285, and the F Major Quartet for Oboe and Strings, K. 370. They are beautifully performed — intimate, sensitive, but not precious. Moreover, the balance is right.

The flute is heard again in Beethoven's Serenade in D for Flute, Violin, and Viola, Op. 25,

Show Guide RECORDS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Ten-inch discussion

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 2 7 1966

Balanced Program By Chamber Players

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS. Parke-Bernet Galleries. Sunday afternoon, October 16, 1966.

An intimate concert of chamber music ranging from Reicha's Woodwind Quintet in E Flat to Beethoven's Serenade in D for Flute, Violin, and Viola was presented by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at the Parke-Bernet Galleries. The small hall lent a note of informality to the event and the ambience of art and antiques gave much pleasure to the eye during the intermission stroll.

The fine virtuosity of each individual player and their evident musical rapport made this a concert of warm and delightful chamber music. Walter Piston's Woodwind Quintet (1956) and Wilson Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings (1959) were the contemporary offerings. Both the Piston and Coker compositions were performed with superb musicianship and sharply drawn interpretations. The Reicha and Beethoven were of a light nature and provided a balance to the more dissonant works.

The members of the Boston Symphony who comprised this fine ensemble were Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist; James Stagliano, French horn player; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Burton Fine, violist; and Jules Eskin, cellist. Forthcoming concerts by the Boston Chamber Players will be given at the Parke-Bernet Galleries on the following Sunday afternoons: November 20, January 22, February 12, March 5 and April 16.

Helen M. Feeney

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838
NOV 3 1966

Fine Faure by BSO Chamber

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cell; Claude Frank, piano;

By ROSE MARY PEDERSEN

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented a diverse program Wednesday in Jordan Hall. The concert began with the Beethoven quintet, an ingenuous and straightforward work in three movements. Both the strongest music and best playing was in the first movement, particularly in the varied return and the brilliant coda.

Pianist Claude Frank adjusted his quality very successfully to the woodwinds' sound, taking care not to cover with the bass passages. The performance allowed the music to speak for itself.

Paul Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik" for wind quintet is popular with wind players and it came across as it usually does. a pleasant, but somewhat prosaic piece.

The high point of the evening was the extraordinary performance of the Faure The players clearly believed in this piece, and made it completely convincing. This is not a simple task, since it could in some hands seem long-winded or even soft. But as played in this performance, it was constantly alive, with great variety of mood and clarity of form.

The string playing was especially beautiful for its qualities and balances. The playing of the rhetorical opening of the third movement was superb.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 79,331
DEC 17 1966

Boston Concert Scheduled on 4th

The New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the second concert of the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music series will be presented Jan. 4 at Jordan Hall, Boston.

The concert will feature the Boston Symphony String Quartet, the quartet-in-residence at the conservatory. Gino Cioffi, principal clarinet of the orchestra, will join them.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 68,000 S. 72,000
NOV 6 1966

New Records

Classical

One of the most pretentious albums of chamber music ever to be issued is a three-LP set, plus a commentary record, by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Everyone has gone all-out to make this release a resounding success.

The players, first of all, are principally the first chair musicians of the Boston Symphony. The group is under the guidance of Erich Leinsdorf. The musicians themselves are all virtuosi.

ZACHEIS

The repertoire played here is certain to have something for everyone . . . it runs from Mozart through the Bs to Fine, Copland, Carter and Piston.

The recording quality is excellent, with real chamber acoustics.

In addition, the program notes and commentary are by the celebrated Peter Ustinov.

Then, for a clincher, a 10-inch record of commentary and discussion with selected passages from the recording are proffered by an informal group consisting of Ustinov, Leinsdorf and Joseph Silverstein, the first violinist.

Now I ask you . . . how much more can a company cram into an album? (RCA-Victor.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News (e)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 79,208
DEC 2 1966

Concert Set By Musicians From Boston

PORTLAND — Six leading musicians from the Boston Orchestra will give a concert of works by Zachau, Schubert, Poulenc, and Beethoven at Bonney Hall Auditorium, University of Maine in Portland, at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Burton Fine, principal Viola; and Jules Eskin, principal cello, will play Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B flat and the six-movement Beethoven String Trio in E flat, Opus 3.

Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe; Sherman Walt, principal bassoon; and Luise Vosgerchian, a pianist who frequently appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Zachau's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano in four movements and Poulenc's trio for these instruments in three movements.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,836
DEC 1 1966

Music In Review

Rarely Heard Arrangements Delight Of Chamber Music

One of the delights of attending the R.I. Chamber Music Concerts, sponsored by the Brown University Department of Music is that you hear music of the masters in uncommon arrangements and combinations of instruments. It is the music that has not been worn threadbare by endless repetition on radio, television and records.

Such was the program Wednesday evening in the School of Design Auditorium performed by the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Players comprising Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Claude Frank, piano. All but Mr. Frank are first desk musicians with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Frank is a concert pianist.

Their opening work was Beethoven's "Quintet in E-flat Major for Piano and Woodwinds" played by oboe, horn, clarinet, bassoon and piano. As I have remarked here before it is easy to be happy in E-flat major and not only the music but the players were merry. Each had his turn in sharing this enjoyment with an audience that nearly filled the auditorium.

Beginning with the first movement grave, it became gay and delicately humorous in an allegro second movement that was made droll in places by Claude Frank's fugues and cadenza that he played with a toying impishness that resembled joyous mischief.

Then the third movement, andante cantabile, was serious almost amoroso with a passionate wooing in the horn solo that gave way to a finale, rondo: allegro ma non troppo, with a skippy, bouncy dance rhythm like a children's game or a kind of floppy, unpredictable dance of puppets.

Of course, there was a modern work, Hindemith's "Quintet For Wind Instruments," played by flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn. The opening was marked "playful" and the various voices were so far apart in harmony it was made to sound like daw in the zoological gardens. Each instrument seemed to go its own way, about its own business, and ended with kind of cliff-hanger mid-phrase abruptness that seemed like an attempt at wit but it may have been "just cute."

The waltz was lumbering and ponderous and kept the biological theme, and, if it resembled the waltz of the hippopotomi, perhaps that's what was intended. Then it was marked "placid and simple" and could have been the animals' siesta in the noonday heat because there were sleepy passages on the flute, and the bassoon emitted stentorious respirations. It became "rapid" and "very lively" toward the end like the agitation and impatience of hunger, so, by now, it was probably feeding time and each voice cried its own complaint.

One can only marvel at the artistry of these musicians who can make the absurd polyphonic sounds some modern composers afflict us with sound like music. It seems that these composers take the pure harmonies of their betters and cut them up to make an abstract musical collage that resembles a jigsaw puzzle put together by junior-first graders.

Certainly these grand musicians do not choose the sublime music of Brahms, Beethoven, Mozart and others, and play it with such passion, because it is easy. They prefer it because of its divine beauty. And Joseph Silverman, Claude Frank and James Stagliano proved this in the concluding composition, Brohms' "Trio in E-flat major for Piano, Violin and Horn."

The andante was enchanting with the whispering violin, the crooning horn and the declamatory piano, laughing in the scherzo, and hypnotic with a euphoria of entrancing sound in the adagio, ending with an awakening to a singing, skipping, leaping jubilance.

C.H.L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789
JAN 5 1967

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,508 SUN. 566,562
NOV 27 1966

New Recordings

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS has made an album that extends from Mozart to Walter Piston. It is an unusual conglomeration and becomes more so with the introduction of Peter Ustinov, a stage, movie and television celebrity who has never been associated with music up to this time. What he says is sensible enough, however, and since he speaks English with distinction, he becomes an asset to the recorded program.

The musical content comprises works by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Irving Fine, Aaron Copland and Elliott Carter.

There is a place and perhaps a need for a volume of this kind. In most American cities the patrons of music can hear symphonies and string quartets, but other kinds of instrumental ensembles are rarely played. Thirty years have passed since the Mozart Quartet for Oboe and Strings has been publicly performed in St. Louis and the same composer's quartet for flute and strings has never been produced here, to my knowledge, in recent times. Travelling quartets do not ordinarily bring a flutist or an oboist with them.

In any case the Boston group, which consists of the elite players from the Boston Symphony orchestra, have recorded a miscellaneous volume of chamber music uniformly excellent in performance.

Elliott Carter's Woodwind Quintet utilizes a modern idiom in that the tonality is veiled and dissonances occur frequently. Nevertheless the listener should be charmed by its vivid coloring and its dynamism. The late Irving Fine's Fantasia for String Trio resembles a mosaic rather than a straight line discourse. Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme" doesn't sound at all Jewish or even Oriental. It's just another modern work and impressive as an example of craftsmanship; but it has little emotional pull.

Listeners who are conditioned to Beethoven's heaven-storming symphonies—the Fifth, Seventh and Ninth—may be surprised, and certainly they will have every reason to be pleased, by his Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola. The Old Man is relaxed and full of joy in living. His tunes are lively. The work as a whole belongs more to the eighteenth than to the nineteenth century.

The Brahms Quartet in C Minor opens with a melodic statement that comes near to being outright bathos. But its underlay of nobility keeps it from reaching the extremes of mawkishness and the other three movements are finely wrought and uniformly ingenious.

As Ustinov says, a composer who writes chamber music must have something to say; he can't hide behind the artillery barrage of an orchestra. This album ranks high in quality and the Boston players, are superior musicians artistically and technically. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, five records) —T.B.S.

LAKE CHARLES, LA.
LAKE CHARLES AMERICAN PRESS
D. 30,000 SUN. 30,500
NOV 12 1966

RECOMMENDED CLASSICS

Boston Chamber Players: virtuoso recording stars

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS, Joseph Silverstein, director (RCA Victor, 3-12" records; stereo LSC-6167; monaural LM-6167).

Chamber music is, in the words of Peter Ustinov, "a form of rediscovery to the professional, of discovery to the amateur."

It is a form of music which can be satisfying to both types of players, yet it is one that demands the utmost of teamwork, and the utmost of simplicity, since it is music of bare essentials, with no screen of lush orchestral sound to beguile the listener.

In this three-record album, the first of a projected series by a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eight works are offered — four by established composers of the Classical and Romantic eras, and four by contemporary composers.

The first half of the program is devoted to Mozart (Flute and Oboe Quartets, K. 285 and K. 370), Brahms (Quartet in C, Op. 60) and Beethoven (Serenade in D, Op. 25).

The second half, in the contemporary era, is made up of works by Irving Fine (Fantasia for String Trio), Aaron Copland (Vitebsk), Elliott Carter (Woodwind Quintet) and Walter Prsiton (Divertimento for Nine Instruments).

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, made up of 10 strings and winds, plus piano, show their virtuosity in every work, particularly in works which call for winds.

There is a large number of excellent string quartets in this country, of course, and they are active all the year around. Fine wind players, however, are apt to be found only in the top orchestras, and this is what puts the Boston Chamber Players right at the top of the list.

The two Mozart quartets are deftly performed, with style and polish, but they are perhaps the least significant of all the works recorded. Perhaps this is because there is so much fine Mozart music being recorded these days that the listener subconsciously demands something really special.

The Beethoven Serenade shows that composer in one of his rare lighter moments, and it is a joy from beginning to end.

The Brahms shows up the full resources of the Boston group. It is a performance of richness, of depth and of feeling. The instrumental balances are well worked out, too.

The contemporary works, however, are the real standouts. The Boston players, for the most part, were born and trailed in this country, and it goes without saying that another Ustinov discussing the music with Silverstein and Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor.

Irvine Fine, who died in 1962, left only a few works, but his output was significant far in excess of its bulk. In the "Fantasia for String Trio," Fine gives us a Romantically shaped work in the strictest discipline of the 20th Century.

Copland's "Vitebsk" is a study on a Jewish theme, and is a small tone poem which is akin to "Appalachian Spring."

Carter's "Woodwind Quintet" is a short but polished work that evokes a pastoral mood, with considerable rhythmic variety.

Lastly, Piston's "Divertimento" makes use of the whole ensemble in a warm and winning work.

The ensemble is made up of Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskine, cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Doriot Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; and Claude Frank, piano.

The recording, under the direction of Anthony Salvatore, is faultless, and the sound is brilliantly clean.

As a bonus, RCA Victor has included a 7-inch disc with Peter Ustinov discussing the music with Silverstein and Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor.

BSO Chamber Music Concert in Jordan Hall Delight

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Music of Haydn, Mozart and Bela Bartok was presented in Jordan Hall last night by the Boston Symphony String Quartet with Gino Cioffi, clarinetist, as assisting artist. Perhaps inclement weather caused the half-filled house, but those who made the grade had much reason for enjoyment.

Haydn composed approximately 80 string quartets. From early, amiable beginnings he developed this form for two violins, viola and cello into an integrated structure, capable of great power and profundity, and while so engaged he managed to write more first-rate quartets than any other composer.

The half-dozen of his 20th opus, the so-called "Sun Quartets," greatly and obviously transcended existing works in this format. His 33d quartet (Op. 20, #2, in C) offers quick enticement in its first movement; there is fire and grandeur in its ranges of mood and temperament.

Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violinists; Burton Fine, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, played with energy, emotion and flexibility; string tones were sunny and solid.

Bartok's third quartet is the only single-movement composition among the late Magyar master's persuasive output of chamber music, thus being the most intense and concentrated of his half-dozen works for four stringed instruments. It is as mustard-keen and sharp-nosed as the cubistic portrait of its composer, herewith reproduced, a hard-fisted essay abounding in polyphonic syntax.

Steeped in Hungarian and Romanian musical folklore, Bartok perhaps here had transcribed the rhythmic intensities of merrymaking peasantry of the hinterlands into the third quartet's simple pattern of slow, fast, slow, fast. Perhaps, some day, a roving American musical genius will catch the same spirits of the fiddling hillbillies of the Appalachians or Ozarks, though their jamboree tunes will be inspired by home-grown corn likker rather than Balkan slivovitz.

The Bostonians' playing was sensitive, spirited and understanding; their performing concept was vital and vibrant.

Mozart composed his delightful clarinet quintet (KV-581, in A) without any hope of profit for Anton Stadler, a a liquorish-stick artist and less-anonymous alcoholic than Bartok's gypsy violinists or America's moonshine-haunted fiddlers. Biographers say Stadler led Mozart into bad habits as his roistering barfly companion and ran the composer into debt.

However that may be, it is difficult to recall any more superb example of Mozartistry than the first movement of this quintet. There are quiet distinctly three subjects, rather than the customary two, with the clarinet's almost-human tones turned in many varying ways for florid fioriture.

Cioffi's performance was superior in its clarity and mellowness of exposition. He maintained hairspring balances with the four string players,

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
DEC 30 1966
New England Newsclip

Symphony strings

The next concert by the Boston Symphony String Quartet will take place in Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Jan. 4, at 8:30. The program will include music by Haydn, Bartók, and Mozart. Gino Cioffi, clarinet, will be assisting artist with the regular members of the quartet. Tickets are available at the box office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838
NOV 3 1966

Fine Faure by BSO Chamber

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cell; Claude Frank, piano;

By ROSE MARY PEDERSEN

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented a diverse program Wednesday in Jordan Hall. The concert began with the Beethoven quintet, an ingenuous and straightforward work in three movements. Both the strongest music and best playing was in the first movement, particularly in the varied return and the brilliant coda.

Pianist Claude Frank adjusted his quality very successfully to the woodwinds' sound, taking care not to cover with the bass passages. The performance allowed the music to speak for itself.

Paul Hindemith's "Kleine Kammermusik" for wind quintet is popular with wind players and it came across as it usually does. a pleasant, but somewhat prosaic piece.

The high point of the evening was the extraordinary performance of the Faure. The players clearly believed in this piece, and made it completely convincing. This is not a simple task, since it could in some hands seem long-winded or even soft. But as played in this performance, it was constantly alive, with great variety of mood and clarity of form.

The string playing was especially beautiful for its qualities and balances. The playing of the rhetorical opening of the third movement was superb.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE
D. 68,000 S. 72,000
NOV 6 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 79,331
DEC 17 1966

Boston Concert Scheduled on 4th

The New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the second concert of the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music series will be presented Jan. 4 at Jordan Hall, Boston.

The concert will feature the Boston Symphony String Quartet, the quartet-in-residence at the conservatory. Gino Cioffi, principal clarinet of the orchestra, will join them.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,836
DEC 1 1966

Music In Review

Rarely Heard Arrangements Delight Of Chamber Music

One of the delights of attending the R.I. Chamber Music Concerts, sponsored by the Brown University Department of Music is that you hear music of the masters in uncommon arrangements and combinations of instruments. It is the music that has not been worn threadbare by endless repetition on radio, television and records.

Such was the program Wednesday evening in the School of Design Auditorium performed by the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Players comprising Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Claude Frank, piano. All but Mr. Frank are first desk musicians with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Frank is a concert pianist.

Their opening work was Beethoven's "Quintet in E-flat Major for Piano and Woodwinds" played by oboe, horn, clarinet, bassoon and piano. As I have remarked here before it is easy to be happy in E-flat major and not only the music but the players were merry. Each had his turn in sharing this enjoyment with an audience that nearly filled the auditorium.

Beginning with the first movement grave, it became gay and delicately humorous in an allegro second movement that was made droll in places by Claude Frank's fugues and cadenza that he played with a toying impishness that resembled joyous mischief.

Then the third movement, andante cantabile, was serious almost amoroso with a passionate wooing in the horn solo that gave way to a finale, rondo: allegro ma non troppo, with a skippy, bouncy dance rhythm like a children's game or a kind of floppy, unpredictable dance of puppets.

Of course, there was a modern work, Hindemith's "Quintet For Wind Instruments," played by flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn. The opening was marked playful" and the various voices were so far apart in harmony it was made to sound like daw in the zoological gardens. Each instrument seemed to go its own way, about its own business, and ended with kind of cliff-hanger mid-phrase abruptness that seemed like an attempt at wit but it may have been "just cute."

The waltz was lumbering and ponderous and kept the zoological theme, and, if it resembled the waltz of the hippopotomi, perhaps that's what was intended. Then it was marked "placid and simple" and could have been the animals' siesta in the noonday heat because there were sleepy passages on the flute, and the bassoon emitted stentorious respirations. It became "rapid" and "very lively" toward the end like the agitation and impatience of hunger, so, by now, it was probably feeding time and each voice cried its own complaint.

One can only marvel at the artistry of these musicians who can make the absurd polyphonic sounds some modern composers afflict us with sound like music. It seems that these composers take the pure harmonies of their betters and cut them up to make an abstract musical collage that resembles a jigsaw puzzle put together by junior-first graders.

Certainly these grand musicians do not choose the sublime music of Brahms, Beethoven, Mozart and others, and play it with such passion, because it is easy. They prefer it because of its divine beauty. And Joseph Silverman, Claude Frank and James Stagliano proved this in the concluding composition, Brohms' "Trio in E-flat major for Piano, Violin and Horn."

The andante was enchanting with the whispering violin, the crooning horn and the declamatory piano, laughing in the scherzo, and hypnotic with a euphoria of entrancing sound in the adagio, ending with an awakening to a singing, skipping, leaping jubilance.

C.H.L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789
JAN 5 1967

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,508 SUN. 566,562
NOV 27 1966

New Recordings

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER ORCHESTRA has made an album that extends from Mozart to Walter Piston. It is an unusual conglomeration and becomes more so with the introduction of Peter Ustinov, a stage, movie and television celebrity who has never been associated with music up to this time. What he says is sensible enough, however, and since he speaks English with distinction, he becomes an asset to the recorded program.

The musical content comprises works by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Copland, Irving Fine, Aaron Copland and Elliott Carter.

There is a place and perhaps a need for a volume of this kind. In most American cities the patrons of music can hear symphonies and string quartets, but other kinds of instrumental ensembles are rarely played. Thirty years have passed since the Mozart Quartet for Oboe and Strings has been publicly performed in St. Louis and the same composer's quartet for flute and strings has never been produced here, to my knowledge, in recent times. Travelling quartets do not ordinarily bring a flutist or an oboist with them.

In any case the Boston group, which consists of the elite players from the Boston Symphony orchestra, have recorded a miscellaneous volume of chamber music uniformly excellent in performance.

Elliott Carter's Woodwind Quintet utilizes a modern idiom in that the tonality is veiled and dissonances occur frequently. Nevertheless the listener should be charmed by its vivid coloring and its dynamism. The late Irving Fine's Fantasia for String Trio resembles a mosaic rather than a straight line discourse. Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk—Study on a Jewish Theme" doesn't sound at all Jewish or even Oriental. It's just another modern work and impressive as an example of craftsmanship; but it has little emotional pull.

Listeners who are conditioned to Beethoven's heaven-storming symphonies—the Fifth, Seventh and Ninth—may be surprised, and certainly they will have every reason to be pleased, by his Serenade in D for Flute, Violin and Viola. The Old Man is relaxed and full of joy in living. His tunes are lively. The work as a whole belongs more to the eighteenth than to the nineteenth century.

The Brahms Quartet in C Minor opens with a melodic statement that comes near to being outright bathos. But its underlay of nobility keeps it from reaching the extremes of mawkishness and the other three movements are finely wrought and uniformly ingenious.

As Ustinov says, a composer who writes chamber music must have something to say; he can't hide behind the artillery barrage of an orchestra. This album ranks high in quality and the Boston players, are superior musicians artistically and technically. (RCA-Victor, Stereophonic, five records) —T.B.S.

LAKE CHARLES, LA.
LAKE CHARLES AMERICAN PRESS
D. 30,000 SUN. 30,500
NOV 12 1966

RECOMMENDED CLASSICS

Boston Chamber Players: virtuoso recording stars

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS, Joseph Silverstein, director (RCA Victor, 3-12" records; stereo LSC-6167; monaural LM-6167).

Chamber music is, in the words of Peter Ustinov, "a form of rediscovery to the professional, of discovery to the amateur."

It is a form of music which can be satisfying to both types of players, yet it is one that demands the utmost of teamwork, and the utmost of simplicity, since it is music of bare essentials, with no screen of lush orchestral sound to beguile the listener.

In this three-record album, the first of a projected series by a group of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, eight works are offered — four by established composers of the Classical and Romantic eras, and four by contemporary composers.

The first half of the program is devoted to Mozart (Flute and Oboe Quartets, K. 285 and K. 370), Brahms (Quartet in C, Op. 60) and Beethoven (Serenade in D, Op. 25).

The second half, in the contemporary era, is made up of works by Irving Fine (Fantasia for String Trio), Aaron Copland (Vitebsk), Elliott Carter (Woodwind Quintet) and Walter Prsiton (Divertimento for Nine Instruments).

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, made up of 10 strings and winds, plus piano, show their virtuosity in every work, particularly in works which call for winds.

There is a large number of excellent string quartets in this country, of course, and they are active all the year around. Fine wind players, however, are apt to be found only in the top orchestras, and this is what puts the Boston Chamber Players right at the top of the list.

The two Mozart quartets are deftly performed, with style and polish, but they are perhaps the least significant of all the works recorded. Perhaps this is because there is so much fine Mozart music being recorded these days that the listener subconsciously demands something really special.

The Beethoven Serenade shows that composer in one of his rare lighter moments, and it is a joy from beginning to end.

The Brahms shows up the full resources of the Boston group. It is a performance of richness, of depth and of feeling. The instrumental balances are well worked out, too.

The contemporary works, however, are the real standouts. The Boston players, for the most part, were born and trailed in this country, and it goes without saying that an American is better than anyone else in playing American music.

Irvine Fine, who died in 1962, left only a few works, but his output was significant far in excess of its bulk. In the "Fantasia for String Trio," Fine gives us a Romantically shaped work in the strictest discipline of the 20th Century.

Copland's "Vitebsk" is a study on a Jewish theme, and is a small tone poem which is akin to "Appalachian Spring."

Carter's "Woodwind Quintet" is a short but polished work that evokes a pastoral mood, with considerable rhythmic variety.

Lastly, Piston's "Divertimento" makes use of the whole ensemble in a warm and winning work.

The ensemble is made up of Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskine, cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Doriot Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; and Claude Frank, piano.

The recording, under the direction of Anthony Salvatore, is faultless, and the sound is brilliantly clean.

As a bonus, RCA Victor has included a 7-inch disc with Peter Ustinov discussing the music with Silverstein and Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor.

New Records

Classical

One of the most pretentious albums of chamber music ever to be issued is a three-LP set, plus a commentary record, by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Everyone has gone all-out to make this release a resounding success.

The players, first of all, are principally the first chair musicians of the Boston Symphony. The group is under the guidance of Erich Leinsdorf. The musicians themselves are all virtuosi.

ZACHEIS

The repertoire played here is certain to have something for everyone . . . it runs from Mozart through the Bs to Fine, Copland, Carter and Piston.

The recording quality is excellent, with real chamber acoustics.

In addition, the program notes and commentary are by the celebrated Peter Ustinov.

Then, for a clincher, a 10-inch record of commentary and discussion with selected passages from the recording are proffered by an informal group consisting of Ustinov, Leinsdorf and Joseph Silverstein, the first violinist.

Now I ask you . . . how much more can a company cram into an album? (RCA-Victor.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News (e)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 79,208
DEC 2 1966

Concert Set By Musicians From Boston

PORTLAND — Six leading musicians from the Boston Orchestra will give a concert of works by Zachau, Schubert, Poulenc, and Beethoven at Bonney Hall Auditorium, University of Maine in Portland, at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Burton Fine, principal Viola; and Jules Eskin, principal cello, will play Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B flat and the six-movement Beethoven String Trio in E flat, Opus 3.

Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe; Sherman Walt, principal bassoon; and Luise Vosgerchian, a pianist who frequently appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play Zachau's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano in four movements and Poulenc's trio for these instruments in three movements.

BSO Chamber Music Concert in Jordan Hall Delight

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Music of Haydn, Mozart and Bela Bartok was presented in Jordan Hall last night by the Boston Symphony String Quartet with Gino Cioffi, clarinetist, as assisting artist. Perhaps inclement weather caused the half-filled house, but those who made the grade had much reason for enjoyment.

Haydn composed approximately 80 string quartets. From early, amiable beginnings he developed this form for two violins, viola and cello into an integrated structure, capable of great power and profundity, and while so engaged he managed to write more first-rate quartets than any other composer.

The half-dozen of his 20th opus, the so-called "Sun Quartets" greatly and obviously transcended existing works in this format. His 33d quartet (Op. 20, #2, in C) offers quick enticement in its first movement; there is fire and grandeur in its ranges of mood and temperament.

Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violinists; Burton Fine, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, played with energy, emotion and flexibility; string tones were sunny and solid.

Bartok's third quartet is the only single-movement composition among the late Magyar master's persuasive output of chamber music, thus being the most intense and concentrated of his half-dozen works for four stringed instruments. It is as mustard-keen and sharp-nosed as the cubistic portrait of its composer, herewith reproduced, a hard-fisted essay abounding in polyphonic syntax.

Steeped in Hungarian and Romanian musical folklore, Bartok perhaps here had transcribed the rhythmic intensities of merrymaking peasantry of the hinterlands into the third quartet's simple pattern of slow, fast, slow, fast. Perhaps, some day, a roving American musical genius will catch the same spirits of the fiddling hillbillies of the Appalachians or Ozarks, though their jamboree tunes will be inspired by home-grown corn likker rather than Balkan slivovitz.

The Bostonians' playing was sensitive, spirited and understanding; their performing concept was vital and vibrant.

Mozart composed his delightful clarinet quintet (KV-581, in A) without any hope of profit for Anton Stadler, a a liquorish-stick artist and less-anonymous alcoholic than Bartok's gypsy violinists or America's moonshine-haunted fiddlers. Biographers say Stadler led Mozart into bad habits as his roistering barfly companion and ran the composer into debt.

However that may be, it is difficult to recall any more superb example of Mozartistry than the first movement of this quintet. There are quiet distinctly three subjects, rather than the customary two, with the clarinet's almost-human tones turned in many varying ways for florid floriture.

Cioffi's performance was superior in its clarity and mellowness of exposition. He maintained hairspring balances with the four string players.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
DEC 30 1966
New England Newsclip

Symphony strings

The next concert by the Boston Symphony String Quartet will take place in Jordan Hall on Wednesday, Jan. 4, at 8:30. The program will include music by Haydn, Bartók, and Mozart. Gino Cioffi, clarinet, will be assisting artist with the regular members of the quartet. Tickets are available at the box office.

197

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 44,619
DEC 17 1966

Music

Met. National Cancels Country-Wide Tour

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Unfortunate news on the musical front this week was contained in an announcement to the effect that the Metropolitan National company has cancelled its country-wide tour.

The tremendous work put in to the project that was launched last season, and seemed certain to realize an excellent second season, by Miss Rise Stevens, co-manager of the company and her dedicated associates, has apparently been wasted. The many, many musicians concerned, especially the young singers whose association meant an opportunity to gain priceless experience in the operatic field, must now turn to other points of musical interest in which they may continue their careers.

Rise Stevens

An optimistic note was sounded however, in the statement that whenever the opportunity arises, the company will be re-organized to full scale, and schedules as planned and listed will again be in order.

The chamber music series being sponsored jointly by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the New England Conservatory of Music will be continued when the second program in the 1966-67 series is presented in Jordan Hall at the Conservatory on Wednesday evening, Jan. 4.

Featured will be the Boston Symphony String quartet, currently serving as resident group at the school. Joining regular members of the Quartet will be Gino Cioffi, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony. Players in the Quartet include, Joseph Silverstein (BSO Concertmaster), violinist; George Zazofsky, violinist; Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Kaun, cellist.

THE PROGRAM will include the Haydn String Quartet in C major, Bartok's String Quartet No. 3, and with Mr. Cioffi as assisting artist, the A Major Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581, by Mozart.

Other concerts in this series will be held on Feb. 8, March 8 and 29. In the concert of March 29, the noted young American pianist, Claude Frank will be guest artist.

Aaron Copland and Hans Werner Henze will be composers-in-residence for Dartmouth College's fifth annual Congregation of the Arts next summer.

Mario di Bonaventure, director of music for the Hopkins Center and summer music program, announced that the guest composer-teachers would conduct, lecture and supervise performances of their works during their two-week stay at Dartmouth.

Mr. Henze will be coming directly from Europe where his recent operas, "The Young Lord" and "The Bassarids" (1966 Salzburg Festival) secured his position among today's foremost opera composers.

The Concord orchestra, under the direction of Attilio Poto, will present the annual Young Artists concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 15, in the Concord-Carlisle high school, Concord.

Soloists for the concert will be announced at a later date by the music director.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
DEC 1966

Opera/Concert Calendar

COMPILED BY RALPH AND OLGA LEWANDO

Jan.

KEY

BO	Brooklyn Acad.—Opera House	LM	Library & Museum, Lincoln Center	(s)	soloists	fl	flutist
BM	Brooklyn Acad.—Music Hall	M	Metropolitan Opera House	b	baritone	g	guitarist
C	Carnegie Hall	N	New York City Center	bs	bass	h	harp
CR	Carnegie Recital Hall	NS	N. Y. State Theater	bn	bassoon	hc	harpsichord
EL	Eisner & Lubin Auditorium, Loeb Student Center, NYU	P	Philharmonic Hall	co	contralto	l	lute
HA	Hunter College Assembly Hall	PB	Parke-Bernet Galleries	c	cellist	m	mezzo-soprano
HP	Hunter College Playhouse	PI	Hotel Pierre Roof Garden	cl	clarinet	n	narrator
J	Judson Hall	Q	Queens College	cs	coloratura soprano	o	organist
K	Theresa L. Kaufmann Concert Hall	R	Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium	d	dance	ob	oboe
		T	Town Hall	f	folk singer	dp	duo-pianists
		V	Vanderbilt Hall, NYU

p	pianist
r	recorder
s	soprano
t	tenor
tm	timpanist
tp	trumpet
v	violinist
va	viola
vg	virginal

SUNDAY, JAN. 22

C Amer. Symph. Orch., Kletzki —3:00
C America-Israel Fdn., benefit concer —8:30
CR Cornelia de Roode, s —2:30
CR Carl Eberl, va —5:30
CR Hilda Harris, ms —8:30
K Yuriko, d —2:30
LM Nina Dova, s-g —2:30
N "Traviata" in English —8:00
N "La Boheme" in English —8:00
NS Ballet —1:15 & 7:15
P Jewish Cultural Clubs & Soc., Concert —2:00
PB Boston Symph. Cham. Players —4:00
Q Beaux Arts Trio —4:00

MONDAY, JAN. 23

C Amer. Symph. Orch., Kletzki —8:30
HP Early Music Quartet —8:40
M "La Boheme" —8:00

TUESDAY, JAN. 24

C Natl. Orch. Assn., Barnett —8:30
M "Peter Grimes" —8:00
P Phila. Orch., (Kertesz) —8:30
T Clarion Concert, Jenkins: (s) B. Allen, H. Cuenod, A. Darling, H. Rehfuss, H. Vanni; A. Fuller, hc —8:30

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 25

C Wilfred Joseph's "Requiem," Cincinnati Symph., Rudolf —8:30
J "Barber of Seville" —8:30
K Paul Sanasardo, d —8:30
LM Robert Menga, v; Louis Persinger, p —6:00
M "Il Trovatore" —8:00
P Boston Symph. Orch., Leinsdorf —8:30
T Esterhazy Orch., Blum; S. Gildberg, v —8:30

THURSDAY, JAN. 26

BO Boston Symph. Orch., Kubelik —8:30
C Wilfred Joseph's "Requiem," Cincinnati Symph., Rudolf —8:30
CR Fritz Jahoda, p —8:30
LM N.Y. Wind Soc. —6:00
LM David & Anna Anton, p & c —6:00
M "Tristan und Isolde" —8:00
N "La Boheme" —8:00
NS Ballet —8:15
P N.Y. Phil., Steinberg; Z. Francescatti, v —8:30

FRIDAY, JAN. 27

C Artur Rubinstein, p —8:30
HA I Musici —8:30
LM Fitzroy Davis —6:00
LM David & Anna Anton, c & p —6:00
M "Lohengrin" —8:00
N "Marriage of Figaro" —8:00
NS Ballet —8:15
P N.Y. Phil., Steinberg; Z. Francescatti, v —2:15
P Boston Symph. Orch., Leinsdorf —8:30
PI Operalogue, C. Longone —11:00 a.m.
T Beaux Arts Quartet —8:30
V Bartok Quartet —8:30

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JAN 1967

"About the Town"

Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, offers ten concerts at Symphony Hall (CO 6-1492) in January: Friday afternoon (2 p.m.) and Saturday evening (8:30 p.m.) performances on January 6-7, 13-14, and 20-21; Tuesday evening concerts at 8:30 p.m. on January 3, 17, and 31, and at 7:30 p.m. on January 10. An open rehearsal is scheduled for Thursday, January 12 at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concerts on January 3, 6, and 7. Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor for the January 10 concert and Rafael Kukelik will conduct concerts for the rest of the month beginning January 13. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist with the orchestra, will be soloist at the January 6-7 concerts.

Chamber Music

Boston Symphony String Quartet appears in the Boston Symphony Chamber Series at Jordan Hall, 30 Gainsboro Street (KE 6-2412) on Wednesday, January 4 at 8:30 p.m. The quartet includes four BSO musicians in residence at New England Conservatory: Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello. Assisted by Gino Cioffi, they will offer Haydn "Quartet in C major," Bartok "Quartet #3," and Mozart "Quintet in A major."

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
JAN 22 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
JAN 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Chamber Players To Give Concert

Four works will make up the Feb. 8 concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall.

Performed by principals in the orchestra, the program will open with Prokofiev's Quintet, Op. 39, for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola, and bass. Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings (1959) will follow the Prokofiev.

After intermission the ensemble will play "Lifelines," by Gunther Schuller, president-elect of the New England Conservatory. The conservatory is co-sponsor with the orchestra of this series of concerts. The program will close with Beethoven's String Trio No. 1, in E flat, Op. 3.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 51,098
DEC 1 1966

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tues. at 8:30:
Erich Leinsdorf leads the BSO in an all-Beethoven program: the Overture to "Coriolan," Op. 62; Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
Fri. at 2: Leinsdorf conducts Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser"; Carter's Piano Concerto, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95. Pianist Jacob Lateiner is soloist in the Carter work. Repeat performance Sat. at 8:30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING QUARTET

The BSO [illegible] at the New England Conservatory, offers the second program in a five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music series, sponsored jointly by the Conservatory and the Orchestra, at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday in Jordan Hall. Gino Cioffi, the BSO's principal clarinetist, will be soloist in Mozart's Quintet in A major for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581. Also on the program is Haydn's Quartet in C major, Op. 20, No. 2, and Bartok's Quartet No. 3.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
JAN 5 1967

Quartet in Lively Performance

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The Boston Symphony String Quartet (Joseph Silverstein, George Zazofsky, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin) gave a concert in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series at Jordan Hall Wednesday night, the program being Hayden's Quartet in C, Op. 20, No. 4, Bartok's Quartet No. 3, and, with Gino Cioffi, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet.

Our special gratitude goes to the group for finding a Haydn quartet that is one of his richest and most fascinating, and yet one that the concert-going public almost never gets to hear. It is lushy scored and at the same time extremely concentrated in substance.

It is a work full of special fancies: the mellow Schubertian harmonies of the first movement's second theme; the Adagio, a fantasy in character, with its powerful unison proclamations; the sinuous syncopations of the minuet; the four-subject chromatic fugue that constitutes the finale.

There were elements in the performance that were fiddleristic rather than Haydnesque, but the playing for the most part was understanding, lively, and effective.

The Bartok began insipidly. the broadcast, beginning at The players made little of the tempo shifts in the first part and there was more streamlining than sharp definition.

The performance became more incisive as it went on and, in its own urbane way, made a good effect.

It was well played, sounded carefully prepared, and some details gave special pleasure, among them the astonishingly smooth, yet intense, second violin trill that starts the Allegro.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
DEC 25 1966

Chamber Music on January 4

New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the program for the second concert of the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series which is being held this season at Jordan Hall, under the joint sponsorship of the two institutions.

The second concert, to take place Wednesday, Jan. 4, will feature the Boston Symphony String Quartet, the quartet-in-residence at the conservatory. Gino Cioffi, principal clarinet of the orchestra, will join them in the concluding number. The members of the quartet are Joseph Silverstein, violin, George Zazofsky, violin, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello.

THEIR PROGRAM will open the Haydn String Quartet in C major, and continue with Bartok's String Quartet No. 3. After an intermission Mr. Cioffi will join them for a performance of the Mozart Quintet in A major for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581.

The remaining programs in the series will feature the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Feb. 8, the Boston Symphony String Quartet March 8, and the Chamber Players March 29 with Claude Frank, Guest Pianist. Tickets for all the remaining concerts are available at the Jordan Hall box office, KE 6-2412.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 105,712
DEC 4 1966

Boston Symphony Players To Appear At UMP Today

The Boston Symphony Players will perform at Luther Bonney Hall Auditorium, University of Maine in Portland, at 2:30 p.m. today, in a concert of rare music. The group will be assisted by Luise Vosgerchian, widely known concert pianist, who has been a guest soloist with the Boston Symphony more than 25 times.

All the players are section leaders of the Boston Symphony, and since their formal organization more than a year ago have traveled all over the United States in scores of appearances.

Included in the virtuoso group are Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO; Burton Fine, first viola; Jules Eskin, principal cello; Sherman Walt, first bassoon, and Ralph Gomberg, principal oboist.

The program will open with Zachau's Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, followed by Schubert's Trio No. 1 in B Flat for violin, viola, and cello. Poulenc's Trio for oboe, bassoon, and piano will then be performed and after intermission the Boston Players String Trio will play Beethoven's Trio No. 1 in E Flat, Opus 3.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407
JAN 30 1967

Players and Miss Price Both Great

Two concerts of equal artistic merit contrasted sharply in the size of the audiences they drew to Constitution Hall yesterday.

In the afternoon, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players gave a magnificent recital to under 1000. In the evening, all 3800 seats were filled for Metropolitan Opera soprano Leontyne Price's recital.

The name "Boston Symphony" is no slouch at the box office but "chamber players" seems to have had a chilling effect.

Unfortunately, because those who attended heard near perfect performances of the Beethoven Quintet in E-flat Major for piano and woodwinds, Op. 16; the Spohr Nonet, and Faure's vibrant Piano Quartet in C Minor.

Miss Price, who has sung here many times, seemed to reach new heights yesterday.

After the first aria, "Care selve" from Handel's "Atalanta," the applause was warm and sustained. But after the second — "Dove sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" — the shouting began.

With Schumann, Weber and the rest, it developed into the greatest ovation a singer has received here since Maria Callas came to Constitution Hall. In Miss Price's case it was even more richly deserved.

MILTON BERLINER

Chamber Concert On Feb. 8

The program has been announced for the next concert in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series, which is presented jointly this season by the New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be given in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, Feb. 8, by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Prokofiev's Quintet Op. 39 for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola, and bass will open the Feb. 8 program, to be followed by Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings (1959).

After the intermission the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform Gunther Schuller's "Lifelines." Mr. Schuller is president-elect of the New England Conservatory. The concert will conclude with Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E-flat, Op. 3.

Tickets for this concert are now available at the Jordan Hall box office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838
DEC 21 1966

Chamber Music

The Boston Symphony String Quartet will give its second New England Conservatory concert Wednesday evening, Jan. 4, with the orchestra's Gino Cioffi as guest artist in the Mozart Clarinet Quintet, K. 571. The program also includes the C major Haydn String Quartet and Bartok's String Quartet No. 3.

The remaining programs in the series at Jordan Hall will feature the Boston Symphony Chamber Players Feb. 8, the Boston Symphony String Quartet March 8, and the Chamber Players March 29 with Claude Frank, guest pianist.

197

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 44,619
DEC 17 1966

Music

Met. National Cancels Country-Wide Tour

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Unfortunate news on the musical front this week was contained in an announcement to the effect that the Metropolitan National company has cancelled its country-wide tour.

The tremendous work put in to the project that was launched last season, and seemed certain to realize an excellent second season, by Miss Rise Stevens, co-manager of the company and her dedicated associates, has apparently been wasted. The many, many musicians concerned, especially the young singers whose association meant an opportunity to gain priceless experience in the operatic field, must now turn to other points of musical interest in which they may continue their careers.

Rise Stevens

An optimistic note was sounded however, in the statement that whenever the opportunity arises, the company will be re-organized to full scale, and schedules as planned and listed will again be in order.

The chamber music series being sponsored jointly by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the New England Conservatory of Music will be continued when the second program in the 1966-67 series is presented in Jordan Hall at the Conservatory on Wednesday evening, Jan. 4.

Featured will be the Boston Symphony String quartet, currently serving as resident group at the school. Joining regular members of the Quartet will be Gino Cioffi, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony. Players in the Quartet include, Joseph Silverstein (BSO Concertmaster), violinist; George Zazofsky, violinist; Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Kanin, cellist.

THE PROGRAM will include the Haydn String Quartet in C major, Bartok's String Quartet No. 3, and with Mr. Cioffi as assisting artist, the A Major Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581, by Mozart.

Other concerts in this series will be held on Feb. 8, March 8 and 29. In the concert of March 29, the noted young American pianist, Claude Frank will be guest artist.

Aaron Copland and Hans Werner Henze will be composers-in-residence for Dartmouth College's fifth annual Congregation of the Arts next summer.

Mario di Bonaventure, director of music for the Hopkins Center and summer music program, announced that the guest composer-teachers would conduct, lecture and supervise performances of their works during their two-week stay at Dartmouth.

Mr. Henze will be coming directly from Europe where his recent operas, "The Young Lord" and "The Bassarids" (1966 Salzburg Festival) secured his position among today's foremost opera composers.

The Concord orchestra, under the direction of Attilio Poto, will present the annual Young Artists concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 15, in the Concord-Carlisle high school, Concord.

Soloists for the concert will be announced at a later date by the music director.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 51,098
DEC 31 1966

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tues. at 8:30:
Erich Leinsdorf leads the BSO in an all-Beethoven program: the Overture to "Coriolan," Op. 62; Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Op. 60, and Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
Fri. at 2: Leinsdorf conducts Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser"; Carter's Piano Concerto, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95. Pianist Jacob Lateiner is soloist in the Carter work. Repeat performance Sat. at 8:30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING QUARTET
The BSO group, quartet-in-residence of the New England Conservatory, offers the second program in a five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music series, sponsored jointly by the Conservatory and the Orchestra, at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday in Jordan Hall. Gino Cioffi, the BSO's principal clarinetist, will be soloist in Mozart's Quintet in A major for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581. Also on the program is Haydn's Quartet in C major, Op. 20, No. 2, and Bartok's Quartet No. 3.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
DEC 1966

Opera/Concert Calendar

COMPILED BY RALPH AND OLGA LEWANDO

Jan.

KEY

BO	Brooklyn Acad.—Opera House	LM	Library & Museum, Lincoln Center	(s)	soloists	fl	flutist
BM	Brooklyn Acad.—Music Hall	M	Metropolitan Opera House	b	baritone	g	guitarist
C	Carnegie Hall	N	New York City Center	bs	bass	h	harp
CR	Carnegie Recital Hall	NS	N. Y. State Theater	bn	bassoon	hc	harpsichord
EL	Eisner & Lubin Auditorium, Loeb Student Center, NYU	P	Philharmonic Hall	co	contralto	l	lute
HA	Hunter College Assembly Hall	PB	Parke-Bernet Galleries	c	cellist	m	mezzo-soprano
HP	Hunter College Playhouse	PI	Hotel Pierre Roof Garden	cl	clarinet	n	narrator
J	Judson Hall	Q	Queens College	cs	coloratura soprano	o	organist
K	Theresa L. Kaufmann Concert Hall	R	Grace Rainey Rogers Auditorium	d	dance	ob	oboe
		T	Town Hall	f	folk singer	dp	duo-pianists
		V	Vanderbilt Hall, NYU

p	pianist
r	recorder
s	soprano
t	tenor
tm	timpanist
tp	trumpet
v	violinist
va	viola
vg	virginal

SUNDAY, JAN. 22
C Amer. Symph. Orch., Kletzki —3:00
C America-Israel Fdn., benefit concer —8:30
CR Cornelia de Roode, s —2:30
CR Carl Eberl, va —5:30
CR Hilda Harris, ms —8:30
K Yuriko, d —2:30
LM Nina Dova, s-g —2:30
N "Traviata" in English —8:00
N "La Boheme" in English —8:00
NS Ballet —1:15 & 7:15
P Jewish Cultural Clubs & Soc., Concert —2:00
PB Boston Symph. Cham. Players —4:00
Q Beaux Arts Trio —4:00

MONDAY, JAN. 23
C Amer. Symph. Orch., Kletzki —8:30
HP Early Music Quartet —8:40
M "La Boheme" —8:00

TUESDAY, JAN. 24
C Natl. Orch. Assn., Barnett —8:30
M "Peter Grimes" —8:00
P Phila. Orch., (Kertesz) —8:30
T Clarion Concert, Jenkins: (s) B. Allen, H. Cuenod, A. Darling, H. Rehfuss, H. Vanni; A. Fuller, hc —8:30

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 25
C Wilfred Joseph's "Requiem," Cincinnati Symph., Rudolf —8:30
J "Barber of Seville" —8:30
K Paul Sanasardo, d —8:30
LM Robert Menga, v; Louis Persinger, p —6:00
M "Il Trovatore" —8:00
P Boston Symph. Orch., Leinsdorf —8:30
T Esterhazy Orch., Blum; S. Gildberg, v —8:30

THURSDAY, JAN. 26
BO Boston Symph. Orch., Kubelik —8:30
C Wilfred Joseph's "Requiem," Cincinnati Symph., Rudolf —8:30
CR Fritz Jahoda, p —8:30
LM N.Y. Wind Soc. —6:00
LM David & Anna Anton, p & c —6:00
M "Tristan und Isolde" —8:00
N "La Boheme" —8:00
NS Ballet —8:15
P N.Y. Phil., Steinberg; Z. Francescatti, v —8:30

FRIDAY, JAN. 27
C Artur Rubinstein, p —8:30
HA I Musici —8:30
LM Fitzroy Davis —6:00
LM David & Anna Anton, c & p —6:00
M "Lohengrin" —8:00
N "Marriage of Figaro" —8:00
NS Ballet —8:15
P N.Y. Phil., Steinberg; Z. Francescatti, v —2:15
P Boston Symph. Orch., Leinsdorf —8:30
PI Operalogue, C. Longone —11:00 a.m.
T Beaux Arts Quartet —8:30
V Bartok Quartet —8:30

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JAN 1967

Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, offers ten concerts at Symphony Hall (CO 6-1492) in January: Friday afternoon (2 p.m.) and Saturday evening (8:30 p.m.) performances on January 6-7, 13-14, and 20-21; Tuesday evening concerts at 8:30 p.m. on January 3, 17, and 31, and at 7:30 p.m. on January 10. An open rehearsal is scheduled for Thursday, January 12 at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concerts on January 3, 6, and 7. Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor for the January 10 concert and Rafael Kukelik will conduct concerts for the rest of the month beginning January 13. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist with the orchestra, will be soloist at the January 6-7 concerts.

Chamber Music

Boston Symphony String Quartet appears in the Boston Symphony Chamber Series at Jordan Hall, 30 Gainsboro Street (KE 6-2412) on Wednesday, January 4 at 8:30 p.m. The quartet includes four BSO musicians in residence at New England Conservatory: Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello. Assisted by Gino Cioffi, they will offer Haydn "Quartet in C major," Bartok "Quartet #3," and Mozart "Quintet in A major."

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
JAN 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Chamber Concert On Feb. 8

The program has been announced for the next concert in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series, which is presented jointly this season by the New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be given in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, Feb. 8, by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Prokofiev's Quintet Op. 39 for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola, and bass will open the Feb. 8 program, to be followed by Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings (1959).

After the intermission the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform Gunther Schuller's "Lifelines." Mr. Schuller is president-elect of the New England Conservatory. The concert will conclude with Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E-flat, Op. 3.

Tickets for this concert are now available at the Jordan Hall box office.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
JAN 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Chamber Players To Give Concert

Four works will make up the Feb. 8 concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall.

Performed by principals in the orchestra, the program will open with Prokofiev's Quintet, Op. 39, for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola, and bass. Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings (1959) will follow the Prokofiev.

After intermission the ensemble will play "Lifelines," by Gunther Schuller, president-elect of the New England Conservatory. The conservatory is co-sponsor with the orchestra of this series of concerts. The program will close with Beethoven's String Trio No. 1, in E flat, Op. 3.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
JAN 5 1967

Quartet in Lively Performance

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The Boston Symphony String Quartet (Joseph Silverstein, George Zazofsky, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin) gave a concert in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series at Jordan Hall Wednesday night, the program being Hayden's Quartet in C, Op. 20, No. 4, Bartok's Quartet No. 3, and, with Gino Cioffi, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet.

Our special gratitude goes to the group for finding a Haydn quartet that is one of his richest and most fascinating, and yet one that the concert-going public almost never gets to hear. It is lushy scored and at the same time extremely concentrated in substance.

It is a work full of special fancies: the mellow Schubertian harmonies of the first movement's second theme; the Adagio, a fantasy in character, with its powerful unison proclamations; the sinuous syncopations of the minuet; the four-subject chromatic fugue that constitutes the finale.

There were elements in the performance that were fiddleristic rather than Haydnesque, but the playing for the most part was understanding, lively, and effective.

The Bartok began insipidly. the broadcast, beginning at The players made little of the tempo shifts in the first part and there was more streamlining than sharp definition.

The performance became more incisive as it went on and, in its own urbane way, made a good effect.

It was well played, sounded carefully prepared, and some details gave special pleasure, among them the astonishingly smooth, yet intense, second violin trill that starts the Allegro.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407
JAN 30 1967

Players and Miss Price Both Great

Two concerts of equal artistic merit contrasted sharply in the size of the audiences they drew to Constitution Hall yesterday.

In the afternoon, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players gave a magnificient recital to under 1000. In the evening, all 3800 seats were filled for Metropolitan Opera soprano Leontyne Price's recital.

The name "Boston Symphony" is no slouch at the box office but "chamber players" seems to have had a chilling effect.

Unfortunately, because those who attended heard near perfect performances of the Beethoven Quintet in E-flat Major for piano and woodwinds, Op. 16; the Spohr Nonet, and Faure's vibrant Piano Quartet in C Minor.

Miss Price, who has sung here many times, seemed to reach new heights yesterday.

After the first aria, "Care selve" from Handel's "Atalanta," the applause was warm and sustained. But after the second — "Dove sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" — the shouting began.

With Schumann, Weber and the rest, it developed into the greatest ovation a singer has received here since Maria Callas came to Constitution Hall. In Miss Prince's case it was even more richly deserved.

MILTON BERLINER

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838
DEC 21 1966

Chamber Music

The Boston Symphony String Quartet will give its second New England Conservatory concert Wednesday evening, Jan. 4, with the orchestra's Gino Cioffi as guest artist in the Mozart Clarinet, Quintet, K. 571. The program also includes the C major Haydn String Quartet and Bartok's String Quartet No. 3.

The remaining programs in the series at Jordan Hall will feature the Boston Symphony Chamber Players Feb. 8, the Boston Symphony String Quartet March 8, and the Chamber Players March 29 with Claude Frank, guest pianist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 105,712
DEC 4 1966

Boston Symphony Players To Appear At UMP Today

The Boston Symphony Players will perform at Luther Bonney Hall Auditorium, University of Maine in Portland, at 2:30 p.m. today, in a concert of rare music. The group will be assisted by Luise Vosgerchian, widely known concert pianist, who has been a guest soloist with the Boston Symphony more than 25 times.

All the players are section leaders of the Boston Symphony and since their formal organization more than a year ago have traveled all over the United States in scores of appearances.

Included in the virtuoso group are Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO; Burton Fine, first viola; Jules Eskin, principal cello; Sherman Walt, first bassoon, and Ralph Gomberg, principal oboist.

The program will open with Zachau's Trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, followed by Schubert's Trio No. 1 in B Flat for violin, viola, and cello. Poulenc's Trio for oboe, bassoon, and piano will then be performed and after intermission the Boston Players String Trio will play Beethoven's Trio No. 1 in E Flat, Opus 3.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
DEC 25 1966

Chamber Music on January 4

New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the program for the second concert of the five-concert Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series which is being held this season at Jordan Hall, under the joint sponsorship of the two institutions.

The second concert, to take place Wednesday, Jan. 4, will feature the Boston Symphony String Quartet, the quartet-in-residence at the conservatory. Gino Cioffi, principal clarinet of the orchestra, will join them in the concluding number. The members of the quartet are Joseph Silverstein, violin, George Zazofsky, violin, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello.

THEIR PROGRAM will open the Haydn String Quartet in C major, and continue with Bartok's String Quartet No. 3. After an intermission Mr. Cioffi will join them for a performance of the Mozart Quintet in A major for Clarinet and Strings, K. 581.

The remaining programs in the series will feature the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Feb. 8, the Boston Symphony String Quartet March 8, and the Chamber Players March 29 with Claude Frank, Guest Pianist. Tickets for all the remaining concerts are available at the Jordan Hall box office, KE 6-2412.

WASHINGTON POST (m)
WASHINGTON, D. C.
CIRC. 444,400

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

JAN 30 1967 New England Newsclip JAN 30 1967

9 Boston Symphony Members Play Well in Dull Program

By Alan M. Kriegsman

The Boston Symphony is one of the sovereign orchestras of the world. Some of its principal members have formed themselves into a group called the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. They displayed excellent mettle at Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon, in a Washington debut concert.

There are nine players in all: violinist Joseph Silverstein (Boston Symphony concertmaster), violist Burton Fine, cellist Jules Eskin, bass player Henry Portnoi, flutist Doriot Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinettist Gino Cioffi, bassoonist Sherman Walt, French horn player James Stagliano, and noted pianist Claude Frank. Each is a master instrumentalist, and together they exhibited the same style, dexterity and discrimination they command as individuals.

Too bad their program was not more enticing. True, it is not easy to assemble solid and diversified fare that would give these musicians each an equal share in the proceedings. Even so, their offerings —Beethoven's E Flat Major Piano Quintet, Op. 16, the Spohr Nonet, and Faure's C Minor Piano Quartet—were disappointing. Only the Faure has genuine distinction, and at that it is too rambling to relieve the tedium of the other pieces. Why nothing contemporary? Twentieth century musical literature is richer than that of any other era in varied ensemble works.

The Beethoven Quintet, written in the composer's earliest Vienna years, is a piece no one would give a second glance if it did not have a magic signature.

It's competent enough but, let's face it, dull. The themes are undistinguished, and it is full of that transitional spaghetti the composers of the era manufactured to get from one musical paragraph to another. The chief melody of the Andante begins as if it were going to turn into Zerlina's aria "Batti, batti," from "Don Giovanni." Unfortunately, it doesn't. The finale, a hunting-call rondo, is no less pedestrian.

The Spohr Nonet gets performed, not because of its composer, but because of the oddity of its scoring. It has some harmless, pleasant tunes, but they are treated without imagination. The Scherzo, for example, with the double bass introducing the theme, promises much but never delivers. The work ends with one of those repetitive, imbecilic rondos that makes you want to beg for mercy. Only the Adagio is worth the trouble, and the concert finally came to life here in the loveliness of its contemplative melancholy.

The passionate sweep of the Faure Quartet was a tremendous relief. The Bostonians took the Scherzo a mite too fast for its gentle whimsy. Otherwise, the performance was first class. Again, the slow movement, a wintry Adagio, was the best, and the players made the most of its stoically borne griefs.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

FEB 4 1967 New England Newsclip

Plans Change In Program

The New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Orchestra announce a program change for the concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening. Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B flat will be performed instead of Gunther Schuller's "Lifelines."

The complete program includes the Schubert trio, Prokofiev's Quintet for Oboe, Clarinet, Violin, Viola and Bass, Op 39; Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and String Trio (1959); and Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E flat, Op. 3.

Tickets are available at the Jordan Hall box office, or by calling KE 6-2412.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850

FEB 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Chamber Players' Program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

One problem the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will in time have to do away with is their tendency to put together programs that are unsubstantial, unfocussed, and unintegrated.

What they played Wednesday night at Jordan Hall is a fair example.

They began with a movement for string trio by Schubert and ended with Beethoven's String Trio in E flat, Op. 3; between came Prokofiev's Quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola, and bass, Op. 39, and a Concertino for bassoon and strings, written in 1959 by a certain Coker about whom neither memory nor the file reveals anything.

The Prokofiev is a rather infrequently heard, ballet-derived score from the 1920s. An example of his wry, somewhat squawky manner, it is an engaging enough piece that makes inventive use of the unusual ensemble.

It would, in some other context, make a pleasant diversion, though it will hardly serve as piece de resistance as it was expected to at this concert.

The Coker is lame, and mercifully short. It hasn't an arresting musical idea in it. The writing for the instruments, full of lazy octave doublings, is competent but by no means interesting.

The performers, which were very good, were played by Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, cello, Henry Portnoi, bass, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, and Sherman Walt, bassoon.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508

JAN 5 1967

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 116,000

JAN 29 1967 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music

Colin Davis, principal conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at next weekend's concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon (Feb. 3) at 2 p. m. and Saturday evening (Feb. 4) at 8.30 p. m.

Another Concert

The orchestra will be heard in one other concert this week, the fifth program of the "Cambridge" series, Tuesday evening at 8.30 p. m. at which Rafael Kubelik will conclude his present engagement as guest conductor.

Televised Show

The Tuesday evening concert will be televised and broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-TV, Channel 2, and WGBH-FM. Mr. Kubelik will begin his program with Haydn's Symphony No. 102 and continue with Martinu's Double Concerto for Two String Orchestras, Piano and Timpani, with Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson at the piano.

After an intermission the program will conclude with the Franck Symphony in D minor.

Selected Program

Mr. Davis has selected a program which will begin with Berlioz' Overture to "King Lear," Op. 4, and continue with the Symphony in Three Movements by Stravinsky. After intermission the concert will close with Dvorak Symphony No. 7 in D minor. Op. 70.

Mr. Davis was born in Weybridge, Surrey, in 1927, and has rapidly become one of the leading British conductors. In a comparatively short space of time he has conducted most of the principal orchestras of Great Britain, and has also made regular appearances on the Continent.

He is well known for his performances at Glyndebourne, where he produced apart from the regular repertoire, such works as "Adriadne auf Naxos," Janacek's "Cunning Little Vixen," and Stravinsky's "The Rake's Progress."

In addition to his activities at the Opera, he has found time for recordings and concerts with all the leading British orchestras.

In 1965 he was appointed Principal Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, becoming the youngest conductor ever to hold this post.

Other Music Series

Concerts are scheduled shortly in two additional music series being sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Third Program

The third program in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series, which is presented jointly with the New England Conservatory, will take place Wednesday evening, Feb. 8, at 8.30 p. m. in Jordan Hall.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will play a program consisting of Prokofiev's Op. 39 Quintet for oboe, clarinet, violin, viola and bass; Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and String Trio (1959); Gunther Schuller's "Lifelines," for flute, clarinet, bassoon, horn, viola, cello, bass and percussion; and Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E-flat, Op. 3.

Chamber Players

The Chamber Players who will take part in this program are Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; and Everett Firth, timpani. Tickets are now available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

Three Concerts

The first of a series of three Symphony Hall Organ Concerts will take place in Symphony Hall Sunday, Feb. 19 at 8.30 p. m.

The full length program will be played by E. Power Briggs, assisted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor. Series tickets are now available at the Symphony Hall Box Office.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100

FEB 26 1967 New England Newsclip

String Quartet Delays Recital

The Boston Symphony String Quartet has postponed its concert of March 8 in Jordan Hall until Wednesday, April 19. All tickets for March 8 in the Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series will be honored on April 19.

The next concert in the series, which is being sponsored jointly by the New England Conservatory and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be Wednesday, March 29, by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, whose program will consist of Mozart's Piano Trio, K. 542; Samuel Barber's Summer Music for Woodwind quintet; and the Schubert "Trout" Quintet, Op. 114. Claude Frank will be guest pianist.

Haydn, Mozart, Bartok

BSO String Quartet Concert

By McLAREN HARRIS
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony String Quartet assembled for its season's first concert Wednesday night at Jordan Hall with an offering of Haydn, Bartok and Mozart—and for men whose principal occupation is heading sections of a 100-odd piece orchestra, as an ensemble they play very well ideed.

Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello, are the members, and melodists every one. Haydn and Mozart flow easily through their fingers and across their bows, each classic phrase done with a single feeling and each cadence a common conclusion; the balance of tone and volume, again, was sensitively handled.

No Big Hurry

Haydn's C major, No. 2 of the "Sun" quartets, benefitted particularly from this approach, with its dialogue between cello and first violin in the opening Moderato and the sustained, opulent timbres of the following Adagio. The concluding Fuga retained its vertical clarity throughout; fortunately, the Symphony players stopped short of a complete headlong rush in the final bars.

Of course, when speaking of Bartok, an ensemble inevitably runs afoul of comparisons with Juilliard, whose interpretations of the Hungarian composer's six quartets are still widely recognized as the standard. The Symphony quartet's reading of Bartok's No. 3 was decidedly energetic, fully purposeful, and the smoothness of the string response contributed to its appeal.

There was a diminished internal transparence due to the latter, however, which stands against the Juilliard's tensile, highly-focused tonal characteristic and resultant clear textures; also, the lack of a career quartet's final word in pinpoint rhythmic accuracy stole some of the players' potential for lucid contrast of volume and tempo. Yet the opening Moderato, its recapitulation and the final coda were authoritative beyond our expectations.

The Mozart work was the A major Clarinet Quintet, for which Gino Cioffi assisted. Mr Cioffi is a genius at delivering delectable phrases with delicate dynamic contour and gentle release; he is also a technical wizard. Lamentably, his intonation was inclined to wander, mostly on the flat side, and it hurt Mozart considerably. The Menuetto and Allegretto variations picked up in mood, as their continuous motion released the clarinettist from the burden of long, grueling lines. Two movements, after all, are better than none.

The Program:

The Boston Symphony String Quartet, consisting of Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello, presented a program Wednesday night at Jordan Hall. Gino Cioffi, clarinet, assisted for the Mozart work.

Quarter in C major, Op. 20, No. 2 ..... Haydn
Quartet No. ..... Bartok
Clarinet Quintet in A major, K. 581 ..... Mozart

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Circ. 422,145

JAN 22 1967

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, made up of first-chair instrumentalists from the Boston Symphony, will make their Washington debut next Sunday at 3 p.m. in Constitution Hall. Their program is listed on Page G10.

199.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
FEB 9 1967
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Trios For Epicures

By Peter M. Knapp

Working together for a few years makes a difference. It was evident in last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Jordan Hall, most of all in the two string trios which began and ended the program.

Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B-flat provided a tasty hors d'oeuvre: delicate, refined, a soft miniature. The final course was more robust material — Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E-flat, Opus 3.

The players in both were Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violist Burton Fine and cellist Jules Eskin. Their Beethoven was extraordinary; in fact, probably the finest effort in trio playing these three artists have achieved in Boston.

Perfect Match

Both strength and grace had their share in this beautifully-matched ensemble. Silverstein spun light melodic lines that had uncommon suppleness, and produced dazzling effects of technical agility; Fine contributed marvelous body to the group; Eskin modulated his cello to perfectly blend and provide the vital underpinning. It was one of those performances in which everything seemed to go right, and it is good to hear this ensemble play with such fluency and spirit.

Music for winds and strings formed the middle of the program, and both were 20th century compositions: Prokofiev's Quintet for Oboe, Clarinet, Violin, Viola and Bass, Opus 39, written in 1924, and Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings, dating from 1959.

The Prokofiev is a tough challenge, alternately witty, spiky, eccentric, in the composer's quicksilver manner. It explores the various sonorities of these instruments in an original way, sometimes to the point of being grotesque. The string effects by themselves could form a catalogue of possible ways to get different sounds — from the wry glissandi in the mid-section of the first movement to the later tremolos played near the bridge and even to harmonics for the bass.

Joining Silverstein and Fine here were oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinetist Gino Cioffi and bassist Henry Portnoi. While their playing was capable enough, it also seemed overly-cautious, not completely idiomatic for Prokofiev, lacking the bounce and sense of abandon that gives the piece its vitality.

For the Coker, the string trio was joined by bassoonist Sherman Walt — who got a workout. Coker sends the bassoon to the extremes of its range — way down, way up and along all the way stations. The strings, which boldly launch the concertino with a sharp unison, are used variously — as a mass or in jagged counterpoint. What the work did establish was Walt's virtuosity on his instrument, which seldom has the opportunity to demonstrate such versatility.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
MAR 19 1967
New England Newsclip

Claude Frank Will Join Chamber Concert March 29

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players give their third program of the New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series on Wednesday evening, March 29. For this concert the Chamber Players will be joined by pianist Claude Frank. Also performing in the Jordan Hall concert will be Lois Schaefer, flute, and Henry Portnoi, bass.

The March 29 concert will open with Mozart's Piano Trio in E major, K. 542. Miss Schaefer, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, Sherman Walt, Bassoon, and James Stagliano, French horn, will perform Samuel Barber's Summer Music, and the concert will conclude with Shubert's well known "Trout" Quintet in A major, Op. 114. Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, cello, and Messrs. Portnoi and Frank will be heard in the "Trout" Quintet.

This program at the Conservatory's Jordan Hall will be the Boston Symphony Chamber Players last Boston appearance prior to their departure on an eight week trip abroad. The tour includes several weeks in the Soviet Union in addition to concerts in West Germany and London.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900
MAR 17 1967

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS (3 LPs; RCA Victor) have recorded with zest and polish an evening of music ranging in time from Mozart's sunny, transparent Quartet in D for Flute and Strings to the late Irving Fine's romantic and unsettling Fantasia for String Trio (1957). Most fetching of the four contemporary works is Elliott Carter's Woodwind Quintet, with its light melodic fragments breezily tossed and tangled like crepe-paper streamers.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
MAR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

Chamber Group Greets Summer

By Dorothy Newell

It might have been an impromptu summer rehearsal on Claude Frank's patio (if he has one), with good fun, good fellowship, good music. For although the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston Symphony Orchestra co-sponsored last night's performance of the Symphony's chamber players, the pianist was obviously the host.

He played the part with verve and good humor, at the same time turning in an excellent performance — and all the while he was the guest performer.

Frank brings concert piano to the Chamber Players, only three years old and just coming into their own. He performed last night with violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist, Jules Eskin, in Mozart's Piano Trio in E major, K. 542.

For the final work, they were joined by Burton Fine, viola and Henry Portoni, bass, for Schubert's Quintet in A major for Violin, Viola, Cello, Bass and Piano, Opus 114 ("Trout").

One wanted to applaud after each of the five movements, from Allegro vivace to Andante with its softest of tones; the spirited Scherzo: Presto; the extravagant Andantino with improvised theme, and the finale, Allegro giusto. No interruptions, but the group was called back to the stage for bows again and again.

The oboe must be called the solo instrument in Barber's "Summer Music (1956)" performed by five other Symphony principals, Lois Schaefer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, bassoon; Gino Cioffi French horn; Sherman Walt, clarinet, and James Stagliano, oboe.

Traditional Yet Modern

Barber's work hints of other summers, while at the same time implementing the new dissonant sounds in staccato echoes and a tempo erratic enough for a whimsical breeze or a swallow's flight.

The Chamber Players developed from informal after-hours rehearsals among orchestra fellows. They played both for relaxation and for challenge.

Their forerunner is the Boston Symphony String Quartet, a faculty quartet-in-residence at New England Conservatory, which has sponsored many public performances in the Boston area.

Established in 1964, the Chamber Players have appeared in Boston and New York, and last Spring completed a transcontinental tour. They cut a record album last fall which was released by RCA Victor.

Last night's concert, held in Jordan Hall instead of out in a summer evening as it may have seemed, was a prelude to a second overseas tour. The group is scheduled for performances in European Countries and Russia.

The Chamber Players should have a fine reception. They are at ease with each other and with their music.

They maintain such rapport with the audience that you might expect Frank or Silverstein at any moment to stop playing and say to the others — "Let's try it from pianissimo again" — and no one would feel offended. Only it wouldn't happen, the Chamber Players are just that good.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAR 13 1967
New England Newsclip

Symphony Chamber Players To Tour

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside this country since their formation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees three years ago.

The eight week trip, under the auspices of the U.S. Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union and West Germany.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

Ensemble Not Effective

By RENA FRUCHTER

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players present themselves as a highly professional group, yet much of what was heard in Jordan Hall last night seemed like a slightly polished run-through. There was some fine solo work from most of the individuals involved, but little effective ensemble playing.

The difficulties faced by the Chamber Players were exhibited in the opening Mozart Piano Trio in E Major, K. 542. The technical aspects of the trio were handled quite well. Dynamic markings were carefully observed. But there was little unity in regard to phrasing or overall structure. The consistency with which subtle and even obvious changes of harmony were ignored was a clear indication the form of the work had not been carefully thought out. The work moved well from phrase to phrase, but each passage was given little function in the work as a whole.

Aboist Ralph Gomberg provided some excellent passages in the Barber Summer Music, but here again, except in rare moments, performance was little more than an adequate reading of the notes.

The Schubert "Trout" Quintet also lacked structural unity, and themes often got buried in the process, but the performance as a whole was much more successful that the works on the first half of the program. There was a great deal of enthusiasm, particularly in the Allegro Vivace and the Scherzo, and this kept the performance from becoming dull.

The Program

Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented a program in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, March 29.

Piano Trio in E Major, K. 542 — Mozart
Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, Claude Frank.

Summer Music (1956) — Barber
Lois Schaefer, Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Sherman Walt, James Stagliano.

Quintet in A Major for Violin, Viola, Cello, Bass and Piano, Op. 114 ("Trout") — Schubert
Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin, Henry Portnoi, Claude Frank.

TIME (e)
GREENWICH, CONN.
CIRC. 11,850
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Music Concert

The final Parke-Bernet concert this season of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be held Sunday, April 16, at 8 p.m.

Performing Schubert's "Trout" Quintet and String Trio No. 3 in B flat and Barber's "Summer Music," will be Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Richard Goode, piano; Henry Portnoy, double bass; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn, and Louis Schaefer, flute. Concert tickets are available through Parke-Bernet.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
MAR 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Busy Week for Symphony

The Boston Symphony will be all over town this week. Players in various combinations will perform in Symphony and Jordan Halls, the Somerset Hotel and Back Bay Theater.

The full orchestra's Friday-Saturday program will be preceded Thursday evening by an open rehearsal. For this trio of concerts, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct works by five composers: Haydn's D major Symphony No. 13, a new version of Schuller's Diptych, "Til Ewlenspiegel" by Strauss, Webern's Five Pieces and Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird." Much of this repertoire will be taken by the orchestra on its two-week tour, Apr. 3-15.

Tuesday evening, the orchestra will repeat the Mozart-Bruckner program of last week. Evelyne Crochet will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 456. The concert will open with Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and close with the Bruckner Symphony No. 9.

the 8:30 concert.

Three chamber groups will be active. Monday evening will find costumed players at the Somerset Hotel in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. Also at the $5.5 million fund drive dinner, Boston Symphony trustees, conducted by Pres. Henry B. Cabot, will essay Leopold Mozart's "Toy Symphony." This program will be seen, beginning at 9, on Ch 2 and WGBH-FM.

Meanwhile, Monday in Symphony Hall, the second organ concert will take place. E. Power Biggs and a B.S.O. chamber group conducted by Charles Wilson will perform. The program lists Corelli's C major Concerto, Vivaldi's A minor Concerto, Handel's C major Concerto, Hindemith's Sonata No. 2, Piston's Prelude and Allegro and "Festival" Sonatas by Mozart.

Wednesday will find the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall and their colleagues at the Back Bay Theater for "The Rake's Progress" by Stravinsky. The Chamber Players will spend May giving concerts in London, Germany and the Soviet Union. The program in Jordan Hall will be made up of Mozart's Piano Trio, K. 542, Summer Music by Samuel Barber, and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet. The pianist will be Claude Frank.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800
MAR 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Group to Tour

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make an eight-week tour abroad this spring, the first foreign tour since its formation three years ago.

The trip, under the auspices of the United States Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union, and West Germany.

The Chamber Players' first tour, last spring, consisted of concerts and master classes presented in the United States.

The group is scheduled to leave Boston April 29.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
MAR 11 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Chamber Players Will Tour Europe, USSR

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside this country, since the formation of the group by the orchestra's trustees three years ago.

U. S. to Sponsor

The eight-week trip abroad, under the auspices of the Department of State's cultural presentations program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union, and West Germany. Their first tour in the spring of 1966 consisted of concerts and master classes across the United States.

Present plans call for the players to leave Boston April 29 with the first concerts taking place in London. The major portion of the tour is scheduled for the Soviet Union where the players will be from May 3 through June 9. Following their final appearance in that country, they will concertize for several days in West Germany, before returning to Boston June 16.

It is expected that in addition to their concerts the members will be available for demonstrations and lectures in music schools and conservatories in some of the tour cities. In anticipation of their visit to the USSR the individual players have been taking Russian lessons during the winter.

The variety of instrumentation among the Chamber Players enables them to draw from the broadest range of the chamber music repertoire, and in addition to the more standard chamber music compositions, the players are able to offer music less often heard in chamber music concerts. This spring's tour will include a composition by an American composer in each program.

Members who will take part in the tour are: Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Everett Firth, tympani; all principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Also from the orchestra will be Lois Schaefer, flute, and Henry Portnoi, bass. The young American pianist Richard Goode will join the players for this tour.

On March 2 at the annual awards dinner of the National Academy of Recording Artists and Sciences, the Chamber Players received a Grammy Award in the category of best chamber music performance for their first RCA Victor recording released last year.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO Group Plans First Foreign Tour

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside of this country, since the formation of the group by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees three years ago. The eight-week trip abroad, under the auspices of the U.S. Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union and West Germany.

London First

Present plans call for the Chamber Players to leave Boston on April 29, with the first concerts taking place in London. The major portion of the tour is scheduled for the Soviet Union, from May 3 to June 9. Following their final appearance in that country, the Players will concertize for several days in West Germany, prior to returning to Boston on June 16.

The members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players who will take part in the tour are Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO: Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Everett Firth, tympani; all principal players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

199.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
FEB 9 1967
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Trios For Epicures

By Peter M. Knapp

Working together for a few years makes a difference. It was evident in last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Jordan Hall, most of all in the two string trios which began and ended the program.

Schubert's String Trio No. 1 in B-flat provided a tasty hors d'oeuvre: delicate, refined, a soft miniature. The final course was more robust material — Beethoven's String Trio No. 1 in E-flat, Opus 3.

The players in both were Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violist Burton Fine and cellist Jules Eskin. Their Beethoven was extraordinary; in fact, probably the finest effort in trio playing these three artists have achieved in Boston.

Perfect Match

Both strength and grace had their share in this beautifully-matched ensemble. Silverstein spun light melodic lines that had uncommon suppleness, and produced dazzling effects of technical agility; Fine contributed marvelous body to the group; Eskin modulated his cello to perfectly blend and provide the vital underpinning. It was one of those performances in which everything seemed to go right, and it is good to hear this ensemble play with such fluency and spirit.

Music for winds and strings formed the middle of the program, and both were 20th century compositions: Prokofiev's Quintet for Oboe, Clarinet, Violin, Viola and Bass, Opus 39, written in 1924, and Coker's Concertino for Bassoon and Strings, dating from 1959.

The Prokofiev is a tough challenge, alternately witty, spiky, eccentric, in the composer's quicksilver manner. It explores the various sonorities of these instruments in an original way, sometimes to the point of being grotesque. The string effects by themselves could form a catalogue of possible ways to get different sounds — from the wry glissandi in the mid-section of the first movement to the later tremolos played near the bridge and even to harmonics for the bass.

Joining Silverstein and Fine here were oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinetist Gino Cioffi and bassist Henry Portnoi. While their playing was capable enough, it also seemed overly-cautious, not completely idiomatic for Prokofiev, lacking the bounce and sense of abandon that gives the piece its vitality.

For the Coker, the string trio was joined by bassoonist Sherman Walt — who got a workout. Coker sends the bassoon to the extremes of its range — way down, way up and along all the way stations. The strings, which boldly launch the concertino with a sharp unison, are used variously — as a mass or in jagged counterpoint. What the work did establish was Walt's virtuosity on his instrument, which seldom has the opportunity to demonstrate such versatility.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
MAR 19 1967
New England Newsclip

Claude Frank Will Join Chamber Concert March 29

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players give their third program of the New England Conservatory and Boston Symphony Chamber Music Series on Wednesday evening, March 29. For this concert the Chamber Players will be joined by pianist Claude Frank. Also performing in the Jordan Hall concert will be Lois Schaefer, flute, and Henry Portnoi, bass.

The March 29 concert will open with Mozart's Piano Trio in E major, K. 542. Miss Schaefer, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, Sherman Walt, Bassoon, and James Stagliano, French horn, will perform Samuel Barber's Summer Music, and the concert will conclude with Shubert's well known "Trout" Quintet in A major, Op. 114. Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, cello, and Messrs. Portnoi and Frank will be heard in the "Trout" Quintet.

This program at the Conservatory's Jordan Hall will be the Boston Symphony Chamber Players last Boston appearance prior to their departure on an eight week trip abroad. The tour includes several weeks in the Soviet Union in addition to concerts in West Germany and London.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900
MAR 17 1967

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS (3 LPs; RCA Victor) have recorded with zest and polish an evening of music ranging in time from Mozart's sunny, transparent Quartet in D for Flute and Strings to the late Irving Fine's romantic and unsettling Fantasia for String Trio (1957). Most fetching of the four contemporary works is Elliott Carter's Woodwind Quintet, with its light melodic fragments breezily tossed and tangled like crepe-paper streamers.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
MAR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

Chamber Group Greets Summer

By Dorothy Newell

It might have been an impromptu summer rehearsal on Claude Frank's patio (if he has one), with good fun, good fellowship, good music. For although the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston Symphony Orchestra co-sponsored last night's performance of the Symphony's chamber players, the pianist was obviously the host.

He played the part with verve and good humor, at the same time turning in an excellent performance — and all the while he was the guest performer.

Frank brings concert piano to the Chamber Players, only three years old and just coming into their own. He performed last night with violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist, Jules Eskin, in Mozart's Piano Trio in E major, K. 542.

For the final work, they were joined by Burton Fine, viola and Henry Portoni, bass, for Schubert's Quintet in A major for Violin, Viola, Cello, Bass and Piano, Opus 114 ("Trout").

One wanted to applaud after each of the five movements, from Allegro vivace to Andante with its softest of tones; the spirited Scherzo: Presto; the extravagant Andantino with improvised theme, and the finale, Allegro giusto. No interruptions, but the group was called back to the stage for bows again and again.

The oboe must be called the solo instrument in Barber's "Summer Music (1956)" performed by five other Symphony principals, Lois Schaefer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, bassoon; Gino Cioffi French horn; Sherman Walt, clarinet, and James Stagliano, oboe.

Traditional Yet Modern

Barber's work hints of other summers, while at the same time implementing the new dissonant sounds in staccato echoes and a tempo erratic enough for a whimsical breeze or a swallow's flight.

The Chamber Players developed from informal after-hours rehearsals among orchestra fellows. They played both for relaxation and for challenge.

Their forerunner is the Boston Symphony String Quartet, a faculty quartet-in-residence at New England Conservatory, which has sponsored many public performances in the Boston area.

Established in 1964, the Chamber Players have appeared in Boston and New York, and last Spring completed a transcontinental tour. They cut a record album last fall which was released by RCA Victor.

Last night's concert, held in Jordan Hall instead of out in a summer evening as it may have seemed, was a prelude to a second overseas tour. The group is scheduled for performances in European Countries and Russia.

The Chamber Players should have a fine reception. They are at ease with each other and with their music.

They maintain such rapport with the audience that you might expect Frank or Silverstein at any moment to stop playing and say to the others — "Let's try it from pianissimo again" — and no one would feel offended. Only it wouldn't happen, the Chamber Players are just that good.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAR 13 1967
New England Newsclip

Symphony Chamber Players To Tour

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside this country since their formation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees three years ago.

The eight week trip, under the auspices of the U.S. Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union and West Germany.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

Ensemble Not Effective

By RENA FRUCHTER

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players present themselves as a highly professional group, yet much of what was heard in Jordan Hall last night seemed like a slightly polished run-through. There was some fine solo work from most of the individuals involved, but little effective ensemble playing.

The difficulties faced by the Chamber Players were exhibited in the opening Mozart Piano Trio in E Major, K. 542. The technical aspects of the trio were handled quite well. Dynamic markings were carefully observed. But there was little unity in regard to phrasing or overall structure. The consistency with which subtle and even obvious changes of harmony were ignored was a clear indication the form of the work had not been carefully thought out. The work moved well from phrase to phrase, but each passage was given little function in the work as a whole.

Aboist Ralph Gomberg provided some excellent passages in the Barber Summer Music, but here again, except in rare moments, performance was little more than an adequate reading of the notes.

The Schubert "Trout" Quintet also lacked structural unity, and themes often got buried in the process, but the performance as a whole was much more successful that the works on the first half of the program. There was a great deal of enthusiasm, particularly in the Allegro Vivace and the Scherzo, and this kept the performance from becoming dull.

The Program

Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented a program in Jordan Hall Wednesday evening, March 29.

Piano Trio in E Major, K. 542 — Mozart
Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin, Claude Frank.

Summer Music (1956) — Barber
Lois Schaefer, Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Sherman Walt, James Stagliano.

Quintet in A Major for Violin, Viola, Cello, Bass and Piano, Op. 114 ("Trout") — Schubert
Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin, Henry Portnoi, Claude Frank.

TIME (e)
GREENWICH, CONN.
CIRC. 11,850
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Music Concert

The final Parke-Bernet concert this season of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be held Sunday, April 16, at 8 p.m.

Performing Schubert's "Trout" Quintet and String Trio No. 3 in B flat and Barber's "Summer Music," will be Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Richard Goode, piano; Henry Portnoy, double bass; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn, and Louis Schaefer, flute. Concert tickets are available through Parke-Bernet.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
MAR 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Busy Week for Symphony

The Boston Symphony will be all over town this week. Players in various combinations will perform in Symphony and Jordan Halls, the Somerset Hotel and Back Bay Theater.

The full orchestra's Friday-Saturday program will be preceded Thursday evening by an open rehearsal. For this trio of concerts, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct works by five composers: Haydn's D major Symphony No. 13, a new version of Schuller's Diptych, "Til Ewlenspiegel" by Strauss, Webern's Five Pieces and Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird." Much of this repertoire will be taken by the orchestra on its two-week tour, Apr. 3-15.

Tuesday evening, the orchestra will repeat the Mozart-Bruckner program of last week. Evelyne Crochet will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 456. The concert will open with Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and close with the Bruckner Symphony No. 9.

the 8:30 concert.

Three chamber groups will be active. Monday evening will find costumed players at the Somerset Hotel in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. Also at the $5.5 million fund drive dinner, Boston Symphony trustees, conducted by Pres. Henry B. Cabot, will essay Leopold Mozart's "Toy Symphony." This program will be seen, beginning at 9, on Ch 2 and WGBH-FM.

Meanwhile, Monday in Symphony Hall, the second organ concert will take place. E. Power Biggs and a B.S.O. chamber group conducted by Charles Wilson will perform. The program lists Corelli's C major Concerto, Vivaldi's A minor Concerto, Handel's C major Concerto, Hindemith's Sonata No. 2, Piston's Prelude and Allegro and "Festival" Sonatas by Mozart.

Wednesday will find the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Jordan Hall and their colleagues at the Back Bay Theater for "The Rake's Progress" by Stravinsky. The Chamber Players will spend May giving concerts in London, Germany and the Soviet Union. The program in Jordan Hall will be made up of Mozart's Piano Trio, K. 542, Summer Music by Samuel Barber, and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet. The pianist will be Claude Frank.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800
MAR 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Group to Tour

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make an eight-week tour abroad this spring, the first foreign tour since its formation three years ago.

The trip, under the auspices of the United States Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union, and West Germany.

The Chamber Players' first tour, last spring, consisted of concerts and master classes presented in the United States.

The group is scheduled to leave Boston April 29.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
MAR 11 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Chamber Players Will Tour Europe, USSR

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside this country, since the formation of the group by the orchestra's trustees three years ago.

U. S. to Sponsor

The eight-week trip abroad, under the auspices of the Department of State's cultural presentations program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union, and West Germany. Their first tour in the spring of 1966 consisted of concerts and master classes across the United States.

Present plans call for the players to leave Boston April 29 with the first concerts taking place in London. The major portion of the tour is scheduled for the Soviet Union where the players will be from May 3 through June 9. Following their final appearance in that country, they will concertize for several days in West Germany, before returning to Boston June 16.

It is expected that in addition to their concerts the members will be available for demonstrations and lectures in music schools and conservatories in some of the tour cities. In anticipation of their visit to the USSR the individual players have been taking Russian lessons during the winter.

The variety of instrumentation among the Chamber Players enables them to draw from the broadest range of the chamber music repertoire, and in addition to the more standard chamber music compositions, the players are able to offer music less often heard in chamber music concerts. This spring's tour will include a composition by an American composer in each program.

Members who will take part in the tour are: Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Everett Firth, tympani; all principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Also from the orchestra will be Lois Schaefer, flute, and Henry Portnoi, bass. The young American pianist Richard Goode will join the players for this tour.

On March 2 at the annual awards dinner of the National Academy of Recording Artists and Sciences, the Chamber Players received a Grammy Award in the category of best chamber music performance for their first RCA Victor recording released last year.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO Group Plans First Foreign Tour

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their second major tour this spring, their first outside of this country, since the formation of the group by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees three years ago. The eight-week trip abroad, under the auspices of the U.S. Department of State's Cultural Presentations Program, includes concerts in London, the Soviet Union and West Germany.

London First

Present plans call for the Chamber Players to leave Boston on April 29, with the first concerts taking place in London. The major portion of the tour is scheduled for the Soviet Union, from May 3 to June 9. Following their final appearance in that country, the Players will concertize for several days in West Germany, prior to returning to Boston on June 16.

The members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players who will take part in the tour are Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO: Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Everett Firth, tympani; all principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Chamber Unit Delights Locally

By Louise Cuyler

A delightful coda to the Boston Symphony concert came on Sunday afternoon, in Rackham auditorium, when nine members of the orchestra — all but one first chair men in their respective sections — played a concert of music for small ensembles, as the seventh program of the Chamber Arts Series.

The full roster of the musicians, who call themselves the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, includes Lois Schaefer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; James Stagliano, horn; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin and concertmaster; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; and Henry Portnoi, string bass.

Each member of the group is a fine artist in his own right, as their important positions in the Boston Orchestra attest. Special tribute must be paid, however, to Mr. Silverstein, whose violin sound is as elegant and lovely as any to be heard today. He plays with the same exquisite taste, ease and restraint, whether the part is a simple air or an elaborate cadenza. The Boston Orchestra is fortunate indeed in possessing so fine a concertmaster.

Ludwig Spohr's Nonet, Op. 31, which required the entire ensemble, opened the program. This warm, genial, unpretentious music is as much a joy to hear as to play. Today, Spohr is an almost forgotten composer, although aspirant fiddlers are still wont to revive one or two of his concertos. His misfortune (if being forgotten is, indeed, a misfortune) lies in two circumstances. The first may be summarized in a single name: Beethoven. The second is that unpretentious music went out of favor as the 19th century progressed. The first two movements of the Nonet — Allegro, and Scherzo: allegro — are typical of much of the best in ensemble music from the Haydn-Beethoven period. The third movement — Adagio — is a little gem indeed, with a lyricism that foreshadows the Lieder of Schumann and Brahms.

Irving Fine's Fantasia for String Trio (1957), a composition which has already received considerable acclaim, completed the first portion of Sunday's program. This is a strong, finely crafted work that is full of lovely sound. Its suave, linear structure disguises the basic tone row, and makes it supple, furnishing audible proof that dodecaphonic music need not be brusque, cacaphonous or formidable. Perhaps we should have more string players who are composers.

After intermission, Beethoven's famous Septet in E-flat, Op. 20, filled the remainder of the program. The ensemble was that of the opening number, minus only the flute and oboe. This work, a divertimento of eight movements in alternating slow and fast tempo, is modelled on the many similar compositions originating in the later 18th century. It was to serve as a design for future ensemble works by Schubert and Brahms, among others.

The Septet has many episodes of beauty and attractiveness, but it is discursive and overly long, with the result that the listener's attention is likely to wander. Even the performers seemed to develop a certain satiety after the first five or six movements, as evidenced by a few inadvertencies of intonation and ensemble.

Such small faults did little to diminish the joy of a superb performance, however, and the Boston Chamber Players were applauded long and warmly at the close of the program.

Full Orchestra Joy To Hear

This season's Choral Union Series came to a close Saturday night with a concert in Hill Auditorium by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. This orchestra has been a frequent visitor here through the years, as the audience was reminded in a program note stating that this is the group's 43rd Ann Arbor concert. The Boston, which continues to be one of our country's great orchestras, has been fortunate in avoiding—perhaps in ignoring — many of the circumstances that have caused quality to vacillate for other major ensembles.

There is, for example, the matter of change in conductors. Erich Leinsdorf has now been in Boston for a long enough time to make his own mark on the orchestra and it is, undeniably, a vastly different group from that of yesteryear. Gone is the mystique of the Karl Muck and Koussevitzky years, along with the more genial opulence of Munch's time. Rather, Leinsdorf has molded an ensemble in the current ideal — that of highest technical competence, plasticity, but detachment. hTe result is sound that is still a joy to hear, but that has lost some of the excitement and involvement of other regimes.

As for Leinsdorf himself, he is surely one of the most diverting of present day conductors to watch, at the same time that he is a highly competent leader. His stance on the podium ranges all the way from an elegant inertia that permits the ensemble to be self-propelling, to indulgence in an amazing series of gyrations and gymnastics. From time to time, he appears to pull, poke, unscrew, or flip unexpected sounds from the depths of his group. Occasionally these diversionary tactics prove annoying. At other times — in some of the rather dreary episodes of the Beethoven Seventh, for example — they were more interesting than the music.

The program commenced with Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail." Mozart, whose music is an ideal beginning (or ending, for that matter) for any concert, has filled this little curtain-raiser to his "Harem" opera with all manner of gay tunes and quasi-Turkish effects. Music of this enchantment needs only to be played, and that the Boston Orchestra did with gusto.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major filled the remainder of the pre-intermission portion of the program. For this reviewer, the performance was a pedestrian one, with only a few bright moments before the final movement. There was, first of all, the matter of tempo. The opening "Poco sostenuto," the "Vivace" of the main portion of the first movement, and the "Allegretto" of the second movement variation all meandered at about the same moderate pace. This symphony lacks, furthermore, the built-in dynamic excitement of the "Eroica" and the Fifth —a circumstance which tests the intuition and imagination of the conductor. I found only occasional evidence of those qualities in Saturday night's reading. On the brighter side, there was the marvellously vital Pianissimo from the low strings at the start of the Allegretto, and a very colorful Allegro con brio at the close.

A gesture toward contemporary music came after intermission, in the playing of Gunther Schuller's "Diptych for Brass Quintet and Orchestra." If any in the audience have felt a lack of rapport with music of our day, this composition probably did little to dispel their attitude. Even the quintet of solo brass, a group that is capable of magnificent and arresting effect, was relegated to thrsuting some desultory grunts and squeals into a conglomerate background of sound.

To close the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf chose a Suite of seven episodes drawn from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Firebird." This music is almost 60 years old now, but it still sounds fresh, vital and enchanting. Through the years, no group has brought the vitality and understanding to the performance of Russian (and French) music that the Boston Orchestra has continued to provide. Saturday's "Firebird" continued in the best Boston tradition and the audience responded with enthuiastic applause.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850
APR 29 1967
New England Newsclip

EUROPE-BOUND—Boston Symphony Chamber players board plane at Logan for start of first international tour. The 15,000-mile tour, sponsored by the State Department's Office of Cultural Presentations, will include concerts in London, the Soviet Union and West Germany. (William Ryerson Photo)

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
APR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO String Quartet Subtle Musicians

By KAREN MONSON
Contributing Critic

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING QUARTET (Joseph Silverstein, George Zazofsky, Burton Fine, Julius Rabin) playing Haydn, Quartet F-Sharp minor, Op. 50, No. 4; Beethoven, Quartet in C minor, Op. 18, No. 4; Mendelssohn, Quartet in A major, Op. 13—Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall.

The Boston Symphony String Quartet is a very fine group. Though at Wednesday night's concert in Jordan Hall there were flaws in technique, in intonation, and in balance, and though, as always, the concert could be labeled under-rehearsed, the performance was perfectly convincing, and in excellent taste. Given these attributes, a lot can be overlooked, and, admittedly, a lot had to be.

At first glance, the program seemed to lack variety. Though it was good to hear the rarely-performed Haydn F-Sharp minor Quartet this particular piece and Beethoven's C minor Quartet are closely related. And the step from this Beethoven to the Mendelssohn Quartet Opus 13 is not all that large.

But as the concert progressed, it became very clear that precisely these similarities were illustrating the highly subtle musicianship of the four players. Far from being the same, the music was remarkably varied: the elegance of the Haydn gave way to the tempestuousness of the Beethoven, and this, in turn, gave way to the bitter-sweet qualities of the Mendelssohn.

Haydn rarely wrote in F-sharp minor, and rarely if ever, did he produce a Quartet with the depth of Opus 50, No. 4. The work encompasses an unusually wide range of emotions, and seems to be less restricted by its own form than is often the case. Beethoven's Opus 18 was written only slightly more than a decade later; similar tendencies are evident. But in the Haydn, there was an aura of elegance and refinement which was suddenly shattered by the opening measures of the Beethoven.

Here the performers were obviously most comfortable. The interpretation was by no means musically unusual —the work invites a tempestuous performance—but it was indeed convincing throughout. Technical passage work was usually fine, even at the very rapid tempi. Dynamic contrasts provided the major impetus for the excitement; especially in the last movement they were very effective.

The change from Beethoven to Mendelssohn was striking, though hardly shattering. Instead of the tempest, there was an aching sweetness, as if from a memory. The work was performed with great delicacy, but intense feeling. Here, musical taste was more a question of tact, and the performers had that too.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAY 8 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 116,000
MAY 7 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 56,800
MAY 7 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 56,800
APR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 116,000
APR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
APR 16 1967
New England Newsclip

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
APR 27 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Musicians Praised in Russia

MOSCOW (AP) — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players got a favorable reception Saturday night in Donetsk at the opening performance of their Soviet tour.

A music critic in Donetsk, an industrial city about 500 miles south of Moscow, praised "the purity of sound and interesting interpretations" of the Chamber Players. The group is making a month-long 22-concert tour in Russia.

Boston Chamber Group Leaves on Concert Tour

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Symphony chamber members left Boston's Logan Airport Saturday for an 8-week international tour which includes 22 concerts in the Soviet Union.

The group will present concerts in London before beginning the Russian tour in Minsk on May 5. They will leave the USSR June 8 and give four concerts in West Germany before returning to the Unites States June 15.

WEDNESDAY

Children

"THE ADVENTURES of Tom Sawyer" by Mark Twain—New England Life Hall, Boston; presented by Boston Children's Theater; 2:30 p.m.; for information and reservation call KE 6-3324; special group rates.

BOSTON SYMPHONY String Quartet —Jordan Hall, Boston; final concert of season; 8:30 p.m.; tickets $4.50, $3.75, $3.25, $2.50.

PIANO RECITAL — Quincy House, Harvard University, Cambridge; Michael Rogers; 8:15 p.m.; free.

CLARA VERGHESE, piano program—Recital Hall, 290 Huntington av.,

Symphony Chamber Players To Give Concerts in Russia

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will leave April 29 for an eight-week international tour to 17 cities in three countries. The major portion of the Chamber Players' tour will take place in the Soviet Union where they will give 22 concerts in just over four weeks.

Two concerts will be given in London prior to departure for the extended period in the Soviet Union. The first concerts there will be in Minsk. Travel in that country will be by air and rail with a portion, from Odessa to Yalta, by ship.

The final concerts in Russia will be given in Moscow on June 7 and 8.

Following their programs in Moscow the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give five concerts in West Germany before returning to Boston June 16.

The May-June tour is the second undertaken by the Chamber Players since the formation of the group by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees in 1964. Last spring the Chamber Players traveled across the United States.

The members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players who will take part in the tour are: Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gombert, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; James Stagliano, French horn; all principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Also from the Orchestra will be Lois Schaefer, flute; Matthew Ruggiero, bassoon; and Henry Portnoi, bass. The young American pianist Richard Goode will join the Chamber Players on this tour.

201

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850
MAY 4 1967 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800
MAY 5 1967 New England Newsclip

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAY 4 1967 New England Newsclip

Hub Musicians To Open Soviet Trip In Donetsk

MOSCOW—The Chamber Players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra open a Soviet concert tour Friday night on Donetsk, an industrial city in the Ukraine.

The opening had been set for Minsk, capital of Soviet Byelorussia, but was changed at Soviet request, a U.S. embassy spokesman said.

He said the embassy was pleased with the change because American artists have performed before in Minsk under the U.S.-Soviet cultural exchange program, but not in Donetsk.

The players will give 22 concerts in 11 Soviet cities in just over four weeks, winding up the tour here June 8.

The group includes Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, Viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gombert, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; and James Stagliano, French horn.

(Associated Press)

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAY 6 1967 New Englan Newscl

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850
MAY 6 1967 New Englan Newscl

Hub Musicians Unable to Give Soviet Concert

Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players failed to play its first Soviet concert Friday night because some of its instruments and music were left behind. A race was on today to try to get the 10-person group into action.

The touring players were supposed to have played in Donetsk, an industrial city 550 miles south of Moscow. They arrived there but their cello, French horn and music got lost along the way from London.

James Staglianos' French horn and the group's music turned up in Moscow today. The Soviet Government concert agency borrowed a U.S. embassy truck to rush them to the last plane for Donetsk, hoping to get them there in time for a concert tonight.

Jules Eskin was still without his cello.

So far as the embassy here knew, other players had their instruments with them, except for Richard Goode who is borrowing pianos along the way on the month-long, 22-concert Soviet tour.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650
MAY 7 1967 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY Chamber Players prepare to leave Boston Saturday for an eight-week international tour. A TWA flight took them to New York and by the same airline to London on the first leg of the 15,000-mile trip to 17 cities in three countries. The major portion of the Chamber Players' tour will take place in Soviet Union, where they will give 22 concerts in just over four weeks.
Sunday Advertiser Photo, Earl Ostroff

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
MAY 3 1967

TIMES (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 635,600
MAY 3 1967 New Engla Newsc

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
MAY 3 1967

Boston Chamber Players Begin Soviet Tour Friday

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will open a 22-concert tour of the Soviet Union on Friday with a concert in Minsk. The players, made up mostly of first desk men of the symphony, will play two concerts in each of 11 cities during their Soviet stay, winding up in Leningrad on June 4 and 5 and Moscow on June 7 and 8.

The players will give five concerts in West Germany on their way back, finishing at Saarbrucken on June 15. They will return to Boston on June 16.

The tour is under the auspices of the State Department's Cultural Presentations Office. It is the second tour by the group since it was founded in 1964. The first one, last spring, was in the United States.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600
MAY 5 1967 New England Newsclip

DENNIS
YARMOUTH REGISTER
YARMOUTHPORT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,100
MAY 4 1967 New England Newsclip

THE REGISTER THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1967 Page Three

Claude Frank, trio of Boston Symphony Chamber Players scheduled to perform celebrity concert this summer

If tenacity is rewarded, Cape Cod will get top flight classical music this summer.

The Cape Cod Performing Arts Association Saturday received a contract to sign with a string trio of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and Claude Frank, the symphony's favorite piano soloist.

The performance will take place at Camp Kirkland in Yarmouth. The campers will have just left for home a few days before. Camp Kirkland is being loaned for the occasion. It has a sheltered outdoor stage which seats 300, with room for 200 listeners seated on the grass.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are composed of first chair musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will have just concluded its Tanglewood series. The trio will be made up of Joseph Silverstein or one of two other first violinists. Mr. Silverstein is concert master of the Boston Symphony. Burton Fine is violist and Jules Eskin 'cellist.

The Cape Cod Performing Arts Association chairman is Ronald C. Perera of Yarmouth Port. Sheila S. Rogers of Yarmouth is secretary-treasurer. For some time these two have been determined to bring the world's best music performed by the best musicians to the Cape.

Mr. Perera is currently composing a mass for his thesis for a master's degree in music at Harvard. He is engaged to be married this June.

Mrs. Rogers, a Bennington College music major, is a trustee of the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts.

Their determination was based on two suppositions. First, the Cape will subscribe to concerts of this calibre, because already considerable numbers travel to Boston or Lenox or New York to hear them. Besides that, in summer thousands of visitors to the Cape and would-be visitors will be attracted by the special atmosphere and quality of an outdoor summer concert by foremost musicians. The second supposition is that concerts can attract people who will contribute to the Cape's abiding values, to the eventual displacement of those who come to consume the Cape in pursuit of transitory amusement.

In putting these suppositions to practical test, the Performing Arts Association (or an earlier version of it) has had to outlast two rebuffs. The first came when it tried to place concerts on grounds of the Cape Playhouse in Dennis in association with the Raymond Moore Foundation. The neighbors, with considerable logic, objected to the traffic and general excitement this might generate. But they expressed their objections with such rudeness that the music promoters were taken aback.

The second rebuff came when the association requested use of the Dennis-Yarmouth Regional High School grounds at a time when school would not be in session. The School Committee denied the request because it deemed the concerts a commercial venture of doubtful educational value, thus astonishing a wide segment of the community.

The present location is one in which outdoor activities, such as camp theatricals, have been held for many years. It is distant from human habitation and off North Main St., a main road not far from South Yarmouth and Dennis connections with the Mid-Cape Highway.

Last week the supporters of the concert idea were heartened by response to a similar venture sponsored by the Cape Cod Community College and The Register. This event, held at Barnstable High School, brought the Metropolitan Opera Studio to present a flawless performance of Donizetti's Don Pasquale. With only local Cape Codders to draw from, the young opera professionals substantially filled the house, thus meeting more than half the costs. The audience turned out to be quick to grasp and warm in response, to the delight of Manager John Gutman and the performers.

For further encouragement, the Performing Arts Association has noted the growing cooperation between the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts and the Cape Cod Symphony. This has increased the local influence of musicians of the stature of Emil Kornsand and Willem Valkanier, thereby enhancing the effectiveness of the Conservatory's Leslie Moore and the symphony's Jennings Butterfield.

And finally, the sell-out history of Cape Cod Community Concerts and the success of the Provincetown Symphony add validity to the suppositions on which this first summer concert is based.

Ultimately, the dream is to develop a regular summer concert festival which will establish Cape Cod as a music center. There will be only one concert this summer, to plant the seed. The planters will be the best musicians of one of the world's great orchestras.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
MAY 11 1967 New England Newsclip

Chamber Players From BSO To Tour Russia

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will leave Boston Saturday for an eight-week international tour. The group will fly by TWA to New York and by the same airline to London on the first leg of the 15,000 mile trip to 17 cities in three countries. The major portion of the Chamber Players' tour will take place in the Soviet Union where they will give 22 concerts in just over four weeks.

London Concerts

Two concerts will be given in London prior to departure for the extended period in the Soviet Union. The first concerts there will be in Minsk. Travel in that country will be by air and rail with a portion, from Odessa to Yalta, by ship.

The final concerts in Russia will be given in Moscow on June 7 and 8.

Following their programs in Moscow the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give five concerts in West Germany before returning to Boston June 16.

The May-June tour is the second undertaken by the Chamber Players since the formation of the group by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's trustees in 1964. Last spring the Chamber Players traveled across the United States.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650
MAY 7 1967 New England Newsclip

In the World

Hub Musical Unit Warmly Received

MOSCOW (AP)—The Boston Symphony Chamber Players got a favorable reception Saturday night in Donetsk at the opening performance of their Soviet tour. The official Soviet News Agency Tass reported that the group "was warmly received by the public."

Its opening performance was scheduled for Friday night, but was delayed because some of the instruments and music got left behind. The instruments were rushed to Donetsk by plane Saturday.

Chamber Players From Boston On Tour of Soviet

MOWCOW (AP) — The Chamber Players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra open a Soviet concert tour tonight in Donetsk, an industrial city in the Ukraine.

The opening had been set for Minsk, capital of Soviet Byelorussia, but was changed at Soviet request, a U. S. embassy spokesman said.

The spokesman said the Russians asked for the change because of a scheduling conflict at the Philharonic hall in Minsk.

He said the embassy was pleased with the change because American artists have performed before in Minsk under the U. S.-Soviet cultural exchange program, but not in Donetsk. The spokesman said the rest of the schedule remains the same.

The players will give 22 concerts in 11 Soviet cities in just over four weeks, winding up the tour here June 8.

They are scheduled to give two concerts each in Donetsk, Lvov, Chernovtsy, Odessal, Yalta, Kiev, Kishinev, Baku, Tbilisi, Leningrad and Moscow.

The group includes, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gombert, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; and James Stagliano, French horn.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
APR 20 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Quartet Evolving a True Style

By McLAREN HARRIS

Wednesday night at Jordan Hall the Boston Symphony String Quartet made up the concert postponed from March 8 because of schedule conflicts. This program came rather shortly before the departure of the Symphony's Chamber Players to London and the USSR on the heels of the orchestra's jaunt through the Northeast and Midwest and in the midst of the closing of the Symphony season and the opening of the Pops.

Under the circumstances, one might think that quartet activities would receive short shrift. But from the sound of Haydn, Bethoven and Mendelssohn, they didn't. This foursome—Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins; Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello—has always been praised for its artistic aims and the musicianship of its individuals. At the same time there has been reservations about its approach, often described as "orchestral"; that is to say occasional over-zealousness in playing appeared to come from striving for large-ensemble effects, and any resultant tonal aberrations were thought to be covered by one's colleagues.

Of course, very little can be hidden in a quartet; and thus there have been moments of harshness, when we have felt that the quartet was being used almost as a blunt instrument. Yet more and more these men are evolving a true quartet style, one based upon brightness, energy and the flexibility to bridge great and sudden changes of volume or mood.

The program's two classic works, Haydn's F sharp minor Quartet from Opus 50 and Beethoven's C minor, Op. 18, No. 4, demonstrated this. The Haydn opening Allegro's sparkle, the varicolored Andante's variations, the Minuet's rhythmic neatness and the final Fugue's light, unrelenting spirit were good foils for agile bows. Likewise for the Beethoven, whose ambitious thrust and expertise of construction provide some of the most dynamic writing in a classical mold.

Yet some measure of the previous arguments held sway here; so it was Mendelssohn's A major Quartet, Op. 13, which brought out another dimension. For all of its musical emotion, this work is purely unpretentious; its Adagio is a true Romanza, its lyric Intermezzo disarming. Mendelssohn drew from the players a relaxation of means; an emergence of sensitivity toward melodic phrase and increased tonal richness. Mendelssohn, as someone said, may be their man.

ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

Boston's Symphony Under His Direction

35

He spent his youth in Vienna and took 50 years "learning how to feel physically well and to live life the way I should." Now he's the music director of Boston's famed Symphony Orchestra, the father of five children . . . and one who thinks there "is no other city like Boston." He's Erich Leinsdorf, pictured conducting his world-renowned orchestra during a concert at Symphony Hall. For more about him see Pat Collins' story on Page 9. For a two-page color picture of the orchestra turn to center fold.

203

England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488
JAN 8 1966

Exclusive! Boston's Great Symphony Orchestra

ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director
RICHARD BURGIN, Associate Conductor

FIRST VIOLINS
Joseph Silverstein
Concertmaster
Alfred Krips
George Zazofsky
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Julius Schulman
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

SECOND VIOLINS
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Samuel Diamond
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Giora Bernstein
Ayrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
Victor Manusevitch
Minot Beale
Ronald Knudsen
Max Hobart
John Korman

VIOLAS
Burton Fine
Reuben Green
Eugen Lehner
Albert Bernard
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Jean Cauhape
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Bernard Kadinoff
Joseph Pietropaolo

CELLOS
Jules Eskin
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Karl Zeise
Richard Kapuscinski
Robert Ripley
John Sant Ambrogio
Luis Leguia
Jascha Silberstein
Stephen Geber
Carol Procter

BASSES
Henry Freeman
Irving Frankel
Henry Portnoi
Henri Girard
Jon Barwicki
Leslie Martin
Bela Wurtsler
Joseph Hearne
George Moleux (d. Dec. 7, 1966)

FLUTES
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
James Pappoutsakis
Philip Kaplan

PICCOLO
Lois Schaefer

OBOES
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Hugh Matheny

ENGLISH HORN
Laurence Thorstenberg

CLARINETS
Gino Cioffi
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
E flat Clarinet

BASS CLARINET
Rosario Mazzeo

BASSOONS
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

CONTRA BASSOON
Richard Plaster

HORNS
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Osbourne McConathy

TRUMPETS
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
Andre Come
Gerard Goguen

TROMBONES
William Gibson
William Moyer
Kauko Kahila
Josef Orosz

TUBA
K. Vinal Smith

TIMPANI
Everett Firth

PERCUSSION
Charles Smith
Harold Thompson
Arthur Press
Ass't Timpanist
Thomas Gauger

HARPS
Bernard Zighera
Olivia Luetcke

By LANING HUMPHREY

AS YOU VIEW this color photograph—first of its kind ever made during an actual performance—you are looking at one of the world's greatest artistic creations—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That is not merely the opinion of Bostonians, but of musical experts scattered around the world. For example, take the opinions of two Swedish critics after hearing our orchestra in Stockholm on its second European tour.

"It cannot be denied that this is one of the world's greatest orchestras," one reviewer declared. "Anything more wonderful in orchestral playing is not possible," another wrote.

Why has it such a high rating, when there are other fine orchestras in this country and abroad? Among many factors, there is a simple one. It is a great team—whereas other ensembles have good teams. Every orchestra is, in fact, a group of teams.

As shown in this picture of Boston's one hundred and one men and four women symphony players, the musicians are seated in groups according to instruments of the same type which they play: strings, woodwinds, brass, and percussion. These are subdivided. The strings include subdivisions into first and second violins, violas, cellos, and contrabasses. Within the woodwinds are flutes and piccolo oboes and English horn, clarinets and bass clarinet, bassoons and contrabassoon. The brasses are grouped into horns, trumpets, trombones and tuba. The timpani (kettledrums), being tuneable, really are in a separate category from the percussion instruments, which produce rhythm, with sounds of indefinite pitch. Also in a class by themselves are the harps.

Counting all these subdivisions, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its fellows have fifteen teams within the

Meet the Symphony Family
—First in a New Series—orchestra. Each team has its individual leader or "principal," who is responsible for suiting his players' efforts to the needs of the conductor.

It is essential for every orchestra to have good teamworkers in every group. Musicians successful as soloists—even as real stars or virtuosos—often do not succeed as team-workers. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra's greatness lies in possessing team-workers who can qualify as soloists. This has been underscored in the present season. When conductor Erich Leinsdorf needed no less than four violin soloists for a remarkable concerto by the eighteenth century master, Vivaldi, he did not import the artists. He simply put the names of his talented string players in a hat, pulled out four names, and gave them the assignment. The result was outstanding.

To quote a Moscow critic's summation, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra consists of first-class musicians, artists, and virtuosi in the full meaning of the word. The various sections—combine into an unusually excellent ensemble. The tone quality of the whole orchestra is as splendid as that of the individual soloists."

A striking compliment to the orchestra's teamwork is recalled by a former player, who took part in the episode. One of Europe's foremost conductors, Dr. Karl Muck, was leading the Boston musicians in his first concert as their new director. In the course of presenting Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Muck folded his arms and confidently let the players proceed on their own. They rose to the occasion, it is reported.

This, then, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a great team of great teams. In the weeks to come you will read about the men and the women who make up these teams in the continuing "Meet the Symphony Family" series in Pictorial Living Coloroto Magazine. Next week's article will discuss the first violins.

(Orchestra Pictured in 85th Season.)

Violins—Choir Of the Composer

Wide range of tone and an infinite variety of expression is assured the composer and the conductor in the strings of a great orchestra such as the Boston Symphony. The first violins, headed by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster (left), are the subject of the latest in the series, "Meet the Symphony Family," which appears today on Pages 14 and 15.

Plo. see p. 14 & 15

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

JAN 15 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

SECOND OF A SERIES

Plo. see p. 2

First Violins

THE STRINGS

31

By LANING HUMPHREY

CONSIDERING the many centuries comprising the history of music, the symphony orchestra is a relatively modern invention—only a little more than two centuries old. Music-making with groups of instruments existed long before. But it remained for the 1700's to develop an exact pattern for orchestras, everywhere: four groups of instruments, each containing only a specific kind—strings, woodwinds, brass, percussion.

The string instruments outnumber the quota of each of the other groups, for several reasons. They need to make up in numbers what they lack individually in power. Primarily, they provide the composer with a very wide range of tone and an infinite variety of expression. Although rated as one group, the strings actually consist of five subgroups: first and second violins, violas, cellos, and double-bassos. Dividing the violins into firsts and seconds is merely a convenience for serving the needs of a composer when he desires the effect of a duet between two groups of violins. In a way, the four sections of string instruments may be compared to a quartet of human voices: soprano, alto, tenor, bass.

The picture with this article shows the first violin choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its eighty-fifth season, 1965-1966. As shown, the players are seated two to a music stand. They are headed by the concertmaster and assistant concertmaster—Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, respectively. An orchestra's concertmaster is the most important man next to the conductor. He must have a rare combination of qualifications: superior musicianship, outstanding rank as a soloist, and a strong sense of leadership. He is the liaison man between the conductor and the entire orchestra—not alone the five groups of strings. Each section of instruments has its own leader, or "principal," but the concertmaster tops them in authority.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, Concertmaster, came to that post with a bit of tradition and a shattering of tradition, in regard to the history of the orchestra. Like two of his distinguished predecessors, Richard Burgin and Franz Kneisel, he was very young. But they were imported from Europe, while he, a native of Detroit, won the position by competition for the post left vacant by the retirement of Mr. Burgin.

When Silverstein entered the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955, he sat in the last row of the second violins. That was the rule—last man in, you take a rear chair, no matter how fine your training, how well you play, how high a position you have in other orchestras. Six years later, Silverstein was in command of all the strings. Previously, he had shown his virtuosity by becoming a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition. The following year he won America's richest award, that of the Naumburg Foundation. He studied in Philadelphia at Curtis Institute, became a member, in turn, of the Houston, Denver, and Philadelphia orchestras.

First Violins of the Orchestra: (left column, front to rear by pairs, and left to right in pairs) Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster, and Alfred Krips; George Zazofsky and Rolland Tapley; Roger Shermont and Max Winder; Harry Dickson and Gottfried Wilfinger; Fredy Ostrovsky and Leo Panasevich; Noah Bielski and Herman Silberman. (right column pairs) Stanley Benson and Sheldon Rotenberg; Alfred Schneider and Julius Schulman; Gerald Goldbloom and Raymond Sird. The picture was taken during the orchestra's eighty-fifth season (1965-66).

ALFRED KRIPS, Assistant Concertmaster, began his career in Europe. In his native Berlin he had the invaluable experience of playing under the conductorship of such greats as Bruno Walter, Wilhelm Furtwangler, Otto Klemperer, and Richard Strauss. He also was soloist with a chamber orchestra touring Europe. During the summer he is Concertmaster of the Pops, and as such has been soloist many times. An interesting note in his early career is that he studied in Berlin with Willy Hess, who had been Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY, Bostonian by birth, is a graduate of the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where he was concertmaster of its brilliant orchestra under Fritz Reiner's masterly conducting. Twice he toured the Americas with Stokowski's All-American Youth Orchestra. A member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1941, he has been soloist many times at the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, and was soloist in the Symphony Concerts in the revival of the important—and difficult—Violin Concerto of Alban Berg, when Erich Leinsdorf conducted its revival in November, 1963. Zazofsky has long given distinguished service to the Zimbler Sinfonietta as its concertmaster. With it he returned to Latin America, and also guided its remarkable recorded performance in Handel's "Messiah," with the Handel and Haydn Society, conducted by Thompson Stone. Of course, no musician likes to be "at sea" during a concert, but when Zazofsky has time off stage he is fond of going fishing at sea in a 28-foot, motor cabin cruiser which he owns in a partnership with his brother-in-law, principal oboist Ralph Gomberg.

ROLLAND TAPLEY shares his time between his violin and a baton. At the Esplanade Concerts he is concertmaster, and has appeared often as soloist in that series. He also is well known as conductor of the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra in Lynn, and the Wellesley Symphony Orchestra, and has been guest conductor at the Pops. From time to time he has doubled as saxophonist when a Symphony or Pops composition requires

Continued next page

205

..Choir for the Composer

one. In the course of his career, he has been a boys' camp counselor, and still enjoys a fling at outdoor life and a chance to use his savvy in that realm. Born in Hudson, Mass., he attended Malden High School, and at the same time studied in Boston with the noted violin teacher, Felix Winternitz. The year after his graduation from high school, he joined the B.S.O.—aged 18.

ROGER SHERMONT is a native of Paris, where he was graduated from the Conservatory at the head of his class. He gave recitals throughout France, became soloist with the French National Radio Orchestra, then the National Orchestra Association of New York. In the latter city he was a member of the Little Orchestra Society, the N.B.C. Orchestra, and the Guilet String Quartet. As a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he distinguished himself as soloist, under Charles Munch, in the exacting Brahms Concerto. One critic commented that among the performances of this masterpiece that he had heard in thirty years, none exceeded Shermont's "for sheerly musical qualities."

MAX WINDER, after graduation from the Conservatoty of his native Paris, played in the Concerts Colonne of that city, then was concertmaster of the Opera of Nice. After serving in the Cleveland Orchestra and the Chatauqua Symphony, he was assistant concertmaster of the Houston, Texas Orchestra, and was active with the Houston Chamber Music Guild.

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON, as the saying goes, wears a lot of hats. To countless thousands of people he is known as assistant conductor of the Pops and Esplanade Concerts, and as founder and conductor of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. Cambridge was his birthplace, but he is a graduate of Somerville High School. At the New England Conservatory, of which he is a graduate, he studied violin with the former Boston Symphony violinist, Vaughan Hamilton, and composition with the composer Stuart Mason. His violin studies continued in Berlin on a scholarship at the Hochschule fur Musik, where he also was a student of conducting. Back in the U. S. A. he served as conductor of the WBZ staff orchestra, and with the Federal Music Project. After joining the Boston Symphony as violinist, he served concurrently as conductor of the Providence Civic Orchestra. When not playing violin or conducting, he is notable as a witty and informative public speaker.

GOTTFRIED WILFINGER, born in Allentown, Pa., pursued his studies in Philadelphia, San Francisco (where he gave recitals), Los Angeles, and in Boston at the New England Conservatory, with Richard Burgin. A scholarship at Tanglewood provided finishing studies.

FREDY OSTROVSKY, by birth a Bulgarian, became at sixteen an honor graduate of the Viennese State Academy. For two additional years, in London, he was a pupil of the famous Carl Flesch (who also was one of Dickson's teachers). For a while he lived in Sweden. His entrance into the B.S.O. followed concert activity around Europe. In Boston he has appeared in recitals, and as soloist in Pops and Esplanade Concerts.

LEO PANASEVICH at the age of eight was studying violin in his native New York City with Louis Persinger. In Paris he continued with Menuhin's teacher, the famous composer-violinist, Georges Enesco. After four years on a scholarship at the Juilliard School in New York, he became assistant concertmaster of the National Symphony in Washington, D. C. Engaged as concertmaster of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, he toured with it throughout the U. S. A. for three years before joining the B. S. O.

NOAH BIELSKI, born in Poland, studied in Philadelphia at the Curtis Institute—violin with the virtuoso, Efrem Zimbalist; chamber music with Louis Bailly, violist of the celebrated Flonzaley Quartet; orchestra playing under Fritz Reiner; composition with Rosario Scalero. He has been soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and with the B. S. O. played the Paganini Concerto in D Major, conducted by Munch. Twice he has given recitals in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the fulfillment of a beautiful dream by a great Bostonian—Henry Lee Higginson. As a music student in Europe before the Civil War he hoped for a career as a concert pianist but a nerve injury cost him control of his left hand.

After the War (he was wounded as a cavalry officer) he became partner in the firm known as Lee, Higginson & Co. He decided to share his wealth with his fellow Bostonians by financing an orchestra to rank with the great ones of Europe. For 37 years he developed the orchestra to his high artistic standards. Retiring in 1918, he turned the responsibilities over to a board of trustees that has remained always faithful to his ideals.

HERMAN SILBERMAN had the honor of becoming a pupil of Charles Martin Loeffler, the B. S. O. violinist who became famous as a symphonic composer. In Lugano, Switzerland, and in Brussels he studied further with Cesar Thomson and Charles Herman, respectively. Before joining the B. S. O. he was on the musical staffs of WNAC (violinist and assistant conductor), WEEI and WBZ. He also served with the Metropolitan Theater Orchestra. The city of Liege, Belgium, honored him by appointing him as judge in two successive International Competitions—first for compositions for string quartet, then for performance by string quartets. He is a native Bostonian.

STANLEY BENSON, Brockton-born, was thoroughly acclimated to the B. S. O. string choir before joining it. For no less than three of its members were his teachers: concertmaster Richard Burgin, Nicolai Kassman (a pupil of the renowned Leopold Auer), and Einar Hansen. This is the twentieth anniversary of Benson's entrance into the orchestra under Koussevitzky. He has a great knowledge of violins—also bows, of which he has a fine collection.

SHELDON ROTENBERG, native of Attleboro, studied in Boston with Winternitz, Burgin and Keller, and in Paris with Maurice Hewett and Enesco. Also, he is a graduate of Tufts, and attended the Sorbonne in Paris. For five years he was in the U. S. Army (1942-47), serving as captain in the Military Intelligence Service in England, France and Germany. As Chief Postal Censor he served in Berlin for a year. He joined the B. S. O. in 1948.

ALFRED SCHNEIDER earned the Bachelor and Master degrees at the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester, played a season with the Civic and Philharmonic orchestras of Rochester, also was a member of the Modern Art Quartet there. For four seasons he served with the Symphony Orchestra of his native St. Louis, and was a member meanwhile of the St. Louis String Quartet.

JULIUS SCHULMAN, before joining this orchestra in 1960, had served in the Philadelphia, the All-American Youth under Stokowski, the Pittsburgh (as assistant concertmaster) under Reiner, the New Orleans (as concertmaster) under Hilsberg, and the Little Orchestra Society of New York (concertmaster). He attended New York University, and at Curtis Institute was a pupil of Efrem Zimbalist and Jacques Malkin. He is a native of Brooklyn. For relaxation he produces 33 mm. candid camera shots, processes them in his own darkroom. He also is able to display 16 mm. travel movies of tours in India, Thailand, Ceylon, Hongkong, Japan and Russia.

GERALD GELBLOOM, a native of Toronto, attended the University of Hartford, studied violin in that city with Mischa Mischakoff, was for seven years concertmaster of the Hartford Symphony, was chairman of the String Department of the Hartford School of Music, was first violin of the Resident Quartet of the Hartt College of Music. After playing in the Symphony of the Air and the Casals Festival Orchestra in 1959 and 1959-61, respectively, he joined the B. S. O. in the latter year. He has taught at Wesleyan University.

RAYMOND SIRD, prior to joining this orchestra, served with the New Chamber Orchestra of Philadelphia, the National Symphony of Washington, D. C., the Cleveland Orchestra, and was assistant concertmaster of the New Orleans Philharmonic. He studied at the New School of Music in Philadelphia, in which city he was a violin pupil of Jascha Brodsky of the Curtis String Quartet, and a chamber music student with Orlando Cole, cellist of that ensemble. Sird's native heath is Worcester.

In next Sunday's Pictorial Living, the second violins will be introduced in another article in the series: "Meet the Boston Symphony Family."

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

JAN 22 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

THIRD OF A SERIES

Second Violins

A Musical Game of Give and Take

By LANING HUMPHREY

"WHAT IS a second violin?" is a query fired at some musician now and again. Actually, as a type of instrument, no such thing exists. It is the same as a first violin in every detail of its construction.

All violinists in an orchestra are listed as First Violins or Second Violins for reasons of what could be called operational convenience to serve the requirements of the composer. For one effect, he writes identical notes for the Firsts and Seconds to play together—that is, in unison. Again, desiring harmonic effects, he writes different parts, marked Violins I and Violins II. This is called playing with violins "divided." Naturally, the musicians must know who is to play the part marked I and who plays II. Another effect based on divided violins is a sort of dialogue—or game of give and take with the themes passed between Firsts and Seconds.

There are sixteen Second Violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (as against eighteen Firsts) and they also are seated in twos, headed by their own Principal and Assistant Principal.

CLARENCE KNUDSON, Principal, set an extraordinary record when he won acceptance into the orchestra just before his seventeenth birthday, after an audition by conductor Pierre Monteux in 1920. His promotion to head the Second Violins came in 1934 from Serge Koussevitzky. He was born in Lynn, grew up in Beverly, where he started training with his father, a devoted amateur musician. In Salem he had professional tutelage from Claude Phillips, then entered the New England Conservatory. There he studied with Timothee Adamowski, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of his own quartet, and esteemed early conductor of the Pops. Further studies were made with Richard Burgin and Nicolai Kassman.

The activities of Mr. Knudson include playing in chamber music groups such as the Chardon Quartet and the Zimbler Sinfonietta, and serving as a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center. Outside of music, he has taken keen enjoyment in tennis, skating, hiking, mountain climbing. An additional joy is that one of his four sons, Paul, has taken up a musical career as pianist. It was Paul who once thrilled an Esplanade Concert audience by substituting for a stricken piano soloist. After a fast drive from his Wellesley home, he appeared to be calm and collected as he played a concerto under Arthur Fiedler's direction.

WILLIAM MARSHALL, Assistant Principal, a native of Shreveport, Louisiana, joined the B.S.O. after membership in the Grant Park (Chicago) Symphony and the National Symphony in Washington, D.C. In combat service with the U.S. Army in World War II he was wounded, received the Purple Heart. He has appeared in recitals and in chamber music, twice has been Pops soloist, played in the Zimbler Sinfonietta on its South American tour. From Northwestern University he has a degree of Bachelor of Music, and from B.U. that of Master. At University of New Hampshire he was instructor in music for three years.

MICHEL SASSON was a child prodigy in his native Alexandria, Egypt, where his first teacher was his French father, an amateur violinist. His studies were continued at the Paris Conservatory, as a pupil of Marcel Reynal. After receiving First Prize by unanimous vote of a jury which included the virtuoso, Henryk Szeryng, he played in chamber concerts in Paris and London. Next he joined the Irish National Symphony Orchestra in Dublin. There he discovered a book of Bach violin sonatas edited by Richard Burgin. This so impressed him that he traveled to Boston to study with the author at the New England Conservatory. He became Concertmaster of the Conservatory Orchestra, and in 1959 joined the B.S.O. In the course of his career he has gained a knowledge of Arabic, Italian, Spanish, and some Gaelic.

SAMUEL DIAMOND, before joining the B.S.O., was Concertmaster for Victor Herbert's Orchestra. Born in Boston, he studiec there with two distinguished B.S.O. violinists—Emanuel Fiedler, father of the Pops conductor, and Charles Martin Loeffler, who gained fame as a symphonic composer. Lessons also were taken with the noted Felix Winternitz.

LEONARD MOSS attended the Peabody Conservatory in his native Baltimore, then the New England Conservatory and the Cleveland Institute. His professional experience before joining the B.S.O. was with the New Opera Co., the Ballet Theater, the Dallas and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Columbia Broadcasting Co. He is an avid student of literature, collects first editions.

WILLIAM J. WATERHOUSE was born in Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada. His early training had extraordinary advantages from his parents. For his father, John, a Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music in London, where he had studied with Emil Sauret, was a violinist and teacher of many successful players. His mother, a pianist and harpist, was a graduate of the Royal College of Music. The son was taught by the parents until he was 16, when he gained a scholarship to the Royal Academy. There he studied both violin and piano, winning a prize in the former subject, and also in chamber music. During the five years of the curriculum, he played under the conductorship of Sir Henry Wood. He also played in the Silverman Quartet, the Boyd Neel String Orchestra, the London String Orchestra, and the Stornaway Players. In London, he played under all the outstanding British conductors except Sir Thomas Beecham, with whom he finally caught up when he joined the Boston Symphony in October, 1951, and Sir Thomas arrived as guest conductor in January. He is a licensed airplane pilot, and has been doing his own flying when on tour with the Orchestra.

GIORA BERNSTEIN, born in Vienna, is a graduate of the Juilliard School in New York, holds a Master's degree from Brandeis University, and in 1966 gained that of Doctor of Music from B.U. He studied violin with Edouard Dethier, Richard Burgin and Joseph Silverstein. Before joining the B.S.O. he was Concertmaster for Goldovsky's Opera Theater Orchestra. He has served as conductor of the South Shore Youth Orchestra, and is a founding member of the Boston Chamber Music Society.

AYRTON PINTO came to Boston on a scholarship from the Brazilian Conservatory in his native Brazil to take post-graduate studies at the New England Conservatory. He was appointed Concertmaster of the Conservatory Orchestra. Soon after gaining his Master's degree and Artist's Diploma in 1957, he joined the B.S.O.

AMNON LEVY, a native of Tel-Aviv, studied five years at the Israel Conservatory, then, in turn, attended the Juilliard School in New York, and the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia. His teachers included Lorand Fenyves in Israel, and Ivan Galamian at Curtis. He came to the B.S.O. from the Los Angeles Symphony. It was due to the urging of Jascha Heifetz, who heard him in Israel, that Mr. Levy came to the U.S.A.

LASZLO JAMES NAGY is a New Yorker by birth. He is of Hungarian descent and takes interest in the fact that his teacher in New York, Zoltan Kurthy, was a native of Hungary, and a star pupil of the famous Hungarian virtuoso, Jeno Hubay. Instruction both in theory and in violin were given by Kurthy, who, incidentally, was principal viola of the New York Philharmonic Symphony. From the studio, Nagy went into the St. Louis Symphony under Golschmann, and remained fifteen years as a first violin—with the exception of one season when, during an emergency, he played viola. He was Concertmaster of the locally famous amateur St. Louis Philharmonic for four years ending when he joined the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitzky, in 1944.

(Mr. Nagy was on sick leave when the photo of the Second Violins was taken.)

MICHAEL VITALE stirred excitement in his home town of Keene, N.H., when he was violin soloist at a Children's Esplanade Concert at the age of ten. He attended the New England Conservatory, and at the Juilliard school was a pupil of Galamian. In Boston, he studied with Alfred Krips. His B.S.O. membership dates from 1964.

VICTOR MANUSEVITCH was born in Alexandrovsk, Russia. At the Petrograd Conservatory he was violin pupil of Kargneff; in Berlin, of Friedman—and finally his assistant. Still in Germany, he was active as a quartet player, and as an assistant professor in the Klindworth Conservatory. He joined this orchestra in 1944 under Koussevitzky. In World War II he served as conductor and music director of an Army Air Force Symphony Orchestra.

MINOT BEALE had his basic instruction in his native town of Rockland, Mass. from his father, a professional pianist and excellent music teacher. Violin training was received from Winternitz and Adamowski at the New England Conservatory. On graduation in 1922 Mr. Beale was appointed to the faculty, and remained with it until 1940. Meanwhile, in 1929, Koussevitzky admitted him to the B.S.O. He has made solo appearances throughout New England.

RONALD KNUDSEN was a member of the Detroit Symphony before entering the B.S.O. He studied at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, where he was a pupil of William Kroll, head of the Kroll Quartet, and for many years a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center—where Mr. Knudsen also studied.

MAX HOBART came to the B.S.O. from the Cleveland Orchestra. Previously he had been with the New Orleans Philharmonic and the National Symphony of Washington, D.C. He attended the Music School of the University of Southern California, and studied with Vera Barstow.

JOHN KORMAN is a native Californian and lists most of his musical career in that state. He also attended the University of Southern California as well as UCLA. His teacher was Eudice Shapiro, and he was a member of the Heifetz Master Class at USC in 1959. For the past two seasons he played with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and prior to that with the San Francisco Ballet.

In next week's Pictorial Living Coloroto Magazine the subject of "Meet the Symphony Family" will be the Violas.

Second Violins of the Symphony (left column front to rear in pairs, left to right in pairs): Clarence Knudson (Principal) and William Marshall; Michel Sasson and Samuel Diamond; Leonard Moss and William Waterhouse; Giora Bernstein and Ayrton Pinto; Michael Vitale and Victor Manusevitch. (Group of five at rear right, front row, left to right) Amnon Levy and Minot Beale, (back row) Max Hobart, Ronald Knudsen and John Korman. (L. J. Nagy was ill.)

207

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

JAN 29 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

FOURTH OF A SERIES

The Violas

The Instrument Berlioz Discovered'

By LANING HUMPHREY

LARGER than the violin by about one seventh, and tuned a fifth lower on the musical scale, the viola has a tone that has been described as more "masculine" than that of the violin. For a long time it was not considered to be suitable as a solo instrument, but as subordinate to the violin. It was used more or less as a bridge between the higher range of the violin and the lower range of the cello. At last, in 1834, the great French master of instrumentation, Hector Berlioz, demonstrated the latent capacities of the instrument by composing his great work, "Harold in Italy," for solo viola and orchestra. Ten years later, in his unsurpassed "Treatise on Instrumentation," he hurled this statement at composers:

"Of all the instruments in the orchestra it is the viola whose excellent qualities have been unappreciated for the longest time." He then praised its qualities in terms other composers heeded.

BURTON FINE, principal—or first—viola, is the first scientist to be a member of Boston's Symphony Orchestra. He has a Ph.D. in chemistry, and spent nine years as a research chemist with the Cleveland Center of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, before joining this orchestra. Although this may seem a baffling qualification for a musician, there is a logical explanation. A thorough musical training had been had by Mr. Fine at the Curtis Institute in his native Philadelphia, where he was a pupil of the noted Ivan Galamian. He played violin or viola in various chamber groups in the course of writing eighteen scientific papers, which included such subjects as chemical kinetics and thermodynamics. As a member of the B.S.O., he served in the rear rank of the second violins. When auditions were held to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Joseph de Pasquale as principal viola, Mr. Fine competed—and won.

REUBEN GREEN, assistant principal viola, is a native Bostonian. Starting with the violin, he was a pupil of Nikolai Kassman and Richard Burgin of the B.S.O. Continuing on the viola, he studied with Georges Fourel, also of the B.S.O., and with the Scottish virtuoso, William Primrose. He became a member of the New Friends of Music Orchestra under Fritz Stiedry. In various radio and recording engagements he played violin and viola on the same occasion. During three years in the U. S. Army in World War II he became a bandmaster, and developed an Army Orchestra which won second place in a national competition for such groups, with a number in which he was violin soloist. Auditioned by Mr. Munch, he joined the B.S.O. in 1950. He is a creative artist in ceramics and as a teacher of the subject has attained prize-winning status. That is to say, his charming wife was one of his pupils.

EUGEN LEHNER had as teachers two of the most noted musical figures of his native Hungary—Jeno Hubay in violin, Zoltan Kodaly in composition—when he attended the Budapest Conservatory. He also familiarized himself with the viola, which he played regularly after joining the Kolisch Quartet in 1936. For 13 years, until its disbandment, he remained a member. As a note of interest to "southpaw" readers, the head of the Quartet, Rudolph Kolisch, was one of the few left-handed violinists known to concert history. The ensemble also was famous, among other attributes, for being the first to play everything from memory—even difficult works of Schoenberg and Bartok. Many American tours were made by the group, ending with a concert in Chicago in 1935. On its return to Europe it disbanded. Koussevitzky, who knew of Lehner's ability, cabled him the opportunity—immediately accepted—to fill a vacancy in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the Berkshire Festival of 1935.

Violas of the Symphony: (Double row on right, front to rear and left to right by pairs) Reuben Green and Burton Fine (Principal); Albert Bernard and Eugen Lehner; Jerome Lipson and George Humphrey; Jean Cauhape and Robert Karol. (Group of four at left rear, left to right by pairs, front to rear) Earl Hedberg and Vincent Mauricci; Joseph Pietropaolo and Bernard Kadinoff.

ALBERT YVES BERNARD was born in the French capital. A law degree earned at Chaptal College there, and membership on the faculty of law at the University of Paris, are fascinating elements in his career. But in addition he was recipient of first prize in viola at the Paris Conservatory. He then played in the Concerts Colonne; the orchestra of the Paris Opera; and the Oberdoerffer Quartet. In 1925 Koussevitzky engaged him for this orchestra. He has played the ancient viole d'amour and pardessus de viole in concerts reviving music of early composers.

GEORGE HUMPHREY—By turn a manual laborer in a steel mill and a railroad maintenance clerk, he felt no ardent interest in music until nearly twenty. Then he became fascinated on hearing a phonograph record of Fritz Kreisler playing his "Caprice Viennois." He bought a cheap fiddle and tried to imitate what he heard. Finally he gave up, and placed himself under the instruction of a teacher in his small town. In six months he made such progress as to leave his teacher with nothing more to show him. Until the example set by this native of Bellaire, Ohio, there was no record in musical history of such proficiency after such a late start.

At 21 Humphrey arrived in Boston to study at the New England Conservatory on savings calculated to see him through a year. He studied violin with Eugene Gruenberg, and had to learn all over again. When money earned on a vacation proved too little to continue lessons, he was granted a scholarship for a year, then for two more. Meanwhile, he found that his large hands were more adaptable to the viola, and concentrated on it.

On graduation he was engaged by the Minneapolis Symphony in 1929, under Henry Verbruggen. Hoping to better himself, he quit after one season, and sought further training at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia. Being then 26, he was refused admittance as being three years over-age. But after an audition, Louis Bailly, famous violist of the Flonzaley Quartet, accepted him as a special student.

After a year he went seeking engagements, but this was the time of the great business depression. With a wife and two sons to support, he eked out fees for intermittent chances to play by washing dishes in a restaurant. Finally in 1934 Koussevitzky granted his request for an audition, and managed to have him added to the Boston Symphony's violas, although no vacancy existed at the time.

With amazing craftsmanship he made the viola on which he played for many seasons, and also made the bow. Also skillful with a camera, he served as official photographer of the B.S.O. on its transcontinental tours of 1953 and 1963, and the Asiatic one of 1960.

JEROME LIPSON, on scholarships, studied viola in his native Boston with Georges Fourel of the B.S.O.; in Philadelphia with Louis Bailly and Max Aronoff at the Gurtis Institute. He was a member of the school orchestra under the conductorship of Fritz Reiner. Shifting to Indianapolis, he became principal viola of its Symphony Orchestra under Fabien Sevitzky.

In World War II he was solo viola in the Army Air Force Symphony and in the Glenn Miller Orchestra. Also he toured the States in the orchestra of the Army's hit show, "Winged Victory," led by David Rose. He joined the B.S.O. in 1946.

JEAN CAUHAPE, as a mere boy, entered the Conservatory of his native town of Toulouse, France. First he studied violin, finally changed to viola. Concurrently he attended the St. Sylvestre Theological School. On completion of his musical courses in Toulouse, he won a scholarship in the Paris Conservatory, became a viola pupil of Maurice Vieux, and won first prize. Intermittently he dropped in to the Ecole des Beaux Arts for instruction in painting. The Conservatory training was followed by an engagement with the Lamoureux Concerts, and playing as a substitute in the Paris Opera orchestra. Auditioned by Koussevitzky, he joined the B.S.O. in 1925.

ROBERT KAROL started lessons at the age of five with Lloyd Moll, in his birthplace, Allentown, Pa. His studies were continued in Philadelphia with Sascha Jacobinoff. World War II stopped the lessons, but brought opportunities. In the Navy Medical Corps his duties were under the Morale administration. Attached for two years to the Naval Hospital in Philadelphia, then that of Pearl Harbor for another year, he was assigned to conduct a Naval band and a dance band.

On his discharge from service, he resumed study, attending the Philadelphia Musical Academy. There he was a violin pupil of Jani Zanto for a school year, then attended the Berkshire Music Center in the summer. Arriving with his violin, he learned that there was a viola vacancy in the school orchestra, and was allowed to take it. On his return to Philadelphia, he took up study of the viola with Carl Doktor.

In the little orchestra of the noted amateur, Edwin Fleischer, known as the Philadelphia Symphony Club, he was principal viola for two years during his studies—as he was in two summers at the Berkshire Music Center. Meanwhile, he also played in the Trenton, New Jersey, Symphony.

His playing at the Berkshires got him his first professional engagement. This was as viola principal of Saidenberg's Sinfonietta, with which he toured this country and Canada, in 1948-49. He was engaged by Munch for the B.S.O. in 1950.

Off stage he plays and teaches classical guitar. During the 1966-67 season he is playing in the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in Tokyo, while his B.S.O. chair is being taken by Konosuke Ono of that orchestra, in exchange.

VINCENT MAURICCI, a native Bostonian, studied violin at the Boston Music School with L. D. Scrivven; viola with Georges Fourel (on a scholarship), Joseph de Pasquale and William Primrose. He also took lessons on the piano and the tuba. Winning a place in Stokowski's original All American Youth Orchestra, he toured with it in South America. Under Mitropoulos he was a member of the Minneapolis Symphony from 1938 to 1942. After a year as principal viola, he entered the Army. Re-engaged after military service, he remained until 1949. During this time he was several times soloist with the orchestra, also gave recitals, and taught at the Minneapolis College of Music. He joined this orchestra in 1951.

EARL HEDBERG was born in Woonsocket, Rhode Island. Starting with violin and becoming a pupil of Sascha Jacobson, first violin of the Musical Art Quartet of New York, he subsequently studied viola for four years with Georges Fourel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1940 and 1941 he attended the Berkshire Music Center, and taught privately meanwhile. He returned to the Berkshire Music Center in 1946 and 1947. For nine seasons, 1946-55, he was a member of the Minneapolis Symphony—for the first four years under Mitropoulos; the last five under Antal Dorati, serving in the fifth season as principal viola. In 1955 he joined the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell. He was engaged for the Boston Symphony by Munch in 1956.

BERNARD KADINOFF is a New Yorker by birth. After studying with Nicolas Moldavan, Milton Katims, and Emanuel Vardi, he joined the N.B.C. Symphony under Toscanini. Auditioned by Charles Munch, he joined the B.S.O. in 1951. He has been soloist with the Boston Pops orchestra and he is active in chamber music groups. He teaches at Boston University and Wellesley College.

JOSEPH PIETROPAOLO, a native Bostonian, studied viola at the New England Conservatory with Joseph de Pasquale, at that time the B.S.O.'s principal violist. At Brandeis University he studied chamber music playing under Eugen Lehner of the B.S.O. He became interested in the oldtime viole d'amour and, on a Fulbright award, studied that instrument and the music of its era with Renzo Sabatini, principal viola of the Virtuosi di Roma. In 1959 he joined the B.S.O. under Munch. He creates expressionistic oil paintings.

In next Sunday's Pictorial Living Coloroto Magazine "Meet the Symphony Family" will introduce the members of the cello section.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

FEB 5 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

FIFTH OF A SERIES

The Cellos

The Love of Casals Fournier

By LANING HUMPHREY

NEXT lower in tone than the viola in the Boston Symphony Orchestra string section is the cello. Its scale begins a whole octave below that of the viola. Measuring nearly twice the length of the viola, overall—48½ inches against 25, and equipped with longer and thicker strings, it accordingly has more power and greater range of tone. In fact, it requires three staves to accommodate its full range of three and one half octaves.

Although it appears to have an undignifiedly short name for such an imposing instrument, it really has been stuck with a nickname. Until recent, impatient times it was known as a violoncello—which in Italian meant "little violone," and violone meant "big (or bass) viol." Hence, ridiculously, cello means simply "little."

Like the viola, the violoncello suffered long-drawn-out troubles in having its full potentialities realized. For many years it lagged behind in competition with the viola da gamba. The latter was smaller, held between the knees, and considered to have a refinement of tone quite preferable to the alleged boisterousness of the violoncello. But its possibilties were developed first by the early English master, Purcell, then by Bach and Handel.

Strangely, for a long time players of virtuoso rank were few and far between in musical annals. This situation has undergone vast changes for the better in modern times—with the accomplishments and fame of such distinguished exponents of the violoncello as Pablo Casals, Piatigorsky, Fournier, our American, Leonard Rose—and among the ladies, Garbusova and Nelsova. There are many more.

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has had some memorable experiences scattered between the West Indies and New England. In Puerto Rico for three seasons he had the advantage of working under the coaching and conducting of Pablo Casals. These invaluable associations he continued in Vermont, when the unrivaled Spanish cellist and conductor joined Rudolph Serkin's summer institute in Marlboro.

An exciting Eskin family episode took place at the opening of last summer's Pops season. Conductor Arthur Fiedler had scheduled the gifted young pianist, Eugene Indjic, to be soloist in the tricky Second Concerto of Rachmaninov. Close to the date, the youth fell ill. Thanks to the fact that Mr. Eskin's wife, Virginia, was an accomplished pianist acquainted with the concerto, the emergency was quickly met. Cellist Eskin, seated in the audience, happily joined the approving applause for pianist Eskin.

Violoncellos of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: (left to right) Martin Hoherman, Jules Eskin (Principal), Karl Zeise, Robert Ripley, Mischa Nieland, Luis Leguia, Richard Kapuscinski, Stephen Geber, John Sant Ambrogio, Carol Procter, Jascha Silberstein.

Prior to joining the B.S.O. as principal, Mr. Eskin had held the similar position with the Cleveland Orchestra for three years. His training had been at the Curtis Institute in his native Philadelphia. He was a pupil of Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Rose, and Janos Starker.

MARTIN HOHERMAN, assistant principal cellist in the Symphony season, and principal at the Pops, came to those posts by a devious and picturesque course. For example, he served with the British Army in the Middle East, Tobruk, India, and Ceylon during World War II. That was in behalf of his native Poland, then suffering Nazi oppression. His next destination, after military discharge, was Colombo, Ceylon. There he received appointment as Controller of Western Music. Afterward he settled in Canada, where he played in the orchestras of Winnipeg and Toronto, and conducted the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's program, "Music from Manitoba."

He began his studies at the Warsaw Conservatory at the age of seven, eventually became principal cello of the Warsaw Radio Symphony Orchestra, and later its conductor. Somewhere in his progress, he studied medicine. His musical abilities, in addition to playing cello, span piano, celesta, banjo, mandolin, guitar, zither, saxophone, and clarinet. He also composes and arranges music. Outside of his musical activities, he goes in for watchmaking and stamp collecting.

MISCHA NIELAND had professional musicians in his family—but with little discernible relation to playing the cello. His father was a trumpeter, his brother a timpanist. Somehow, Mischa decided to study violin in his native Philadelphia. His teacher was an Englishman, Henry Such. Then in the same city he became a cello pupil of the Hungarian, Stephen Deak. Moving to Baltimore, he studied cello at the Peabody Conservatory with Dican Alexanian, and showed such proficiency as to become his assistant.

Despite a promising career as cellist, what did he do but drop it to become a singer—a baritone with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company. This he gave up after three years to go back to the cello. Since the cello is the baritone of the string section of the orchestra, the vocal interlude may well have become an asset to this cellist.

The next three years found him playing in the Baltimore Symphony. Its conductor was Gustav Strube, who had been violinist in the B.S.O., a conductor of the Pops, and had achieved fame as one of the foremost American symphonic composers. (Ten of his major works were performed by the B.S.O., and his breezy march, "Cruiser Harvard," is still heard at the Pops.) In Baltimore, Mischa also played in the Harewood Quartet. But when he joined the B.S.O. he had been a member of the National Symphony, Washington, D. C., under the conductorship of Hans Kindler, and also had held membership in the Pro Musica Quartet.

KARL ZEISE has reversed the example of John Singer Sargent, who added to his distinction as a painter a considerable reputation as a pianist. The Zeise artistic talents have swung back and forth between music and painting. As a cellist, trained in his native Boston by the then B.S.O. principal, Alwin Schroeder, at eighteen be became the youngest member of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the conductorship of Leopold Stokowski. During nine seasons he alternated between his role of cellist and that of student of painting at the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. Changing to the Cleveland Orchestra, he was assistant principal for a season. As a teacher he gave instruction in chamber music and cello at the University of Idaho, and at the Yale Summer Music School at Norfolk, Conn. As a soloist he has played in Italy and Germany, as well as in this country. On a U. S. Government cultural mission he played in Iceland with a B.S.O. chamber group. During his membership in the B.S.O., he spent many summers studying with the noted watercolorist, Elliot O'Hara, in Kennebunkport, Me., and achieved excellent skill in the art. He also serves as Director of Art Exhibits at Symphony Hall.

RICHARD KAPUSCINSKI grew up in Milwaukee amid stimulating musical influences. His parents, his brothers and sisters, all sang in church choirs. In addition, each was an amateur performer on some musical instrument. The interest of a high school music teacher led him to study cello. Still in high school he won prizes in all-city competitions. Scholarships gave him the opportunity to study with Leonard Rose for a year in Cleveland, and with Felix Salmond at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia.

After experience in the W. P. A. Youth Orchestra, he became principal in the Philadelphia Opera Company; assistant principal in the Cleveland Orchestra under Szell; principal in the Baltimore Symphony under Reginald Stewart. He headed the cello department in the Peabody Conservatory, Baltimore; the Cleveland Music Settlement; the College of Music, Cincinnati; played in the La Salle Quartet. In 1955 he joined the B.S.O. under Munch, and teaches at the Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts.

ROBERT RIPLEY was a member of the Cleveland Orchestra when he joined the Armed Forces. He played in the Glenn Miller Air Force Orchestra in 1942-45, then rejoined the Cleveland Orchestra. While with that ensemble, he was quite active in quartet playing, which included educational concerts in schools. He also taught at the Cleveland Music School Settlement, 1948-55, gave faculty solo recitals, and played chamber music with Josef Gingold, concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra, and pianist Leonard Shure.

A native of Philadelphia, he attended its Curtis Institute for two years, eventually earned a Bachelor of Music degree after four years at the Cleveland Institute of Music. Over the years, his teachers included Jean Bedetti of the B.S.O., Felix Salmond, Ernst Silberstein. The summer before he joined the Army, he had a memorable experience at Tanglewood. He had been accepted for the second season for studies at the Berkshire Music Center. Then, because of war-time travel restrictions, the Festival, normally played by the B.S.O., was cancelled. The indomitable Koussevitzky, however, carried on with concerts by the crack student orchestra. Ripley was principal cello throughout the season.

JOHN SANT AMBROGIO was principal cello in the Seventh Army Symphony and the Harrisburg Symphony before joining the B.S.O. In the summer he is associate director of the Red Fox Music Camp at New Marlboro in the Berkshires. He was born in Glen Ridge, N. J., attended Lebanon Valley College in Annville, Pa. His cello teachers were Dican Alexanian, Leonard Rose, and Paul Olefsky. He also has been a teacher, at Ohio University.

LUIS LEGUIA played in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra before joining the B.S.O. Previously he had been a member of the Orchestras in Houston and Washington, D. C. He is a Juilliard graduate. His teachers have been Pablo Casals, Andre Navarra, Kurt Reher, and Leonard Rose.

JASCHA SILBERSTEIN was Assistant Principal of the Pittsburgh Symphony before coming to Boston. He was born in Stettin, Poland, and had his musical education there and in Germany.

STEPHEN GEBER came to the B.S.O. from Rochester, where he was principal cellist of the Eastman Philharmonia. He has also played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Eastman Rochester Symphony; and was solo cellist with the American Youth Symphony for two seasons. His teachers have included Gabor Rejto and Stephen Deak and, for four years at the Eastman School, Ronald Leonard. He is a native of Los Angeles.

CAROL ANN PROCTER before joining the B.S.O. had played in the Springfield Symphony, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, and the summer string quartet at the Peabody Institute. She studied at the Eastman School of Music with Ronald Leonard and the New England Conservatory from which she received Bachelor and Master of Music degrees. Her teacher at the Conservatory was Alfred Zighera, who was for many years, until his retirement in 1963, assistant principal cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Sunday in Pictorial Living's series "Meet the Symphony Family" our readers will be introduced to the basses of the Orchestra's string section.

209

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488

FEB 12 1967

Meet the Symphony Family

SIXTH OF A SERIES

The Double-Bass

Koussevitzky One of Three Masters

By LANING HUMPHREY

COMPOSERS in olden times wrote their instrumental music quite close to the pattern of a vocal quartet—the string instruments, for example, imitating the roles of soprano, alto, tenor and bass. For a while the low instrumental voice was the viola da gamba, which was smaller than the cello. Then a trend set in for composers to seek still lower tonal ranges. Accordingly, instrument makers produced what was called a bass viol, larger than the gamba, smaller than the cello, far from measuring up to the modern double-bass.

The size of the double-bass varied considerably at first, as did the quota of strings. These varied between three, four and five. The instrument used in the Boston Symphony and other orchestras of today usually has four strings, and stands six and a half feet tall. At first its function was merely to "double" the notes assigned to the cellos—that is, to play the same notes one octave lower.

The humble status of the double-bass was raised to importance by the "Paganini of the Contra-bass," the Venetian genius, Domenico Dragonetti. Self-taught, except for a very few lessons, he produced astonishing virtuoso effects never previously deemed possible on the big instrument. Beethoven was so impressed that he introduced an independent, brilliant, section for the double-basses in the scherzo-like Allegro of his Fifth Symphony, in 1808. When the bassists protested this music was unplayable, Beethoven retorted "Dragonetti could play it." Thus challenged, they managed to play the "unplayable."

As far as solo use of the double-bass is concerned, musical history lists just three performers of virtuoso rank—Dragonetti (1763-1846), Giovanni Bottesini (1821-1889), and Serge Koussevitzky (1874-1951).

GEORGES EDMOND MOLEUX, double-bass in the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1939, was on sick leave when the picture of his section was taken. He died December 7, 1966. At the Paris Conservatory he won first prizes in clarinet and double-bass. He was principal clarinet with the Monte Carlo Orchestra. He taught at New England Conservatory and at Berkshire Music Center and was a distinguished soloist.

HENRY S. FREEMAN, acting principal during the illness of Georges Moleux in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 85th season, is son of a musician whose professional career began in England and continued in the United States.

Young Freeman was awarded a four years' scholarship in the Eastman School of Music, where he studied piano with Ernestine Klinzing, and double bass with Nelson Watson. Meanwhile, as a sophomore he had become a member of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. Its conductor, Jose Iturbi, promoted him to the post of principal. He joined the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky.

Double-Bass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: (left to right) Joseph Hearne, Bela Wurtzler, Leslie Martin, John Barwicki, Henry Portnoi, Henri Girard, Henry Freeman (Principal), Irving Frankel. Mr. Freeman became principal when Mr. Moleux passed away.

IRVING FRANKEL, Austrian by birth, attended English High School in Boston, and the New England Conservatory where he was a pupil of Max Kunze, at that time the B.S.O.'s principal double bass. He is one of the earliest members of the Esplanade Orchestra.

HENRY PORTNOI first studied violin under the tutelage of the B.S.O.'s Nikolai Kassman. At the Curtis Institute he next became a double-bass pupil of Torella. Before joining the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky, he played in Stokowski's Youth Orchestra, the Indianapolis Symphony under the conductorship of Fabien Sevitzky, and the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner. He has taught at Boston University.

HENRI GIRARD took part in the exciting—in fact, riotous—first performance of Stravinsky's revolutionary "Rite of Spring," at the Theatre des Champs Elysees in Mr. Girard's native Paris. That was on the historic musical date of April 5, 1914. As a member of the B.S.O. he had the memorable experience of playing that music again—to an appreciative audience—on May 8, 1952, when the B.S.O. on its first European tour presented the work (now acknowledged as a masterpiece) at the same theater, under the same conductor—Pierre Monteux, who was acting as Charles Munch's alternate on the tour. The studies of Mr. Girard centered first on cello, in which he was first prize winner at the Paris Conservatory. Then turning to the double bass, he joined the orchestra of the famous musical theater, in which he played the opera repertoire and works of contemporary French composers. During World War I, he was Bandmaster of the 95th Regiment of the French Army. Afterward he was engaged for the B.S.O. by Monteux. He teaches at the Boston Conservatory.

JOHN BARWICKI is son of a violin pupil of Timothee Adamowski, who was B.S.O. violinist and also Pops conductor in nine early seasons. At first John studied piano. But the orchestra instructor at South Boston High School induced him to fill the need of a bass player mainly because he was the tallest student. He became a pupil of Max Kunze and joined the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky.

LESLIE MARTIN came to the B.S.O., under Munch, from the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, of which he had been principal. His education was at the Cornish School of Music, Seattle, Washington; the University of Washington, and American University, Chicago. Tall, and amply proportioned—the biggest figure, physically, in the B.S.O.—he is perversely known by his colleagues as "Tiny." This he takes in the good humor which never deserts him. He has made a study of humor according to his own thinking.

BELA WURTZLER, prior to joining the B.S.O., was assistant principal of the Detroit Symphony, concurrently taught privately, and made solo and chamber music appearances. Before his arrival in the United States after the Revolution in his native Hungary, he served for nine years as assistant principal in the Budapest Philharmonia Orchestra and the State Opera. He is a graduate of the Franz Liszt Academy and was a faculty member of the Conservatory of Pecs.

JOSEPH HEARNE served in the Portland, Oregon, Symphony, the Orchestra of America, and the Aspen, Colorado Festival Orchestra before entering the B.S.O. A pupil of Stuart Sankey at the Juilliard School, he became first desk player in its orchestra. Having won his license as an airplane pilot, he has been able to fly himself to some of the B.S.O.'s tour stops.

Next Sunday's continuation of the "Meet the Symphony Family" series will tell about the artists of flute, piccolo, oboe and English horn.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

FEB 19 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

SEVENTH OF A SERIES

Flutes and Piccolo

They Add Color to the Strings

By LANING HUMPHREY

THE woodwind instruments add contrasting tone quality—also called timbre, or "color"—to the tonal characteristics of the stringed instruments of the Boston Symphony and other orchestras. Included in the woodwind group are the flute and piccolo. The latter's name is short for piccolo flauto, or "little flute." Its short air chamber enables it to sound an octave higher than the flute. The other woodwinds are oboe, English horn, bassoon and clarinet. In early orchestra history, all were made of wood, but the modern flute and piccolo are metallic. Those of major orchestras are made of sterling silver. Even when all these instruments were constructed of wood, the flute and piccolo had—as they still have—a different timbre from that of other woodwinds.

That is because the sound of those two instruments is the direct result of blowing across a hole in the hollow tube. In contrast, the other woodwinds are provided with reeds, which are thin slips of bamboo. These are double in the oboe, English horn and bassoon, and single in the clarinet. The player's breath causes the reed or reeds to vibrate, thus producing a timbre distinctive from that of the non-reed instruments. It is a nasal quality of tone.

Primitive man produced crude flutes of hollowed bones. Centuries later, baked clay was used. In the 1600s, composers used two types—end-blown, like a whistle; and side-blown, as in today's flute. The end-blown type was called a recorder (from the old verb, to record, or sing), sweet flute, or English flute. The side-blown type was called the transverse flute, or German flute. In works of Johann Sebastian Bach, flute meant recorder.

AT FIRST the transverse flute was provided only with finger holes. Keys were added very gradually. Today's flute, which has thirteen padded keys and two trill keys is the end result of lifelong scientific studies and practical musical tests by the German flute virtuoso and inventor, Theobald Boehm. This genius died at the age of 87 in 1881, the founding year of the B.S.O. The first Boehm flute, which began a revolution in construction and fingering, dates from 1832.

DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, principal flutist with the Boston Symphony, conferred on the orchestra simultaneously a superb first flute, and a storm of controversy. All that the then Miss Anthony had to do to create the uproar was to be a woman. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its seventy-one preceding seasons had never appointed a woman to be a principal player. There had been feminine second harps and a third bassoon. But a first position obviously was considered beyond feminine scope in this orchestra. To be one of its firsts meant to be a foremost player on a worldwide basis —therefore a man. It meant to be a person with leadership over the men in a whole orchestral unit therefore not a woman. Boston had ignored the fact that in recent times a few women had been given principal posts in other orchestras.

Photo by Earl Ostroff

Flutes and piccolo section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Pictured are (l. to r.) piccolo, Lois Schaefer; flutes, Phillip Kaplan, James Pappoutsakis, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal.

The brilliant flute section of the Boston Symphony had been headed for more than three decades by the great Georges Laurent, whose playing was one of the particular glories of the orchestra. With his retirement impending in 1952, concertgoers and critics busied themselves trying to guess the name of the right man to succeed him. In late September of 1952 conductor Charles Munch announced:

"At Tanglewood I auditioned many flute-players. The best was Miss Doriot Anthony of the Los Angeles Philharmonic."

Laurent himself had helped audition the young lady and had approved the appointment. Actually, Doriot Anthony came to her new position as an extremely well-equipped flutist. Her lessons began at the age of eight with her mother, an excellent player with a powerful tone. Ralph Johnson, a devoted pupil of Laurent, who had moved from Boston to Illinois, became the second teacher of Doriot in her native town of Streator. In all, her teachers included Ernest Liegl, first flute of the Chicago Symphony, Georges Barrere, Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School, and the famous first flute of the Philadelphia Orchestra, William Kincaid.

Her professional career included membership in the National Symphony in Washington, D. C., the C.B.S. studio in New York; and a tour with the Leonid Massine Ballet Company. She also played solo flute in the Bach Festival at Carmel, California, and for six years second flute with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. For three summers of that period she was principal flute of the Hollywood Bowl concerts, having been chosen by their eminent conductor, Bruno Walter.

As principal flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer has proved her fitness to the satisfaction both of Boston critics and those of American and European cities visited on the orchestra's tours—despite her not being a man.

JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS, was born in Cairo, Egypt. His parents were Greek. Boston was the scene of his training. There, at the New England Conservatory, he took a full course, which included flute studies with Laurent. Later he joined the faculty of his Alma Mater, and those of the Longy School, Wellesley College, and Boston University. He has long been principal flute of the Pops Orchestra, and served in the same capacity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch on its Australasian Tour of 1960 (Mrs. Dwyer being on leave). In addition, he has been soloist with the Zimbler Sinfonietta on its tour of Latin America, and soloist with the Cambridge Society for Early Music.

PHILLIP KAPLAN, a graduate of the New England Conservatory, was a pupil there of Laurent. Developing a great interest in music of the Baroque period, he has made a number of recordings representative of composers of that era. He also became artistic director of Music Antiqua.

LOIS SCHAEFER, piccolo and flute, had served as principal flute of the New York City Opera Company, and assistant principal with the Chicago Symphony before becoming a regular member of the B.S.O. in 1963. She earned the degree of Bachelor of Music at the New England Conservatory, where she was a pupil of Laurent. She also attended the Berkshire Music Center.

Next Sunday "Meet the Boston Symphony Family" will consider the double-reed woodwinds.

211

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

FEB 26 1967

New England Newsclip

Meet the Symphony Family

EIGHTH OF A SERIES

Oboes and English Horn

Woodwinds With the Double Reeds

Photo by Bob Howard

The double reed woodwinds (oboes and English horn) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Left to right: Ralph Gomberg, Principal; John Holmes, Hugh Matheny and Laurence Thorstenberg (English horn).

By LANING HUMPHREY

THIS PHOTOGRAPH of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's oboes and English horn points up vividly a special characteristic of these instruments (and also of the bassoon, which will be discussed in a later article). Note the pursed lips of the musicians. That is because they must place the reeds between their lips, which they have to draw over their teeth. Then they feed their breath through the narrow slot between the two reeds, which at the lower end are bound around a little tube which fits into the top of the instrument. The player must keep up a steady thin stream of air, while almost holding his breath—a neat trick.

He can obtain an infinite variety of effects—general and personal—by manipulation of the tension of his lips, and his breath control. He also can obtain extra results from selecting his reeds with meticulous care, and even improving them by working on them with a knife and a gentle abrasive. And at all times he must prepare for rehearsal and concert by keeping the reeds pliant by constant moistening with his tongue.

The name oboe is an Anglicized version of the French haut bois, or high wood. That was not to mean that it was higher than the wooden flutes, but higher than some other double reed instruments of the 1500s, which were called low woods. As far back as 2800 B.C., Babylonian records disclose oboes in use. Such instruments also were known to the ancient Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans.

Many followers of music have been baffled by the name English horn. A humorous definition was once offered by the B.S.O.'s famous player, Louis Speyer, now retired. According to him, "the English horn is so called, because neither is it English nor a horn, but in reality an alto oboe." More light on the question seems to be supplied by a study of an early example of the instrument in the Casadesus Collection at Symphony Hall. About half way of its long length it is bent at a sharp angle. Hence, it may have been known originally by the French words for "angled horn" (cor angle), which was misunderstood as cor anglais, or English horn. As to the word horn, the instrument flares out at the end, in a sort of pear shape.

RALPH GOMBERG, principal, showed talent for the oboe so early that at 14 he was accepted as a student at the Curtis Institute by its famous oboist, Marcel Tabuteau. Three years later he was engaged as principal in Leopold Stokowski's All-American Youth Orchestra, on its South American tour, and the following one in the United States. Navy service occupied him for four years, then he joined the Baltimore Symphony. His next post was as principal of the New York Center Symphony, under the conductorship of young Leonard Bernstein. Then, after serving with the Mutual Broadcasting Orchestra, he returned to his native city to serve as the B.S.O.'s principal under Munch. He teaches at Boston University and the New England Conservatory.

JOHN HOLMES, the second oboe, started his musical studies at the piano keyboard at the age of seven, and continued until about fifteen. He added trumpet during the last three years of his piano studies. At Cleveland High School in his second year he switched to oboe under the tutelage of Bert Gassman of the Cleveland Orchestra (later principal of the Los Angeles Philharmonic). Continuing with Robert Bloom and Robert Sprenkle at the Eastman School, University of Rochester, he earned his Bachelor's degree, then attended the Berkshire Music Center. Before joining the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky, he had played in the orchestras of Oklahoma City, Kansas City, Buffalo, Washington, D. C., and St. Louis. He has been heard in recital, has played solos on the Latin American tour of the Zimbler Sinfonietta, and at the Pops and Esplanade Concerts.

HUGH MATHENY, native of Norfolk, Virginia, came to the Boston Symphony from the Indianapolis Symphony, in which he was principal oboe, 1960-64, under the conductorship of Izler Solomon. Previously he had played in New York for a year in the Symphony of the Air. As a student he attended Baltimore's Peabody Conservatory, then in New York earned the B.S. degree at the Juilliard School. There he was a pupil of the New York Philharmonic Symphony's principal oboe, Harold Gomberg (brother of the B.S.O.'s principal, Ralph), also studied piano with Erno Balogh, and orchestra playing with Jean Morel. He was himself a teacher of oboe, at the Jordan College of Music at Butler University, 1960-64.

LAURENCE THORSTENBERG, English horn, a native of Salt Lake City, was a member of the Utah Symphony under Werner Janssen after military service. For two years before, 1944-46, he was a U. S. Army infantryman, taking part in three battles of World War II, and being promoted to the grade of Staff Sergeant. In his last year of this service, he was principal oboe in the G.I. Symphony in Europe. Back in civilian life, after his engagement with the Utah orchestra, he played in the Baltimore Symphony, was principal oboe in the Dallas, Grant Park (Chicago) and Ravinia Festival (Chicago) Concerts. With the Chicago Symphony under Fritz Reiner he was assistant principal oboe. Also with it he played English horn, as he did with the Philadelphia Orchestra on its European tour of 1958. That orchestra's famous principal oboe, Marcel Tabuteau, was his teacher at Curtis Institute, of which Thorstenberg is a graduate.

Next Sunday's article in the "Meet the Symphony Family" series will take up the clarinets and bassoons.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650
MAR 5 1967 New England

Photos by Bob Howard

Making up the clarinet section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are (l. to r. at upper left) Rosario Mazzeo, bass clarinet; Peter Hadcock, E flat, Pasquale Cardillo and Gino Cioffi, principal. In the bassoon section are (l. to r. above) Sherman Walt, principal; Ernst Panenka, Matthew Ruggiero, Richard Plaster, contra bassoon. (85th season photos.)

Meet the Symphony Family

NINTH OF A SERIES

Clarinets and Bassoons

Mozart's 'Lordly' Instrument

By LANING HUMPHREY

THE clarinet was the last instrument to be accepted as a regular, constantly-useful member of the orchestra. Until Mozart was twenty-two, the single reed instrument was unknown to him. Then, in 1778, he heard the famous Mannheim Orchestra, which had two clarinets. The youth wrote to his father, "Oh, if only we had clarinets. You can't guess the lordly effect of a symphony with flutes, oboes, and clarinets." That same year he included clarinets in his "Paris" Symphony. As a Mason, he became acquainted with a masterly player and improver of the clarinet, Anton Stadler. For him he composed several works which beautifully displayed the virtues of the clarinet as a solo instrument. By the time of Beethoven's First Symphony (1801), the clarinet—usually in pairs, like flutes and oboes—had become a standard unit of an orchestra. Its tone is more full-bodied than that of the oboe, much less nasal. The Boston Symphony Orchestra boasts of a superb clarinet section.

GINO CIOFFI, principal, did not dally with other instruments, but at the age of seven began lessons with his clarinetist father in his native Naples, Italy. Majoring in his favorite instrument at the Naples Conservatory, he was graduated at the age of seventeen. As solo clarinet he played throughout Italy in concert, opera and symphony concerts.

Coming to this country, he served with the orchestras of Pittsburgh (under Fritz Reiner), Cleveland (under Rodzinsky and Leinsdorf), the N. B. C. (under Toscanini), and the New York Philharmonic (under Bruno Walter). He came to the B.S.O. under Charles Munch with a world of experience and reputation. His most cherished compliment is a comparison of his playing with the singing of a great vocalist. He teaches clarinet at B. U.—while son Albert teaches trumpet. Son Andrew is a U. S. Army Band assistant principal clarinet.

PASQUALE CARDILLO, of North Adams, at first reluctantly studied violin, but was permitted also to take up clarinet, his real love. He had some instruction from his father, a band player, then from Alphonse Pelletier and Louis Pagerey. He won a scholarship at the New England Conservatory, and became a pupil of Victor Polascheck, then the B.S.O.'s principal clarinetist. The summer after his graduation he was engaged during an emergency at the Berkshire Music Festival to play the high-pitched E-flat clarinet. He so distinguished himself that he was welcomed to the B.S.O. by Koussevitzky as the regular player of that instrument. He teaches at the New England Convervatory and at B. U.

PETER HADCOCK, E-flat clarinet, came to the B.S.O. from the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, where he was principal clarinet. Previously he had served with the Rochester Philharmonic. He is a graduate of the Eastman School.

ROSARIO MAZZEO, bass clarinet, not only is a "walking encyclopedia" on the history of the clarinet, but has contributed to its history by inventing two new instruments of the family. First, he developed a bass producing still deeper tones. Next, he designed a B-flat clarinet which offers special advantages, and is being produced in Paris. Offstage, this native of Pawtucket, R. I. is acknowledged as an authority on birds.

The Bassoons

Composers and instrument makers in the 1500's kept working for deeper and deeper tones. In the case of the bassoons, they went to great lengths indeed. For the ancestor of today's contra-bassoon —a double-reed instrument called a bombard— measured nine feet and eight inches in length, and required a man to help carry it, and a man to blow it. Modern makers simply double the tube of the bassoon back on itself, so that a nine-foot tube shrinks to 53 inches. The contra-bassoon, producing tones an octave deeper than the regular one, if its four folds were straightened, would measure sixteen feet!

SHERMAN WALT, principal, was born in Virginia, Minnesota. At age five he became a violin student, changed to bassoon at twelve. Five years later he had won financial assistance from Dmitri Mitropoulos. On a scholarship at the Curtis Institute, he studied oboe with Marcel Tabuteau, and bassoon with Ferdinand del Negro. For two years he served as an infantryman with the 83d Division —taking part in the Normandy Invasion, and winning the Bronze Star. He became principal bassoonist with the Chicago Symphony and was engaged for the same post with the B.S.O. in 1953.

ERNST PANENKA took piano lessons at age six in his native Vienna. Because of a vacancy in a school orchestra, he switched to bassoon. Tutelage on that instrument under Strobl, the Vienna Opera's principal, led to his engagement by the Volksoper of Vienna. He joined the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky. In the Pops season he is principal bassoonist. He is an amateur astronomer, with a telescope for which he did his own lens-grinding.

MATTHEW RUGGIERO came to the B.S.O. in 1961 after serving in the National Symphony of Washington, D. C., and in Rudolf Serkin's Marlboro (Vermont) Music Festival, in which he was principal. His training was first at the New School of Music in his native Philadelphia, then at the Curtis Institute. As deep as the tones of his bassoon is his knowledge of violins, and his skill in "re-hairing" bows.

RICHARD PLASTER, contra-bassoon, is a North Carolinian, born in Winston-Salem. For three years he was a bassoonist in the North Carolina Symphony. Next came service in the U. S. Army Ground Forces Band in 1946-48. In New York's Juilliard School he was a pupil of Simon Kovar. He joined the B.S.O. under Munch in 1952.

Next Week's "Meet the Symphony Family" will discuss the trumpets and horns of the orchestra.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 132,650

MAR 5 1967

New England Newsclip

Photos by Bob Howard

Making up the clarinet section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are (l. to r. at upper left) Rosario Mazzeo, bass clarinet; Peter Hadcock, E flat, Pasquale Cardillo and Gino Cioffi, principal. In the bassoon section are (l. to r. above) Sherman Walt, principal; Ernst Panenka, Matthew Ruggiero, Richard Plaster, contra bassoon. (85th season photos.)

Meet the Symphony Family

NINTH OF A SERIES

Clarinets and Bassoons

Mozart's 'Lordly' Instrument

By LANING HUMPHREY

THE clarinet was the last instrument to be accepted as a regular, constantly-useful member of the orchestra. Until Mozart was twenty-two, the single reed instrument was unknown to him. Then, in 1778, he heard the famous Mannheim Orchestra, which had two clarinets. The youth wrote to his father, "Oh, if only we had clarinets. You can't guess the lordly effect of a symphony with flutes, oboes, and clarinets." That same year he included clarinets in his "Paris" Symphony. As a Mason, he became acquainted with a masterly player and improver of the clarinet, Anton Stadler. For him he composed several works which beautifully displayed the virtues of the clarinet as a solo instrument. By the time of Beethoven's First Symphony (1801), the clarinet—usually in pairs, like flutes and oboes—had become a standard unit of an orchestra. Its tone is more full-bodied than that of the oboe, much less nasal. The Boston Symphony Orchestra boasts of a superb clarinet section.

GINO CIOFFI, principal, did not dally with other instruments, but at the age of seven began lessons with his clarinetist father in his native Naples, Italy. Majoring in his favorite instrument at the Naples Conservatory, he was graduated at the age of seventeen. As solo clarinet he played throughout Italy in concert, opera and symphony concerts.

Coming to this country, he served with the orchestras of Pittsburgh (under Fritz Reiner), Cleveland (under Rodzinsky and Leinsdorf), the N. B. C. (under Toscanini), and the New York Philharmonic (under Bruno Walter). He came to the B.S.O. under Charles Munch with a world of experience and reputation. His most cherished compliment is a comparison of his playing with the singing of a great vocalist. He teaches clarinet at B. U.—while son Albert teaches trumpet. Son Andrew is a U. S. Army Band assistant principal clarinet.

PASQUALE CARDILLO, of North Adams, at first reluctantly studied violin, but was permitted also to take up clarinet, his real love. He had some instruction from his father, a band player, then from Alphonse Pelletier and Louis Pagerey. He won a scholarship at the New England Conservatory, and became a pupil of Victor Polascheck, then the B.S.O.'s principal clarinetist. The summer after his graduation he was engaged during an emergency at the Berkshire Music Festival to play the high-pitched E-flat clarinet. He so distinguished himself that he was welcomed to the B.S.O. by Koussevitzky as the regular player of that instrument. He teaches at the New England Convervatory and at B. U.

PETER HADCOCK, E-flat clarinet, came to the B.S.O. from the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, where he was principal clarinet. Previously he had served with the Rochester Philharmonic. He is a graduate of the Eastman School.

ROSARIO MAZZEO, bass clarinet, not only is a "walking encyclopedia" on the history of the clarinet, but has contributed to its history by inventing two new instruments of the family. First, he developed a bass producing still deeper tones. Next, he designed a B-flat clarinet which offers special advantages, and is being produced in Paris. Offstage, this native of Pawtucket, R. I. is acknowledged as an authority on birds.

The Bassoons

Composers and instrument makers in the 1500's kept working for deeper and deeper tones. In the case of the bassoons, they went to great lengths indeed. For the ancestor of today's contra-bassoon—a double-reed instrument called a bombard—measured nine feet and eight inches in length, and required a man to help carry it, and a man to blow it. Modern makers simply double the tube of the bassoon back on itself, so that a nine-foot tube shrinks to 53 inches. The contra-bassoon, producing tones an octave deeper than the regular one, if its four folds were straightened, would measure sixteen feet!

SHERMAN WALT, principal, was born in Virginia, Minnesota. At age five he became a violin student, changed to bassoon at twelve. Five years later he had won financial assistance from Dmitri Mitropoulos. On a scholarship at the Curtis Institute, he studied oboe with Marcel Tabuteau, and bassoon with Ferdinand del Negro. For two years he served as an infantryman with the 83d Division—taking part in the Normandy Invasion, and winning the Bronze Star. He became principal bassoonist with the Chicago Symphony and was engaged for the same post with the B.S.O. in 1953.

ERNST PANENKA took piano lessons at age six in his native Vienna. Because of a vacancy in a school orchestra, he switched to bassoon. Tutelage on that instrument under Strobl, the Vienna Opera's principal, led to his engagement by the Volksoper of Vienna. He joined the B.S.O. under Koussevitzky. In the Pops season he is principal bassoonist. He is an amateur astronomer, with a telescope for which he did his own lens-grinding.

MATTHEW RUGGIERO came to the B.S.O. in 1961 after serving in the National Symphony of Washington, D. C., and in Rudolf Serkin's Marlboro (Vermont) Music Festival, in which he was principal. His training was first at the New School of Music in his native Philadelphia, then at the Curtis Institute. As deep as the tones of his bassoon is his knowledge of violins, and his skill in "re-hairing" bows.

RICHARD PLASTER, contra-bassoon, is a North Carolinian, born in Winston-Salem. For three years he was a bassoonist in the North Carolina Symphony. Next came service in the U. S. Army Ground Forces Band in 1946-48. In New York's Juilliard School he was a pupil of Simon Kovar. He joined the B.S.O. under Munch in 1952.

Next Week's "Meet the Symphony Family" will discuss the trumpets and horns of the orchestra.

213

Photos by Bob Howard

Symphony Orchestra's French Horns: (l. to r.) Ralph Pottle, Osbourne McConathy, Charles Yancich, Paul Keaney, Thomas Newell, Harry Shapiro and James Stagliano, Principal.

The Symphony's Trumpets: (left to right) Armando Ghitalla, Principal; Andre Come, Roger Voisin and Gerard Goguen.

Meet the Symphony Family

TENTH OF A SERIES

French Horns, Trumpets

The Great Blenders

By LANING HUMPHREY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, as do other symphony orchestras of modern times, recognizes the individual characteristics of the French horn and the trumpet.

The horn is the great blending instrument. It is an agreeable companion for either strings or woodwinds, in harmony and counterpoint. As a melodic instrument it is suavely expressive in joyful or in melancholy mood. In contrast the trumpet lends punctuation to some orchestral passages, blood-tingling excitement to other.

Tchaikovsky brilliantly exploits the individual qualities of the horn and the trumpet in his last three symphonies: the horn's pathos in the Andante Cantabile of No. 5, the excitement of the trumpets in the opening movement of the 4th symphony.

Horns are so-called because centuries ago they were made from animal horns. Even when made from elephant tusks and called "oliphants" they were also referred to as horns. The horn obviously was of conical shape, widening progressively from mouthpiece to opposite end. Trumpets, in contrast, tended to have cylindrical bores until widening slightly to the flare called the "bell."

The French Horns

JAMES STAGLIANO, Principal, moved with his parents to Detroit from southern Italy, where he was born six years before. His father, Joseph, a professional teacher, instructed him in solfeggio and horn. He studied with his uncle Albert, principal horn with the Detroit Symphony. James left high school to join the Gabrilowitsch orchestra at sixteen.

Four years later he became principal in the St. Louis Symphony, then served in the same capacity with the Chicago Symphony; the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Cleveland Symphony.

With all this experience back of him, he was still only thirty-four when Koussevitzky installed him as principal of the B.S.O. Off stage, Stagliano is expert at two widely contrasting pursuits—golf, in which he has won prizes, and mycology (that is, the study of the mushroom family).

CHARLES YANCICH, Alternate Principal, a native of Hammond, Indiana, majored in music at the University of Michigan, was graduated with a Bachelor's degree in music education. He then became a pupil of the Chicago Symphony's principal horn, Philip Farkas. When he joined the B.S.O. under Munch, at the age of 28, he had been principal of the Indianapolis Symphony. During World War II, he served as a U. S. Army bandsman at Fort Sheridan, Ill.

HARRY SHAPIRO, a native Bostonian, could hardly have escaped interest in the horn. His father, Max, played that instrument in the opera companies of Boston and Chicago, and toured Europe with another company conducted by Pietro Mascagni, composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Harry studied at the New England Conservatory and the Juilliard School.

Professional experience was acquired in radio stations of New York and Boston, and in the People's Symphony of Boston, conducted by Fabien Sevitzky. He joined the B.S.O. in 1937, under Koussevitzky. Beginning in 1944 he served two years in the Army Air Forces Band. Like Stagliano, he likes golf and he is a good hand with carpenter's tools.

THOMAS NEWELL came to the B.S.O. in 1963 from the Houston Symphony, where he had been principal horn. His experience also included playing in the St. Louis Symphony, the Santa Fe Opera, and the Army Air Forces Band.

PAUL KEANEY, whose old home town was Beverly, Mass., took courses at the Longy School in Cambridge. Privately, he studied horn with two B.S.O. experts, Heinrich Lorbeer, and Willem Valkenier, and entered the B.S.O. in 1937 under Koussevitzky.

OSBOURNE McCONATHY is the son of a noted musical educator, author, and conductor, for whom he was named. At New York University, Osbourne studied musicology, composition, and conducting. He studied horn privately with Joseph Franzl and Anton Horner in New York, and at the Juilliard School, he was baton pupil of Stoessel. Prior to joining the B.S.O. in 1944, he had served as principal horn of the National Symphony of Washington, D. C., and of the Rochester (N. Y.) Philharmonic.

RALPH POTTLE, after earning his BA and BM at Southeastern College in his native Louisiana, continued his studies at the New England Conservatory where he received his Master's degree in music. He was a pupil of two B.S.O. horn players—William Valkenier, now retired, who had served as principal, and James Stagliano, present principal. Pottle is an instructor at Boston University.

The Trumpets

ARMANDO GHITALLA, Principal trumpet, started playing trumpet in his native town of Alpha, Ill., at the age of eight. In due course he took up academic studies at Illinois Wesleyan and New York University. After three years in the Navy, he entered the Juilliard School on a G.I. grant, became a pupil—and proved to be a brilliant one— of Vacchiano, principal trumpet of the New York Philharmonic Symphony. He came to the B.S.O. in 1951. At the Pops and Esplanade Concerts he often has been soloist. As an off-stage diversion, he journeyed to the jungles of Brazil to hunt jaguars, and returned with three pelts.

ROGER VOISIN busily shifts around among the posts of alternate principal and third trumpet in the symphony season, and principal at the Pops. Born in Angers, France, he grew up in suburban Boston—West Roxbury—where he became a Boy Scout bugler. Then his father, the late Rene Voisin of the B.S.O., began giving him trumpet lessons. On the invitation of Arthur Fiedler, some of the exercises were used by Roger, still a boy, at Esplanade Concerts, to recall musicians after intermission. Koussevitzky admitted him to the B.S.O. in 1935 when he was only seventeen—the youngest player ever to join the brass section—and he was seated beside his father. In World War II, he served as trumpeter, instructor, and conductor at the U. S. Navy Training Station at Newport, R. I. He teaches at B.U. His pupils include a very brilliant teen-ager. This is his son, Peter, with whom he has played duets in a number of concerts.

ANDRE COME had the good fortune to have as his uncle the excellent B.S.O. trumpeter and teacher, Marcel Lafosse. While still at high school in his native Newton, Mass., Andre trained with his uncle. For four years he played in the U. S. Air Force Band. Then he resumed studies with Lafosse at the Berkshire Music Center.

GERARD GOGUEN grew up with an interesting family musical background. Three uncles were amateur practitioners of, respectively, French horn and piano, drums, and violin. Born in Rumford, Me., he eventually attended Fitchburg, Mass. High School. At the New England Conservatory, on a Dickson scholarship, he was a trumpet pupil of Georges Mager, B.S.O. principal; also studied piano, theory and history of music. At the Berkshire Music Center he was a scholarship student. He joined the B.S.O. under Munch in 1952.

In the next installment of "Meet the Symphony Family" readers will be introduced to the trombones, tuba and timpani.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 422,650

MAR 19 1967

New England Newsclip

Photos by Bob Howard

Boston Symphony Orchestra Trombones: (Picture on left l. to r.)—William Gibson, Principal, William Moyer, Kauko Kahila, Josef Orosz. Tuba: K. Vinal Smith. (Picture on right) Timpani, Everett Firth.

Meet the Symphony Family

ELEVENTH OF A SERIES

Trombones, Tuba and Timpani

The Important Back Row

By LANING HUMPHREY

FAR in the back of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a section of instruments of foremost importance in the achievement of many orchestral effects—the trombones, tuba and timpani, or kettledrums. Many instruments used today are the result of long years of evolution. In contrast, trombones and kettledrums have remained fundamentally unchanged in the course of centuries. Kettledrums were brought to Europe by the Crusaders toward the close of the 13th century. Trombones (meaning, in Italian, "big trumpets") were in use a century later. King Henry VIII of England, maintained ten trombonists. The massive tuba, used as a bass to the trombones, had to await the nineteenth century for its creation. Tonally, it is not quite of trombone character. Its three feet of coiled tubing has a long cone at the bell end like a French horn, and is cylindrical in the middle, like a trumpet or trombone and it has trumpet-like pistons.

Of course, the range of tones in a wind instrument depends on the length of the air tube. But the trombonist, pushing the slide through seven positions from close to his mouth down to his farthest reach, has the equivalent of seven instruments in one. As a result, he can play in any key.

The kettledrums are tunable, unlike those struck instruments of the percussion variety which are of indefinite pitch. Although composers originally used them in sets of two in different sizes, a third and fourth, also of graduated size eventually came into the orchestra. Each kettledrum yields but a single tone, but that one can be set by changing the tension of the drumhead—by hand, by the attached tuning screws, or by a pedal device.

The Trombones

WILLIAM GIBSON, Principal trombone, an Oklahoman, attended his State University two years, then became a temporary Pennsylvanian. In Philadelphia he studied trombone with Charles Gerhardt at Curtis Institute, and orchestral interpretation with Marcel Tabuteau. He played trombone in the Philadelphia Orchestra for two years, then was principal in the Pittsburgh Symphony for a decade. Joining the B. S. O. as principal under Munch in 1955, he taught at the New England Conservatory and Tanglewood. Among many others, he has taught his sons—but how to slide for a plate on the baseball diamond, rather than how to slide for seven positions on a trombone. However, they settled down to musical training. Stan is a trumpet pupil of the B. S. O.'s Gerard Goguen, plays it at Pollard Junior High School in Needham. His older brother, Charles, is a French horn pupil of B. S. O.'s Harry Shapiro, plays in the Greater Boston Youth Symphony. Father and boys have been working together on the "Trio for Trumpet, French Horn, and Trombone" by the late noted French composer, Poulenc.

WILLIAM MOYER is Ohio born, educated and trained. He took up academic subjects at Oberlin College, and at Oberlin Conservatory, studied composition with Herbert Elwell and trombone with Arthur Williams, then Thomas Cramer. He joined B. S. O. in 1952. When not playing trombone, he enjoys developing his skill on the end-blown flute of Shakespeare's time, called the recorder, which in recent years has been undergoing great revival. Composing is another avocation of Mr. Moyer. He has produced mostly chamber music, but an orchestral score is in progress.

KAUKO KAHILA, of Finnish descent, was born in Norwood, Mass. When the B. S. O. visited Finland on its European tour of 1956, his acquaintance with his forebears' language proved handy. He studied at the New England Conservatory and the Berkshire Music Center and was a pupil of Valdemar Lilleback of the B. S. O. He joined the B. S. O. in 1952. In World War II he played in the Air Force Band. In the role of inventor, he has designed a "double valve bass trombone," which produces deeper tones than usually possible on a trombone.

JOSEF OROSZ at the age of eleven was organist in the church of which he was a communicant in his native Toledo, Ohio. Eventually he enrolled at the Boston Conservatory. There he majored in piano and trombone, and was graduated with highest honors in both subjects. After joining the B. S. O. in 1942 under Koussevitzky, he became an instructor in brass instruments at his Alma Mater. His son, Josef, Jr., has carried on the paternal interests as a band leader with the U. S. Army at Ft. Polk in Leesville, La.

The Tuba

KILTON VINAL SMITH, tuba, bears a middle name that betokens his birthplace, Vinal Haven, Me. In Boston, at 13, he became a trombone pupil of Jacob Raichman, at the time principal in the B. S. O. Enlisting in the Navy in 1943 as a musician, he was assigned to duty at the Naval Training Station at Newport, R. I., then the Naval School of Music at Washington, D. C. After honorable separation in 1945, he joined the B. S. O. trombones under Koussevitsky, later changed to tuba. He has a deep interest in the plays of Shakespeare.

Timpani

EVERETT FIRTH, Principal, when awarded that post in 1955 at the age of 25 was the youngest B. S. O. principal in 70 years. (Franz Kneisel in 1885 became concertmaster at the age of 20.) He was a graduate of the New England Conservatory. There and at Tanglewood Mr. Firth's instructors included B. S. O. members Lawrence White, Charles Smith, and timpanist Roman Szulc. At the Julliard School he also had been a pupil of Saul Goodman, timpanist of the N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony. In 1952, under Munch, he joined the B. S. O.'s percussion section. When Szulc retired three years later, Firth became his successor. His activities have included teaching at his Alma Mater, the composition of three works for percussion ensembles, and the authorship of six text books. Between such pursuits, he has hunted jaguar in Brazil, and the fierce Kodiak bear in Alaska.

Next Sunday in Pictorial Living "Meet the Symphony Family" will introduce the B. S. O. percussion and harps.

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 432,650

MAR 2 6 1967

New England Newsclip

Photos by Bob Howard

Percussion players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (left picture, l. to r.), Charles Smith, Principal; Arthur Press, assistant timpanist; Harold Thompson and Thomas Gauger. The Symphony's Harps: Bernard Zighera, Principal, and Olivia Luetcke. Miss Luetcke, among four women in orchestra, was first to join.

Meet the Symphony Family

TWELFTH OF A SERIES

Percussion and Harps

'Always Ready' Players

By LANING HUMPHREY

THE percussionists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—or any other orchestra—unlike other players, do not have a settled type and number of instruments from concert to concert. It would seem not too far-fetched to call the percussionists "The Marines of the Orchestra," since they must be "always ready" for any emergency.

Whatever the audience sees in action on one program, the percussionists always are equipped with vast reserves for future needs. To illustrate, a scrub-board for washing dolls' clothes is one of the treasures of the percussion storeroom in Symphony Hall. Keeping it company is a piece of railroad rail, a French taxi horn, a telegraph key, an odd-looking typewriter, and a wind machine. These are just a few of the sound-making devices which B. S. O. percussionists have been called upon to manipulate in obedience to demands of composers aiming to achieve special effects of punctuation in their music.

The scrub-board was used in the first B.S.O. performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," conducted by Pierre Monteux in 1924. A stick passed briskly over the corrugations of the board produced the desired effect in the Sacrificial Dance in Part II. Conductor-composer Daniele Amphitheatrof specified the piece of rail for his "American Panorama," performed in 1938. George Gershwin wanted a taxi horn for his "An American in Paris." The telegraph key was used to sound the guiding beam for an aviator in Samuel Barber's "Airforce Symphony." To meet the demands of Leroy Anderson's Pops fun piece, "The Typewriter," an old machine was supplied with a metal plate on which the type bars can be struck more loudly than they could be on paper. The wind machine is the instrument longest in service of this group, having taken part in Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" since its first B.S.O. performance in 1904.

CHARLES SMITH, Principal, also is conductor of the Boston University Percussion Ensemble, which has performed some attractive music composed by him. He is a faculty member. Before joining the B. S. O. in 1943 under Koussevitzky, he had had the valuable experience of taking part in 600 performances of George Gershwin's folk opera, "Porgy and Bess," on tour with Alexander Smallens conducting. A native of Newark, N. J., he attended New York's Juilliard School. His teachers included Alfred Fricse, Saul Goodman, and Gene Krupa.

HAROLD THOMPSON came from the Cincinnati Symphony and the Cincinnati Zoo Opera, in 1952 under Munch. Born in Akron, Ohio, he attended the Cincinnati Conservatory for two years. In the same city he studied with George Carey and Fred Noak; in Cleveland with Charles Wilcoxon; in Chicago with Roy Knapp. He has a fascinating stock of information on the effects possible with cymbals, and also enjoys making sticks to improve the results from various struck instruments.

ARTHUR PRESS was solo percussionist with New York's Radio City Music Hall before entering the B.S.O. in 1956 under Munch. He also played percussion in the Little Orchestra Society of New York. Born in Brooklyn, he attended the Juilliard School on a scholarship, studied with Morris Goldenberg and Saul Goodman. Besides his activities with the B. S. O. percussion team, he serves from time to time in the capacity of assistant timpanist. He also is a member of the Boston Percussion Ensemble.

THOMAS GAUGER attended the State University of his native state, Illinois. At that school he played in the orchestra, concert and football bands, percussion and wind ensembles. His teachers were Paul Price and Jack McKenzie, and ultimately Everett Firth in Tanglewood. He became principal percussionist at the Saskatoon, Canada, Festival, then held the similar post with the Oklahoma City Symphony. At Oklahoma City University, and the State University, he taught percussion, as he also did to twenty private pupils. A snare drum solo composed by him has been published.

The Harpists

BERNARD ZIGHERA, Principal, studied piano at the Conservatory of his native Paris with the celebrated Isidor Philipp, and with Santiago Riero. With Marcel Tournier he studied harp. He joined B.S.O. as principal harpist in 1826, under Koussevitzky. Since then he has made many appearances as harp soloist, and also has been solo pianist with the orchestra. As founder and conductor of the Zighera Chamber Orchestra, he presented several seasons of distinguished programs.

OLIVIA LUETCKE is a native New Yorker, and a graduate of the New England Conservatory. She came to the B. S. O. in 1951, under Munch, from the San Antonio, Texas, Symphony with which she had been principal. She holds the similar post with the Pops and the Esplanade Concerts. At the age of six she began lessons on the harp, eventually became a pupil of Zighera. When she joined the B.S.O., she was the only woman member, but has become one of four. Outside of music, she has two sharply contrasting interests—horseback riding, and breeding pedigreed Chihuahuas.

The Librarians

VICTOR ALPERT, head librarian, is a graduate of the New England Conservatory, where he was a violin pupil of the B.S.O.'s Paul Federovsky, then took up viola with two B.S.O. principals, Georges Fourel and Joseph de Pasquale. His professional experience before joining the B.S.O. in 1953 under Munch included playing in the Indianapolis Symphony, Radio City Music Hall Orchestra, and as assistant principal viola in the Minneapolis Symphony for three years. He is a native Bostonian.

WILLIAM SHISLER, assistant librarian, an Oregonian by birth and early education, was awarded a Bachelor's degree in violin, and a Master's in viola at the New England Conservatory. His viola teachers there were Fourel and de Pasquale. Before joining the B.S.O. as assistant librarian in 1957 under Munch, he had played in the Springfield, Mass., Symphony, and Arthur Fideler's Pops Tour Orchestra.

MORNING UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
COMB. CIRC. 45,750

MAR 10 1967

New England Newsclip

Concert Tonight Of Spring 'Pop' Set in Concord

CONCORD — Tijuana Brass and Bizet's "Carmen" are usually not accepted as the first signs of spring, but tonight's concert here by the N. H. Philharmonic Orchestra at Rundlett Junior High opens the spring "pop" season with bright and bold modern brass as well as classical selections from the works of Von Weber, Prokofieff, and Offenbach.

Under the direction of Rolland Tapley of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic will present a program of all-time favorites. Featured as soloist for the spring opener is Salvy Cavicchio, marimba artist, known for his ability to involve the audience in program participation. Tonight will be no exception, as unsuspecting patrons will find themselves on stage playing "Blue Bells of Scotland" and "The Bells of St. Mary's" under Cavicchio's tutelage.

Concert time is 8:15 p.m. and Philharmonic sponsors are invited to attend the performance. Season tickets will be honored at this concert, as well as at the remaining three concerts of this eighth season of spring pops.

Cavicchio will be guest artist at both the March 17 program at the Consolidated School, Peterborough and the April 16 program at the Practical Arts Auditorium in Manchester.

Guest soloist for the final of the spring pop series, April 23, at St. Paul's School in Concord, is Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Selections to be played by the Philharmonic at tonight's concert are: "Jubel Overture" by Von Weber, "Lieut. Kije Suite" by Prokofieff, "Orpheus in the Underworld" by Offenbach, and selections from Jerome Kern's "Showboat." In addition to the audience participation portion of the program, the brass section of the N.H. Philharmonic will join Cavicchio in a Herb Albert group of tunes which range from "Spanish Flea" to "Tijuana Taxi."

Tickets for the concert may be purchased at Rundlett Junior High.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100

MAR 25 1967

New England Newsclip

Framingham Orchestra Plays for the Joy of It

FRAMINGHAM — Take an electronics engineer and put him on cello, a secretary on flute, a psychiatrist on clarinet and add a few elementary and high school students on violin and to all that include a lot of enthusiasm and the finished product is the community orchestra.

They aren't out to take the orchestral world by storm. During a rehearsal break last night, the director Alfred Schneider of Framingham and a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra made it clear that — "We are not looking for perfection just enthusiasm and enjoyment."

The byproduct of the enjoyment, however, has been a "professional" orchestra which has performed before public audiences here several times this year. Much of their sheet music is borrowed. They have little expense money other than that raised by cake sales and contributions.

Nevertheless, the orchestra, with about 30 members from towns including Hopkinton, Holliston, Natick and Framingham, have joined to form an orchestra with the full complement of instruments.

Verne Peloquin of Hopkinton a music teacher and one of the few professional musicians in the orchestra wrapped it up saying, "We come from all walks of life except music."

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

APR 15 1967

Boston Symphony On a 2-Wk. Tour

ROCHESTER, N. Y. — The Boston Symphony began a two-week tour here last Monday (3), its longest tour in four years. Other stops are Toledo (4), Bloomington, Ind. (5), Chicago (6, 7), Ann Arbor, Mich. (8), New London, Conn. (10), Philadelphia (11), Philharmonic Hall (12, 14), Brooklyn (13), and Carnegie Hall (15). Erich Leinsdorf will conduct each of the 12 concerts. Pianist Evelyne Crochet will be soloist at Carnegie Hall and Brooklyn's Academy of Music. A new version of Gunther Schuller's "Dintych" will receive its first New York performances during the Philharmonic Hall concerts.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,850

MAR 23 1967

New England Newsclip

Wellesley Symphony Concert At Junior High Auditorium April 2

Spring, certainly not aided by the weather — at least at this writing, — will be welcomed at the Wellesley Junior High School Auditorium on Sunday evening, April 2 when the Wellesley Symphony will present its Eighteenth Annual Spring Concert. Under the direction of Rolland Tapley, the Symphony has achieved renown throughout the New England States and we of Wellesley are justly proud of our community Symphony. Sponsored by the Wellesley Recreation Commission, the Symphony is maintained by the dues of its members and the generous support of the many friends of the Orchestra. The Annual Fund Raising Drive, under the Chairmanship of Mrs. Henry Kriebel, has flourished to a near unprecedented degree this season. The concerts are presented free of charge to all music enthusiasts so the survival of the Symphony depends largely on the response to the Fund Raising Drive. All contributions are welcome!

The final concert of this outstanding season will feature as soloist, Roger Shermont, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Brahms Violin Concerto, and Tschaikowski's Pathetique Symphony completes the program. Mr. Shermont is a native of Paris and gained prominence as soloist with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch playing the exacting Brahms Concerto which he will perform with the Wellesley Symphony. He has appeared extensively both in Europe and the United States and we welcome him in Wellesley, April 2, Sunday evening at 8 p.m. No admission is charged and no tickets are required. Notice cards displayed in key areas are reminders only. Won't you make your plans to be with us at the Jr. High Auditorium for an evening of the finest musical delights! All are welcome. The concert is a delightful way to introduce new residents to the advantages of OUR TOWN. Spread the word and lets make this evening one to remember for the Orchestra as well as ourselves!

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,250

MAR 22 1967

New England Newsclip

HE MAKES IT SING: Chester Schmitz, new performer on the bass tuba in the Boston Symphony Orchestra explains to Michael Shain, (left) Robert Shain, (center) and John Dukakis the operation of the bass tuba. The boys are grandchildren of Harry Dickson, the violinist in the orchestra. Fellow players of brass instruments say that Schmitz draws beautiful singing tones from the bass tuba instead of just thunderous "oompas." AP Wirephoto

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

MAR 17 1967

New England Newsclip

Tuba Concert

Chester Schimitz, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a slolo tuba recital at Jordan Hall, on Wdenesday at 8:30 p.m. The program will include Bach's Suite in D minor for solo cello; Spiliman's Concerto for tuba and Hindemith's Sonate. Judith Ryder Gerber will be piano accompanist. The concert is free.

Niagara Falls Gazette
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
D. 34,911 SUN. 33,734

AUG 8 1966

FELIX A. VISCUGLIA

Orchestra Post Given Falls Man

Felix A. Viscuglia, a Niagara Falls clarinetist, has accepted a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to start in September.

Mr. Viscuglia is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Felix Viscuglia, 485 21st St. He and his wife, the former Miss Mary Malinverni, will reside in Lexington, Mass. They have two daughters, Donna and Lisa Viscuglia.

Mr. Viscuglia will play in a program of "Pops" during the winter season and in the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lexington, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony.

He also will continue as a faculty member of the New England Conservatory of Music and as a member of the music department of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Cambridge, Mass.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

MAR 23 1967

New England Newsclip

Schmitz Solos at Jordan Hall

His Tuba Has Oomph, but...

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Chester Schmitz is the Boston Symphony's new tuba player. His work with the orchestra has been first-rate, characterized by clear and firm tone and by excellent pitch, and his solo recital, too, left one with the best possible impression of his ability. He played Wednesday night at Jordon Hall.

In the late thirties, Hindemith set out to provide competently composed sonatas for orchestral instruments that were studied in conservatories, but that had hardly any presentable solo literature. The Tuba Sonata is one of the most attractive pieces in the series.

As in most of Hindemith's works, the rhythmic and harmonic invention is stereotyped, but within the limits of his routine, he has exploited the tuba's limitations and strengths with resourcefulness and some humor. Technically, the Sonata in no way expands the horizons of the tuba world, but the writing for the instrument itself is effective, as is the way sound is made to go with that of the piano.

I don't know who Robert A. Spillman is. His Concerto is a witless Hindemith imitation ground out with sufficient competence to earn him an A in a classroom, though it does not even begin to use the instrument interestingly. It was, in fact, precisely this sort of non-music that made Hindemith come to the rescue with his sonata series.

And the Bach: when one hears, say Bach's harpsichord music played by Gustav Leonhardt, one is struck by how idiomatic the writing is for the instrument, and that in itself becomes one of the sources of one's pleasure in the music. One can, on the other hand, hear Bach played in all kinds of colors other than those Bach imagined or new, then to be reminded how much of the life of the music is independent of the accident of instrumentation.

Schmitz is one of many musicians, like Ward Swingle or Rosalyn Tureck, who like to perform Bach even though they have to do it in transcription. When Bach's cello music is done on the tuba, the player has to cope with the hazards that go with an instrument that speaks slowly, that is extremely resonant, on which clear articulation of rapid passages in a low register is nearly impossible, and on which multiple stops cannot be executed. In so far, however, as the player can work around those problems, an artistic performance is altogether possible.

There was in Schmitz's performance the inescapable sense of witnessing a tour de force, and there were some blurred passages, but in movements like the Prelude and the Sarabande, in which the instrument was not hurried beyond its practicable gait, one could hear Bach's music with pleasure, and one was aware not just of the player's great technical competence, but of his admirable taste and sense of phrasing as well.

In the Spillman and Hindemith pieces, in which he was a little pallidly partnered by Judith Gober, Schmitz also played with a refined and varied tone, even with delicacy, with nicely shaped phrases, and in tune. And, in a way, the most beautiful playing of all came in an encore, Faure's "Apres un reve," a song cellists often play, and which Schmitz gave with a glowing, noble sound, and with fine phrasing.

Admirable though it was, there is not much future in tuba recitals unless one were to come up with music that sheds new light on the instrument in the way that some of the recent writing for flute or bass does. Chester Schmitz's superior skill and art will be best enjoyed in the context of his work with the Symphony.

HOW IT WORKS—Boston Symphony's new bass tuba player, Chester Schmitz, discusses the instrument with Robert Shain and John Dukakis, grandchildren of violinist Harry Dickson. Schmitz gave a recital last night in Jordan Hall. (AP)

CHESTER SCHMITZ, tuba, playing Bach's Suite in D minor, BWV 1008 (originally for violoncello), and, with Judith Geber, piano, Robert A. Spillman's Concerto and Hindemith's Sonata. Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall.

MORNING UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
COMB. CIRC. 45,750
MAR 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Concert Tonight Of Spring 'Pop' Set in Concord

CONCORD — Tijuana Brass and Bizet's "Carmen" are usually not accepted as the first signs of spring, but tonight's concert here by the N. H. Philharmonic Orchestra at Rundlett Junior High opens the spring "pop" season with bright and bold modern brass as well as classical selections from the works of Von Weber, Prokofieff, and Offenbach.

Under the direction of Rolland Tapley of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic will present a program of all-time favorites. Featured as soloist for the spring opener is Salvy Cavicchio, marimba artist, known for his ability to involve the audience in program participation. Tonight will be no exception, as unsuspecting patrons will find themselves on stage playing "Blue Bells of Scotland" and "The Bells of St. Mary's" under Cavicchio's tutelage.

Concert time is 8:15 p.m. and Philharmonic sponsors are invited to attend the performance. Season tickets will be honored at this concert, as well as at the remaining three concerts of this eighth season of spring pops.

Cavicchio will be guest artist at both the March 17 program at the Consolidated School, Peterborough and the April 16 program at the Practical Arts Auditorium in Manchester.

Guest soloist for the final of the spring pop series, April 23, at St. Paul's School in Concord, is Armando Ghitalla, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Selections to be played by the Philharmonic at tonight's concert are: "Jubel Overture" by Von Weber, "Lieut. Kije Suite" by Prokofieff, "Orpheus in the Underworld" by Offenbach, and selections from Jerome Kern's "Showboat." In addition to the audience participation portion of the program, the brass section of the N.H. Philharmonic will join Cavicchio in a Herb Albert group of tunes which range from "Spanish Flea" to "Tijuana Taxi."

Tickets for the concert may be purchased at Rundlett Junior High.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100
MAR 25 1967
New England Newsclip

Framingham Orchestra Plays for the Joy of It

FRAMINGHAM — Take an electronics engineer and put him on cello, a secretary on flute, a psychiatrist on clarinet and add a few elementary and high school students on violin and to all that include a lot of enthusiasm and the finished product is the community orchestra.

They aren't out to take the orchestral world by storm. During a rehearsal break last night, the director Alfred Schneider of Framingham and a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra made it clear that — "We are not looking for perfection just enthusiasm and enjoyment."

The byproduct of the enjoyment, however, has been a "professional" orchestra which has performed before public audiences here several times this year. Much of their sheet music is borrowed. They have little expense money other than that raised by cake sales and contributions.

Nevertheless, the orchestra, with about 30 members from towns including Hopkinton, Holliston, Natick and Framingham, have joined to form an orchestra with the full complement of instruments.

Verne Peloquin of Hopkinton a music teacher and one of the few professional musicians in the orchestra wrapped it up saying, "We come from all walks of life except music."

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,850
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Wellesley Symphony Concert At Junior High Auditorium April 2

Spring, certainly not aided by the weather — at least at this writing, — will be welcomed at the Wellesley Junior High School Auditorium on Sunday evening, April 2 when the Wellesley Symphony will present its Eighteenth Annual Spring Concert. Under the direction of Rolland Tapley, the Symphony has achieved renown throughout the New England States and we of Wellesley are justly proud of our community Symphony. Sponsored by the Wellesley Recreation Commission, the Symphony is maintained by the dues of its members and the generous support of the many friends of the Orchestra. The Annual Fund Raising Drive, under the Chairmanship of Mrs. Henry Kriebel, has flourished to a near unprecedented degree this season. The concerts are presented free of charge to all music enthusiasts so the survival of the Symphony depends largely on the response to the Fund Raising Drive. All contributions are welcome!

The final concert of this outstanding season will feature as soloist, Roger Shermont, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Brahms Violin Concerto, and Tschaikowski's Pathetique Symphony completes the program. Mr. Shermont is a native of Paris and gained prominence as soloist with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch playing the exacting Brahms Concerto which he will perform with the Wellesley Symphony. He has appeared extensively both in Europe and the United States and we welcome him in Wellesley, April 2, Sunday evening at 8 p.m. No admission is charged and no tickets are required. Notice cards displayed in key areas are reminders only. Won't you make your plans to be with us at the Jr. High Auditorium for an evening of the finest musical delights! All are welcome. The concert is a delightful way to introduce new residents to the advantages of OUR TOWN. Spread the word and lets make this evening one to remember for the Orchestra as well as ourselves!

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,250
MAR 22 1967
New England Newsclip

HE MAKES IT SING: Chester Schmitz, new performer on the bass tuba in the Boston Symphony Orchestra explains to Michael Shain, (left) Robert Shain, (center) and John Dukakis the operation of the bass tuba. The boys are grandchildren of Harry Dickson, the violinist in the orchestra. Fellow players of brass instruments say that Schmitz draws beautiful singing tones from the bass tuba instead of just thunderous "oompas." AP Wirephoto

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
APR 15 1967

Boston Symphony On a 2-Wk. Tour

ROCHESTER, N. Y. — The Boston Symphony began a two-week tour here last Monday (3), its longest tour in four years. Other stops are Toledo (4), Bloomington, Ind. (5), Chicago (6, 7), Ann Arbor, Mich. (8), New London, Conn. (10), Philadelphia (11), Philharmonic Hall (12, 14), Brooklyn (13), and Carnegie Hall (15). Erich Leinsdorf will conduct each of the 12 concerts. Pianist Evelyne Crochet will be soloist at Carnegie Hall and Brooklyn's Academy of Music. A new version of Gunther Schuller's "Dintych" will receive its first New York performances during the Philharmonic Hall concerts.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAR 17 1967
New England Newsclip

Tuba Concert

Chester Schimitz, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a slolo tuba recital at Jordan Hall, on Wdenesday at 8:30 p.m. The program will include Bach's Suite in D minor for solo cello; Spiliman's Concerto for tuba and Hindemith's Sonate. Judith Ryder Gerber will be piano accompanist. The concert is free.

Niagara Falls Gazette
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
D. 34,911 SUN. 33,734
AUG 8 1966

FELIX A. VISCUGLIA

Orchestra Post Given Falls Man

Felix A. Viscuglia, a Niagara Falls clarinetist, has accepted a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to start in September.

Mr. Viscuglia is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Felix Viscuglia, 485 21st St. He and his wife, the former Miss Mary Malinverni, will reside in Lexington, Mass. They have two daughters, Donna and Lisa Viscuglia.

Mr. Viscuglia will play in a program of "Pops" during the winter season and in the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lexington, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony.

He also will continue as a faculty member of the New England Conservatory of Music and as a member of the music department of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Cambridge, Mass.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
MAR 23 1967
New England Newsclip

Schmitz Solos at Jordan Hall

His Tuba Has Oomph, but...

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Chester Schmitz is the Boston Symphony's new tuba player. His work with the orchestra has been first-rate, characterized by clear and firm tone and by excellent pitch, and his solo recital, too, left one with the best possible impression of his ability. He played Wednesday night at Jordon Hall.

In the late thirties, Hindemith set out to provide competently composed sonatas for orchestral instruments that were studied in conservatories, but that had hardly any presentable solo literature. The Tuba Sonata is one of the most attractive pieces in the series.

As in most of Hindemith's works, the rhythmic and harmonic invention is stereotyped, but within the limits of his routine, he has exploited the tuba's limitations and strengths with resourcefulness and some humor. Technically, the Sonata in no way expands the horizons of the tuba world, but the writing for the instrument itself is effective, as is the way sound is made to go with that of the piano.

I don't know who Robert A. Spillman is. His Concerto is a witless Hindemith imitation ground out with sufficient competence to earn him an A in a classroom, though it does not even begin to use the instrument interestingly. It was, in fact, precisely this sort of non-music that made Hindemith come to the rescue with his sonata series.

And the Bach: when one hears, say Bach's harpsichord music played by Gustav Leonhardt, one is struck by how idiomatic the writing is for the instrument, and that in itself becomes one of the sources of one's pleasure in the music. One can, on the other hand, hear Bach played in all kinds of colors other than those Bach imagined or new, then to be reminded how much of the life of the music is independent of the accident of instrumentation.

Schmitz is one of many musicians, like Ward Swingle or Rosalyn Tureck, who like to perform Bach even though they have to do it in transcription. When Bach's cello music is done on the tuba, the player has to cope with the hazards that go with an instrument that speaks slowly, that is extremely resonant, on which clear articulation of rapid passages in a low register is nearly impossible, and on which multiple stops cannot be executed. In so far, however, as the player can work around those problems, an artistic performance is altogether possible.

There was in Schmitz's performance the inescapable sense of witnessing a tour de force, and there were some blurred passages, but in movements like the Prelude and the Sarabande, in which the instrument was not hurried beyond its practicable gait, one could hear Bach's music with pleasure, and one was aware not just of the player's great technical competence, but of his admirable taste and sense of phrasing as well.

In the Spillman and Hindemith pieces, in which he was a little pallidly partnered by Judith Gober, Schmitz also played with a refined and varied tone, even with delicacy, with nicely shaped phrases, and in tune. And, in a way, the most beautiful playing of all came in an encore, Faure's "Apres un reve," a song cellists often play, and which Schmitz gave with a glowing, noble sound, and with fine phrasing.

Admirable though it was, there is not much future in tuba recitals unless one were to come up with music that sheds new light on the instrument in the way that some of the recent writing for flute or bass does. Chester Schmitz's superior skill and art will be best enjoyed in the context of his work with the Symphony.

HOW IT WORKS—Boston Symphony's new bass tuba player, Chester Schmitz, discusses the instrument with Robert Shain and John Dukakis, grandchildren of violinist Harry Dickson. Schmitz gave a recital last night in Jordan Hall. (AP)

CHESTER SCHMITZ, tuba, playing Bach's Suite in D minor, BWV 1008 (originally for violoncello), and, with Judith Gober, piano, Robert A. Spillman's Concerto and Hindemith's Sonata, Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall.

217

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Tribune-Advocate
SANFORD, Maine
Weekly Circ. 6,597
SEP 1 1966

EVERETT J. FIRTH

Everett J. Firth Listed In "Who's Who In The East"

Everett Joseph Firth, solo timpanist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra and son of Mr. and Mrs. Everett E. Firth of 239 Main street, has been named to Who's Who in the East", a biographical dictionary of noteworthy men and women of the Middle Atlantic and Northeastern States and Eastern Canada. This is the 10th edition of the book which is published by Marquis-Who's Who Inc., Cnicago, Ill.

He joined the symphony orchestra in 1952 at the age of 21, being its youngest member for many years, and has performed with the orchestra in nearly every major city of the world and with the world's foremost conductors.

Firth is head of the Timpani and Percussion Department at the New England Conservatory of Music, and the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As well as teaching, he coaches percussion ensembles and chamber music at both schools. Firth has been at the Conservatory since 1950 and at Berkshire since 1956.

He became solo timpanist with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops in 1956, has toured US and foreign countries with the two groups, and also has made many recordings with both on RCA Victor, Mercury Records and Columbia Records among others. In addition, he has authored many musical compositions.

Born at Winchester, Mass., on June 2, 1930, son of Everett Emmanuel and Rosemary Scandura Firth, he graduated from Sanford High School and from the New England Conservatory of Music in 1952 with a Bachelor of Music with distinction. Firth is a member of Phi Kappa Lambda and Phi Mu Alpha.

He has designed timpani and snare drum sticks which have been manufactured in this country for several years. Firth also has been in business two years as USA and Canadian dealer of Germany-made timpanies. He currently is in Europe in connection with "Vic Firth Enterprises" concerning his timpani dealership. He will return from an extended three-week trip abroad in mid-September.

Firth was married in 1960 to Miss Olga Kwasniak and they have a daughter, Kelly Victoria. The family resides at 3 Pine Wood road, Dover, Mass.

ITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Wednesday, April 12, 1967

Senators Given a Music Lesson

Recording Artists Spin Song of Copyright Royalties

By ROLAND POWELL
Buffalo Evening News Bureau

WASHINGTON, April 12 — Members of a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee leaned back in their leather chairs Tuesday and listened to the strains of the Mickey Mouse Song, heard Senator Dirksen compared to singer Roisemary Clooney, and learned something about jazz, country songs and classical music.

It was all part of a variety program staged by some of the bright names in music recording.

Sultry chanteuse Julie London had to be the star with her smoky version of "Now's the time to say goodbye to all our company; M-i-c K-e-y M-o-u-s-e."

Royalties Urged

uBt the program was well rounded, with Mitch Miller of "Sing-Along" fame; country music stars Red Foley and Bonnie Guitar; George Zazosky, first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; jazz pianist and composed Bobby Troup, and Stan Kenton of the Progressive Band reading a statement by Guy Lombardo on the "Sweetest Music This Side of Heaven."

The stars were on hand to urge the subcommittee, headed by Senator Burdick (D., N. D.) to write into a revised copyright law provisions for performers to get royaltieseach time their records are played on radio.

The theme advanced to the subcommittee was that performers, like composers, are "creative artists" and should be similarly protected by copyright laws. Each performer, in his own way, attempted to show what a bit of creativity can do.

Mickey Mouse Updated

Miss London, in a conservative dark blue wool dress capped by what a lady reporter described as "shocking pink irridescent" lipstick and long "champagne blonde" hair, brought some records along.

She first played eight bars of the original children's chorus version of the Mickey Mouse Club Song from the television show of the same name. Then she played her own version, with a "late-in-the-evening, lights-down-low" treatment.

She topped it off with a bit of Barbra Streisand's recording of "Happy Days Are Here Again," in which the peppy show tune was transformed into a soft, sad ballad.

JULIE LONDON
From Mickey Mouse to Ballad

Mr. Miller said it was the "rich stentorian voice" of Senator Dirksen that gave the senator's "Gallant Men" album public appeal.

Another example of a performer's special talents making a song a hit, he continued, was Miss Clooney's "Come-on-a My House."

Mr. Foley mentioned his recordings of "Chattanooga Shoe-Shine Boy," "Peace in the Valley" and "Just a Closer Walk With Thee" as records which once were big hits but no longer sell well today. They still are widely broadcast, he said, but he receives no royalties.

History of Jazz Traced

Mr. Zazosky read a statement for Erich Leinsdorf. The Boston Symphony conductor made the same point as Miss London but on a different plane. He described the amount of work, time and talent that went into preparing and performing "my favorite piece, 'Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.'"

Each conductor and musician approaches the work differently, he explained, "so, you see, one just does not look at the composer's notes and make a recording."

Bonnie Guitar talked about the "Nashville sound" and played a bit of her "Green, Green Grass of Home."

Mr. Troup traced the history of jazz, including the "earthy" trumpet sounds of Louis Armstrong and the "soulfully imaginative" trumpet of Miles Davis. He said jazz is an excellent example of the performer's contribution to recording.

Mr. Lombardo said radio stations have cut down on programming live music because they can play phonograph records with no performers to pay.

ATTICA, IND.
LEDGER TRIBUNE
D. 2,000
MAY 12 1967

Boston Symphony Trumpeter With Huntingburg Band

Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his initial appearance with a Hoosier organization when he appears on the program of the Huntingburg High School Music Department at a spring concert on Saturday, May 20. The concert, featuring the seventh- and eighth-grade choirs, the Concert Choir, the Cadet Band and the Symphony Band, will begin at 7:30 p.m. in the elementary school auditorium.

Ghitalla will solo with the high school's Symphonic Band on four numbers: the Concerto for Trumpet, by Hummel; Carnival of Venice by Staigers; The Lost Chord, by Sullivan; and Bugler's Holiday, by Anderson. Two members of the school's cornet section will join him for the latter number.

Ghitalla joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1951. Since 1965 he has been principal trumpeter. Formerly he was principal trumpeter and featured soloist with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, playing all the numbers he will be performing in the Huntingburg concert except the Hummel concerto. Prior to coming to Huntingburg on May 20 he will play the Hummel concerto with a British orchestra in London.

Tickets for the center section of the auditorium of the Huntingburg concert may be reserved by contacting John Thrapp in the band department. If tickets are reserved by mail, a check or money order should be enclosed.

There are about 300 seats in the reserved section, but most of these have already been sold. Prices are 50 cents for adults and 25 cents for children under twelve.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
OCT 22 1966

France Honors Dickson

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

It would seem as though it takes someone from "out of Boston" to recognize—and honor—the people who contribute the most to Boston's contemporary history.

The Spanish gave their highest honors to both Cardinal Cushing and historian Admiral Samuel Eliot Morison — the Swiss established M.I.T.'s beloved Julius Stratton's biggest dream of a permanent Swiss-American student exchange program in his honor—The King of Denmark bestowed his personal decoration upon the Sheraton's Dan Nyboe—and last night France's Consul General Jacques Massenet conferred the coveted Order of the Chevalier of Arts and Letters on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's silver-tongued Harry Ellis Dickson.

Founder and conductor of the B.S.O.'s wonderful Youth Concerts which bring thousands of children from all over New England to Symphony Hall for a program which Sir John Barbirolli called "the best of its kind in the world", author and raconteur Dickson also sired the superb "Inside the BSO" and "Around the World with the BSO" series so badly missed this season.

Harry, who spent his brief BSO vacation with his longtime best friend Danny Kaye in London doing the musical variations for Danny's Philharmonic stunts, had his own loved family, both domestic and Symphony variety, with him for the impressive ceremony last night.

An honor to compare with the handsome white and green medal which M. Massenet bestowed in English and Mr. Dickson accepted in French, was the presence of Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, the widow of the Boston Symphony's inspired genius of all time, Serge Koussevitzky, who founded the epic Tanglewood. Sister of a duchess, Mme. Koussevitzky looked like a queen, her fragile exquisite face framed in delicate tulle and lace. She left again for the Berkshires after affectionate greetings to the Dickson family, and a reunion with Symphony's Tom Perry and his attractive wife and Symphony - Tanglewood friends like Ellen and Arthur Fiedler and their beauteous daughter Johanna and Felicia and Anthony Kutten. Mrs. Kutten is one of few Boston women to be decorated by France for her service to the arts and humanities.

Another distinguished visitor, shocked by news from England of the terrible Welsh disaster, Dr. Sol Cohen, eminent London specialist who is Mrs. Richard Burton's physician, left the party with Boston's Dr. John Sears of Harvard's Medical School to catch a plane for London. They will join Dr. Paul Dudley White in India for a top-flight medical conference. Dr. Cohen was a Boston guest of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Finn, who raced from the consulate to the airport with eye to the clock.

THE ORDER OF THE CHEVALIER is bestowed upon the Boston Symphony's Harry Ellis Dickson by French Consul General Jacques Massenet. (LeRoy Ryan Photo)

ICH. LEINSDORF

218

FEATURE PARADE

CONDUCTOR ERICH LEINSDORF

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4300
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
SEP 11 1966

ERICH LEINSDORF

218

FEATURE PARADE

CONDUCTOR ERICH LEINSDORF

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 104,910
SEP 11 1966

LEINSDORF

ANIMA
in your BACK YARD

By RICHARD HEADSTROM

FEW OF US see the mole but we frequently find evidence of his presence in the ridges of upturned earth that disfigure our lawns, damage our golf courses, and ruin the seed beds in our gardens and nurseries.

These ridges, which indicate the direction and course of the mole's hunting paths, are not molehills but merely an uplifting of the sod or soil crust and are the result of the animal tunneling too near the surface. Molehills indicate deeper tunneling and are formed of earth pushed up from lower workings where the soil is too compact to be simply pushed aside.

The mole digs his tunnels at a depth varying from 1 or 2 to 4 or 5 inches although when the ground is dry or when cold weather sets in may go down as far as 10 inches. He apparently digs wherever fancy or food takes him without thought of any definite plan so that ultimately he ends with an intricate system of many - branched tunnels.

Those which he uses as permanent runways and for hunting purposes are as a rule, excavated near the surface and along fences, hedges, walks and plant rows for such situations are less apt to be disturbed by man. Galleries or passages join the sub-surface runs with the deeper runways and here and there enlargements are made, one or more of which may be used during the breeding season, for nesting purposes.

Nature appears to have had one of her capricious moods when she fashioned the mole for a subterranean existence but perhaps she was not so unkind after all, for this little animal always has an abundance of food near at hand though he may have to work hard for it; is always [illegible] and is relatively free from MAESTRO Erich Leinsdorf took over the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, climaxing a 32-year conducting career that began in Salzburg when he was 22.

LEINSDORF GALVANIZES ORCHESTRA and AUDIENCE

By Raymond Morin

Cover by Edward A. Cournoyer

WHEN THE LAST warning bell has been sounded at Symphony Hall, Boston, or the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, the stage door is opened and a new presence is electrically felt.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf walks alertly to the Boston Symphony Orchestra podium. He's of medium height; trim, vigorous. He exudes intelligence and confidence.

MUSIC CRITIC of the Worcester Telegram, and frequent contributor to Feature Parade — for longer than he cares to remember — Raymond Morin is a behind-the-scenes expert on notables of the music world.

Leinsdorf is the third maestro to conduct the Boston Symphony in the last 42 years, and the 11th in its 85-year history.

The greatness of a conductor can be sensed from the indefinable attitude and respect of his orchestra. No matter to what extent players' opinions deviate from the conductor's, they must believe that he believes in his judgments.

Leinsdorf galvanizes orchestra and audience. The very atmosphere becomes charged with vitality. Something important is always happening.

The man's strong points — musical intellect, emotion and style — are inseparable facets from his whole being.

AT AN AGE when most professional men are cautiously "cutting their teeth," Leinsdorf accepted one of the most challenging jobs in music.

He was 26 when the Metropolitan Opera engaged him as assistant to Artur Bodansky to conduct German opera. Most impressively, his field was the exacting music dramas of Wagner.

This was no "political" appointment. He had served a rigorous apprenticeship from the start of his conducting career.

Leinsdorf, an only child, was born in Vienna, Feb. 12, 1912. It soon became clear that he was a born musician. The talent was unmistakable.

His father died when he was 3, which brought on a financial crisis. But his mother wouldn't hear of his abandoning music, and in due time he went to Vienna Academy.

Leinsdorf started out as a pianist. He had excellent teachers —Paul Emmerich, Hedwig Kammer-Rosenthal, Hugo Krotschak.

But the keyboard didn't satisfy his need. He wanted to conduct.

At 22, he decided to do something about it. The celebrated Bruno Wal-

Continued on Next Page

'I don't own the truth. I'm always searching' ter was conducting Beethoven's opera "Fidelio" in Salzburg.

Continued from Preceding Page

The Leinsdorf biographies say that he walked the 155 miles from Vienna to Salzburg.

"That isn't quite true," he told us with a grin. "I hitchhiked part of the way."

Anyhow, exhausted and dusty he entered the Festpielhaus, the Salzburg festival house, where the rehearsal was in progress. For one brief moment, Walter left the podium to talk over a point of interpretation with one of the soloists.

AND IN THAT moment, Leinsdorf made one of the most important decisions of his life.

He went to the piano, uninvited, and continued "Fidelio" from the point of interruption. Walter was so impressed that he hired Leinsdorf on the spot to help prepare the Salzburg performances.

"How did you happen to know the 'Fidelio' score?" we asked.

"During my teens," Leinsdorf replied, "I was a voracious reader. I used to spend hours browsing through symphony and opera scores, playing them from the piano reductions."

Salzburg was the first rung on the ladder.

The next came in the winter of the same year — 1934. Arturo Toscanini was in Vienna to conduct symphony concerts. One of the works to be performed was "Psalmus Hungaricus" by the Hungarian composer, Zoltan Kodaly. It had been composed 11 years before.

A pianist was needed but there were no applicants. Leinsdorf had played the "Psalmus." He applied, auditioned, and was engaged.

At this point we brought up Leinsdorf's prodigious memory, about which so much has been written. We have seen him conduct from memory such enormous scores as entire concert performances of Wagner's "Lohengrin," Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and Mahler's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies.

These are not standards in any conductor's repertory. We asked Leinsdorf how long it takes him to revive such scores in his memory.

"It all depends on how often I have conducted them and how complex they are," he replied, and he added with a smile, "I have seen works conducted without much knowledge of the score."

THE SUMMER of his 23rd year, Leinsdorf was assistant to Walter and Toscanini in preparing festival performances at Salzburg.

MR. AND MRS. LEINSDORF enjoy the garden of their summer home at Stockbridge, not far from the Boston Symphony's quarters.

It was an overwhelming task. To most, it would have been discouraging and thankless. On some afternoons his duties took him to four places. He would practice with the orchestra, direct the chorus, work with soloists, and consult with the stage director.

Leinsdorf had a goal. He wanted to become conductor at the Vienna Opera. Walter and Toscanini recommended him highly, but he was turned down by the Ministry of Fine Arts. Hostile forces had been at work.

However, he was welcomed in other countries. The fall and winter of his 24th year he conducted in Bologna, Trieste, San Remo and Florence.

The next year he went to New York.

Metropolitan opera goers were totally unprepared for what they experienced in January, 1938. The performance was Wagner's "Die Walkure."

Perhaps he didn't have the solid confidence of today. But in short order, the Met audience discovered that the young and little-known Leinsdorf had an astonishing memory and strong personality, knew what he wanted, and how to make it known.

Leinsdorf conducted 36 performances at the Met that first season. A year and a half later, Bodansky fell ill and died six days before the opening of the new season.

Leinsdorf took over the Wagnerian "wing" at the Met and conducted 55 performances his first season in that post.

Some of Leinsdorf's admirers felt that it was a mistake for him to leave the Met in 1943 to become conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

RECALLING this important move, Leinsdorf now says, "perhaps I should have left earlier."

Rumors were that he had become annoyed with petty rivalries and temperamental divas at the Met.

The real reason, as he told us, is that he wanted to broaden his vista in repertory. In retrospect he reflects that "in a single season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra I conduct more different works than the total of operas I have conducted in my entire life."

From 1947 to 1956, Leinsdorf conducted the Rochester Philharmonic.

(It was this orchestra he brought to the Strand Theater, Southbridge, on Community Concerts, Dec. 7, 1948, and to the Worcester Auditorium for a Civic Music concert on Dec. 7, 1950.)

He was director of New York City Opera in 1956, and returned to the Met from 1957 to 1962. Meanwhile, he guest-conducted most of the major orchestras in this country, Europe and Israel.

In 1962, Leinsdorf became conductor of the Boston Symphony. Since 1963, he has also been director of the Berkshire Music Center and Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston orchestra in 1962, he commented about the policy of selecting soloists:

"I shall continue to engage soloists for works rather than select works after the soloists have been engaged. The work is the determining factor."

He now speaks of "both sides of the coin."

"WE TRY TO GIVE audiences a survey of repertory. One season we will have Beethoven's First Piano Concerto, then the Third, and so on. Right now, Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto is overdue, and I'm planning to have it played. The next step will be to find out what pianists are LEINSDORF started as a pianist. In his native Austria he studied at Vienna Academy, but by 22 had answered the call to conduct.

ERICH LEINSDORF

GF enjoy the garden of their summer home om the Boston Symphony's quarters.

To
isshould have left earlier."
Rumors were that he had become annoyed with petty rivalries and temperamental divas at the Met.
The real reason, as he told us, is hat he wanted to broaden his vista repertory. In retrospect he res that "in a single season with Boston Symphony Orchestra I more different works than of operas I have conducted ire life."
47 to 1956, Leinsdorf con-
Rochester Philharmonic. orchestra he brought Theater, Southbridge,
Concerts, Dec. 7,
Worcester Audito-
Music concert on

New York City turned to the Meanwhile,
st of the country,

nduc-
Since the h-available. I list them in the order of excellence."

On the other hand, Leinsdorf is alway anxious to present famous personalities to Boston Symphony audiences. In such a case, the artist is asked what he or she would like to play.

There is one situation of this sort this season.

"I discovered that Gina Bachauer had never played with Boston," said Leinsdorf. "We will present her this season in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto."

(Mme. Bachauer has made sensational appearances in Worcester at Civic Music concerts in 1951 and 1953, and at the Worcester Festival in 1960.)

Speaking of repertory, Leinsdorf refers to "certain pillars like Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Mozart, etc., that are holding up the roof."

In order to carry out his general survey, he supplements these with contemporary music and lesser-known works by famed composers.

Which brought us to the provocative subject of music's "new languages," such as serialism, electronic music, "chance music," and the like.

Has it value and will it last?

"Much of it is purely experiment with sound," Leinsdorf opines. "I don't know whose music will remain significant. Much of it has no substance or meaning behind the sound. It may fade away in 10 years."

And he added, "You can't paint patches forever."

"DO YOU EVER change your interpretive concepts?" we asked.

"All the time," he exclaimed. "I don't own the truth. I am always searching for it, and as long as I am searching, I will change my ideas."

When addressing students of the Berkshire Music Center a couple of years ago, Leinsdorf spoke realistically to those who might have rash ambitions to become concert artists, but who are unqualified and unwilling to make the necessary sacrifices.

He illustrated his point by making reference to certain short-lived luminaries who "evaporated" in a few seasons.

His comment:

"They go at a career like some Hollywood starlet, or an attendant in a drive-in serving hot dogs to the customers. I have heard many a young pianist with fantastic equipment and no talent."

To illustrate the budding young star's unwillingness to sacrifice, Leinsdorf spoke of a certain pianist who "married too soon."

"Instead of working at his career," he said, "he was too busy babysitting and going to the supermarket."

Is age a determining factor of a great artist?

"Arthur Rubinstein became his greatest after his 50th year — let us say, during the past 30 years."

Rubinstein is now 80 and still concertizing.

We asked: "If you conducted for a young artist who was obviously misusing a work for his personal edification, would you speak to him about it?"

"Yes, I would," Leinsdorf replied. "Many come to me for advice. But I hold an unbroken record. No one has ever taken my advice!"

HE AMENDED that to say, "Oh yes, there was one young lady I felt was unsuited for a concert career. You are beautiful, I told her, and you have a nice voice. Why don't you go into musical comedy?"

She did — and very successfully.

Domineering parents are another liability to some young artists.

"I find this very disturbing," says Leinsdorf. "What they need is an old-fashioned impressario!"

As a rehearsing conductor, Leinsdorf is lucid, thorough, and blunt. He is also straightforward and honest.

We recently attended a closed rehearsal of the Boston Symphony during which he apparently made a blunder. He stopped the orchestra. "Sorry," he said, "I forgot."

A trio of distinguished vocal soloists was rehearsing. Leinsdorf had been gesturing for a quieter tone. He brought everything to a sudden halt, and said sternly:

"Why am I doing this for? Why are you so loud? It is to sound like an enchanted flute. Everything is too heavy. It has no charm."

That is a long rehearsal speech for Leinsdorf.

Earlier he had told us about the talkative conductor who made a long tirade to his disgruntled orchestra.

Finally, one of the players couldn't contain his annoyance.

"One more word out of you," he yelled, "and we'll play it exactly the way you conduct it!"

MEMBERS of the Boston Symphony administration who are closest to Leinsdorf express high praise of the man.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, says, "He's easy to work with. He knows what he wants, expresses it clearly, and usually gets what he's after."

Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry Jr., gives Leinsdorf this tribute:

"The question of whether a thing is good box office never arises. Leinsdorf is fully responsible for musical matters, and with them he rises or falls. But he's an extremely practical man. When something isn't practical, he will cooperate."

That's important because the Boston Symphony has an annual budget of close to 4 million dollars!

Sanford R. Sistare is head of press and publicity. He comments about Leinsdorf:

"We get along fine. Every now and then we have a difference of opinion. But he will talk it over. He's a fascinating man to work for and with. Because he's a hard worker, he expects everyone else to be the same, which is fine. When it gets down to specifics, he's the boss. We have to be constantly on our toes to keep up with his energy, because when he gets tired, his battery quickly regenerates."

Leinsdorf and Anne Frohnknecht of New York City were married in 1939. She was a research worker in the field of mental health. Their winter home is in Brookline, and they summer in Stockbridge.

The Leinsdorfs have five children, ranging in age from 25 to 15. They are David Immanuel, Gregor Jonathan, Joshua Franklin, Deborah Hester and Jennifer Gabrielle.

AS DIRECTOR of the Berkshire Music Center and Festival at Tanglewood, Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony during a rehearsal in the shed.

219

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488
JAN 8 1966

THE ERICH LEINSDORFS: Boston's Where They 'Belong'

Pho. all cover. & p-2

35

By PAT COLLINS

ON Christmas a year ago Erich Leinsdorf gave each of his five children a copy of a 56-page book that will never make the best seller list.

The book is Leinsdorf's autobiography, recounting his life from boyhood days in Vienna as the gifted son of a shoe salesman to his prestigious niche as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There are just twelve copies of the book. They were given to the five Leinsdorf children to enlighten them on the subject of their parents, an area Leinsdorf considers neglected in most families. The Leinsdorfs are a widely dispersed, versatile and very close-knit family which Mrs. Leinsdorf describes as "bulky". The children—David, 23; Gregor, 21; Joshua, 20; Hester, 17 and Jennifer, 13—grew up in New York during the six years their father was consecutively the conductor of the New York City Opera and the Metropolitan Opera.

There are nostalgic ties with New York for the Leinsdorfs. Their two married sons, one a businessman and another at Columbia Law School, make their homes there.

But for Leinsdorf, who describes New York as being "held together by safety pins," there is no other city like Boston. "This is where I belong," said Leinsdorf. "I'm in my element here. I love being surrounded by young people. It keeps you alert. The New England shell that I thought would obstruct getting to know people is actually a politeness. I like that. It is an honest friendliness. It's better than back-slapping, meaningless chit chat."

It was not easy for any artist, even one of Leinsdorf's international reputation, to take over for retiring conductor Charles Munch who was a shy, gifted man adored by the blue-haired Back Bay matrons. In the four years Leinsdorf has been at the BSO, there isn't a Symphony fan from the upper crust to the college kids who can only afford open rehearsals, who has not been captivated by his European manner and energetic brilliance.

BY HIS own admission Leinsdorf has mellowed over the years, refining what in youth was a fiery genius. "It has taken me 50 years to learn how to feel physically well, and to live life the way I should. I'm a slow learner," Leinsdorf said with a wink.

Composing and arranging music is a lonely job and one that needs an ivory tower atmosphere. Mrs. Leinsdorf has given her husband just that in a spacious white frame home in Brookline's Fisher Hill section. There is an appealing "lived-in" appearance in all the rooms, mostly done in soft golds and creams, except for the rose-colored morning room. The dining room, with a yellow French Provincial set, is used for family and formal gatherings. The Leinsdorfs prefer to take high tea in the small library before concerts, and it is here that the maestro relaxes to stereo music, mostly classical but occasionally Dixieland.

Photo by Chief Photographer Myer Ostroff

Anne and Erich Leinsdorf have learned to relax in the 'lived-in' comfort of their Brookline home.

Leinsdorf and his wife, an elegantly beautiful woman with flawless skin and dark hair, are both meticulous in their dress and are confirmed weight watchers, who are more likely to have steak and salad than streudel. The maestro's favorite form of exercise is table tennis ("I'm not very good," he admits) and driving the 20 minutes from the house to Symphony Hall. Leinsdorf is also addicted to reading the Congressional Record, a publication he finds funnier than the comics, and more informing than magazines and TV programs.

Mrs. Leinsdorf plans the family schedule around the BSO calendar that leaves little free time between the winter season here, summers in Tanglewood and all the guest appearances in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and Washington.

The Leinsdorfs rarely entertain and when they do the guest list is confined to old friends, BSO members and their wives and visiting VIP's, like actor Walter Slezak who makes himself at home in one of Mrs. Leinsdorf's antique children's chairs done in red velvet. Her chairs and antique music box collections are distributed in relatively inconspicuous spots around the house to avoid what she calls "a museum look".

Mrs. Leinsdorf abandoned her professional career as a researcher in mental health when she married the controversial young conductor 28 years ago. The former Anne Frohnknecht was a frequent front row patron of the Met and inevitably its conductor asked to be introduced to the beautiful young woman at a cocktail party following one of the concerts.

Erich Leinsdorf, as the Boston Symphony director, has made the most valuable cultural contribution to this city in a decade. As a couple the Leinsdorfs have brought an Old World charm and simple elegance to a city that welcomes the finer things.

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM, SEPTEMBER 11, 1966

Inside The Telegram

A CLOSE LOOK AT BOSTON MAESTRO — Erich Leinsdorf is the third maestro to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last 42 years and the 11th in its 85-year history. Telegram music critic Raymond Morin tells about the impact Leinsdorf has on both orchestra and audience on Page 3 of today's Feature Parade.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677
SEPT 8 1966

Johnsons honor top musicians at White House

By DOROTHY MCCARDLE
Special to The Star-Ledger

WASHINGTON — President and Mrs. Johnson expressed their pride in the achievement of the 13 young American winners in the recent Tschaikowsky International Music Festival in Moscow when they gave a star-studded White House reception for them last night.

Eric Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who took himself out of a guest seat for an impromptu performance of his own, tossed the bouquets right back to the host and hostess.

More than 250 of the nation's most distinguished musicians were seated on the golden chairs in the East Room when this exchange of compliments took place. The Who's Who of American Music, composers and performers, made up the guest list.

Van Cliburn, who was the first American to win a first place in the Moscow competition eight years ago, was master of ceremonies.

He introduced President Johnson, who in turn praised this year's crop of American winners, five of whom performed at the White House party.

Then conductor Leinsdorf, who had spontaneously volunteered his services as accompanist on the piano for the two numbers sung by soprano Veronica Tyler — a Puccini number and the Negro spiritual, "He's Got the Whole World In His Hands," gave his own planned speech, too, before sitting down at the keyboard.

"The President and Mrs. Johnson are doing great things for the arts in America," said Leinsdorf. "They have created a tremendously appreciative atmosphere in which artists can perform in this country, and we, as musicians, are especially grateful."

219

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488

JAN 8 1966

THE ERICH LEINSDORFS: Boston's Where They 'Belong'

Plp. all cover. + p-2

35

By PAT COLLINS

ON Christmas a year ago Erich Leinsdorf gave each of his five children a copy of a 56-page book that will never make the best seller list.

The book is Leinsdorf's autobiography, recounting his life from boyhood days in Vienna as the gifted son of a shoe salesman to his prestigious niche as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There are just twelve copies of the book. They were given to the five Leinsdorf children to enlighten them on the subject of their parents, an area Leinsdorf considers neglected in most families. The Leinsdorfs are a widely dispersed, versatile and very close-knit family which Mrs. Leinsdorf describes as "bulky". The children—David, 23; Gregor, 21; Joshua, 20; Hester, 17 and Jennifer, 13—grew up in New York during the six years their father was consecutively the conductor of the New York City Opera and the Metropolitan Opera.

There are nostalgic ties with New York for the Leinsdorfs. Their two married sons, one a businessman and another at Columbia Law School, make their homes there.

But for Leinsdorf, who describes New York as being "held together by safety pins," there is no other city like Boston. "This is where I belong," said Leinsdorf. "I'm in my element here. I love being surrounded by young people. It keeps you alert. The New England shell that I thought would obstruct getting to know people is actually a politeness. I like that. It is an honest friendliness. It's better than back-slapping, meaningless chit chat."

It was not easy for any artist, even one of Leinsdorf's international reputation, to take over for retiring conductor Charles Munch who was a shy, gifted man adored by the blue-haired Back Bay matrons. In the four years Leinsdorf has been at the BSO, there isn't a Symphony fan from the upper crust to the college kids who can only afford open rehearsals, who has not been captivated by his European manner and energetic brilliance.

BY HIS own admission Leinsdorf has mellowed over the years, refining what in youth was a fiery genius. "It has taken me 50 years to learn how to feel physically well, and to live life the way I should. I'm a slow learner," Leinsdorf said with a wink.

Composing and arranging music is a lonely job and one that needs an ivory tower atmosphere. Mrs. Leinsdorf has given her husband just that in a spacious white frame home in Brookline's Fisher Hill section. There is an appealing "lived-in" appearance in all the rooms, mostly done in soft golds and creams, except for the rose-colored morning room. The dining room, with a yellow French Provincial set, is used for family and formal gatherings. The Leinsdorfs prefer to take high tea in the small library before concerts, and it is here that the maestro relaxes to stereo music, mostly classical but occasionally Dixieland.

Photo by Chief Photographer Myer Ostroff

Anne and Erich Leinsdorf have learned to relax in the 'lived-in' comfort of their Brookline home.

Leinsdorf and his wife, an elegantly beautiful woman with flawless skin and dark hair, are both meticulous in their dress and are confirmed weight watchers, who are more likely to have steak and salad than streudel. The maestro's favorite form of exercise is table tennis ("I'm not very good," he admits) and driving the 20 minutes from the house to Symphony Hall. Leinsdorf is also addicted to reading the Congressional Record, a publication he finds funnier than the comics, and more informing than magazines and TV programs.

Mrs. Leinsdorf plans the family schedule around the BSO calendar that leaves little free time between the winter season here, summers in Tanglewood and all the guest appearances in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and Washington.

The Leinsdorfs rarely entertain and when they do the guest list is confined to old friends, BSO members and their wives and visiting VIP's, like actor Walter Slezak who makes himself at home in one of Mrs. Leinsdorf's antique children's chairs done in red velvet. Her chairs and antique music box collections are distributed in relatively inconspicuous spots around the house to avoid what she calls "a museum look".

Mrs. Leinsdorf abandoned her professional career as a researcher in mental health when she married the controversial young conductor 28 years ago. The former Anne Frohnknecht was a frequent front row patron of the Met and inevitably its conductor asked to be introduced to the beautiful young woman at a cocktail party following one of the concerts.

Erich Leinsdorf, as the Boston Symphony director, has made the most valuable cultural contribution to this city in a decade. As a couple the Leinsdorfs have brought an Old World charm and simple elegance to a city that welcomes the finer things.

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM, SEPTEMBER 11, 1966

Inside The Telegram

A CLOSE LOOK AT BOSTON MAESTRO — Erich Leinsdorf is the third maestro to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last 42 years and the 11th in its 85-year history. Telegram music critic Raymond Morin tells about the impact Leinsdorf has on both orchestra and audience on Page 3 of today's Feature Parade.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677

SEPT 8 1966

Johnsons honor top musicians at White House

By DOROTHY MCCARDLE
Special to The Star-Ledger

WASHINGTON — President and Mrs. Johnson expressed their pride in the achievement of the 13 young American winners in the recent Tschaikowsky International Music Festival in Moscow when they gave a star-studded White House reception for them last night.

Eric Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who took himself out of a guest seat for an impromptu performance of his own, tossed the bouquets right back to the host and hostess.

More than 250 of the nation's most distinguished musicians were seated on the golden chairs in the East Room when this exchange of compliments took place. The Who's Who of American Music, composers and performers, made up the guest list.

Van Cliburn, who was the first American to win a first place in the Moscow competition eight years ago, was master of ceremonies.

He introduced President Johnson, who in turn praised this year's crop of American winners, five of whom performed at the White House party.

Then conductor Leinsdorf, who had spontaneously volunteered his services as accompanist on the piano for the two numbers sung by soprano Veronica Tyler — a Puccini number and the Negro spiritual, "He's Got the Whole World In His Hands," gave his own planned speech, too, before sitting down at the keyboard.

"The President and Mrs. Johnson are doing great things for the arts in America," said Leinsdorf. "They have created a tremendously appreciative atmosphere in which artists can perform in this country, and we, as musicians, are especially grateful."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LAKE PLACID NEWS
Thursday, August 25, 1966

Dr. White conducts in Europe

Dr. Paul White, music diere-tor for 28 years at Lake Placid Club, added a new honor to his list of acheivements during a trip broad last Spring. He conducted the opening concert in the International Music Festival at Marianske, Czechoslovakia, on May 22, the first American ever to conduct there.

He directed the Marianski Symphony Orchestra , intthe opening Collonade Concert. The 150 -year-old group has performed premier works aby all the great European masters. Guest conductos had been invited this year from Brazil, Poland, Germany and other countries.

Dr. White accompanied hisw wife on a visit to her family in Marianske. She had not been in her native land in about 20 years The invitation to conduct was arranged by a nephew , who is a friend of the Festival's chief conductor.

Following the concert, dr. and Mrs. White were guests at a reception given by leading citizens of the city. They also were honored at a banquet given by the Mayor and Food Minister of Czechoslovakia.

During their visit, the Whites traveled extensively throughout the country, visiting the Polish and German borders and he Krkonis mountains. They toured museums, castles and a former prison camp.

Among the highlights of the trip, Dr. White reports , was a reunion with his old friend Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony and former conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic . He was conducting at the Praque Festival, and the Whites made several trips there for concerts from Marianski, a trip of about 100 miles.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200
SEP 29 1966

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
OCT 1966

THE MUSICAL WHIRL

It was a happy homecoming for three prizewinners of the Tchaikovsky Music Competition in Moscow: Erich Leinsdorf invited them to sing at Tanglewood, where they received a warm welcome. Left to right: Veronica Tyler (second prize), Leinsdorf, Jane Marsh (first), and Simon Estes (third).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 1,337,277
OCT 7 1966

Erich Leinsdorf conducts

THIS WAS THE SCENE Sunday afternoon in Chapin Hall during the annual fall convocation at Williams College. The afternoon was highlighted by the announcement by President John E. Sawyer of the receipt of an anonymous gift of $1.5 million for special support of the humanities and the awarding of three honorary degrees to leaders in the fields of music, literature and art. These were given to Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Melvill Coghill, Merton Professor of English Literature at Oxford University, England; and Peter Guille (pictured at right), retired director of the Clark Art Institute.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,593
SEP 26 1966

Williams College Receives Anonymous $1.5 Million Gift

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS. (UPI)—President John E. Sawyer of Williams College says the school has received a $1.5 million anonymous donation to support special humanities studies.

Sawyer, who announced the gift Sunday at the annual fall convocation, also presented three honorary degrees to Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Nevill Coghill, Merton Professor of English Literature at Oxford University, and Peter Guille, retired director of the Clark Art Institute, Williamstown.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721
SEP 8 1966

Miss Tyler Sings At White House

Winner In Tchaikovsky Competition Honored With Four Others By The President

By CHARLES V. FLOWERS
[Washington Bureau of The Sun]

Washington, Sept. 7 — Baltimore's Miss Veronica Tyler, winner ni the Tchaikovsky competition in oscow last June, sang before President and Mr.s Johnson tonight in the White House.

Four other winners also performed.

About 250 musicians, composers, conductors, critics and relatives of the prize winners attended the performance in the chandeliered East Room, and then met the President and his wife at a buffet supper honoring American winners in Miscow.

Ont Thing In Common

The Russian ambassador, Anatoly F. Dobrynin, also attended.

In brief remarks before the performance, President Johnson said that music is ont thing the United States and Russia have in comm

"Music reaches across the oceans and walls that separate us," he said. "I hope that other areas of understanding can be found."

Erich Leinsdorf, director of thet Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied Miss Tyler on the piano. Miss Tyler, a soprano, sang "Cheil bel sogno" from Puccini's "La Rondine," and the spiritual, "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands."

They were among the songs she sang during auditions at the Tchaikovsky competition. Miss Tyler, 29, won second prize in the vocal contest. Miss Jane Marsh, of New York, also a soprano and the first - prize winner, sang three numbers.

The other performers were Simon Estes, a base baritone of New York who won third prize in the vocal section; Stephen Kates, a second - prize winner from Los Angeles in the cello competition; and Misha Pichter, a second - prize winner from Los Angeles in the piano competition.

In introducing the master of ceremonies, Van Cliburn, who won first prize in the piano competition in Moscow in 1958, the President had difficulty in pronouncing Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Cliburn, who praised the President's interest in the arts, amused the audience also by saying that he realized he wouldn't have been invited if he were not

President Johnson told Miss Tyler and her colleagues that they have donw what few statesmen can do, "in the briefest time, in a foreign land with which we have great differences."

AP Wirephoto

WHITE HOUSE CHAT — Veronica Tyler, of Baltimore, flanked by Simon Estes, baritone (left), and Misha Dichter, pianist, pauses for a rehearsal break at the White House.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LAKE PLACID NEWS
Thursday, August 25, 1966

Dr. White conducts in Europe

Dr. Paul White, music diere-tor for 28 years at Lake Placid Club, added a new honor to his list of acheivements during a trip broad last Spring. He conducted the opening concert in the International Music Festival at Marianske, Czechoslovakia, on May 22, the first American ever to conduct there.

He directed the Marianski Symphony Orchestra , intthe opening Collonade Concert. The 150 -year-old group has performed premier works aby all the great European masters. Guest conductos had been invited this year from Brazil, Poland, Germany and other countries.

Dr. White accompanied hisw wife on a visit to her family in Marianske. She had not been in her native land in about 20 years The invitation to conduct was arranged by a nephew , who is a friend of the Festival's chief conductor.

Following the concert, dr. and Mrs. White were guests at a reception given by leading citizens of the city. They also were honored at a banquet given by the Mayor and Food Minister of Czechoslovakia.

During their visit, the Whites traveled extensively throughout the country, visiting the Polish and German borders and he Krkonis mountains. They toured museums, castles and a former prison camp.

Among the highlights of the trip, Dr. White reports , was a reunion with his old friend Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony and former conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic . He was conducting at the Praque Festival, and the Whites made several trips there for concerts from Marianski, a trip of about 100 miles.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News
WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.
Bi-Weekly Circ. 1,200
SEP 29 1966

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
OCT 1966

THE MUSICAL WHIRL

It was a happy homecoming for three prizewinners of the Tchaikovsky Music Competition in Moscow: Erich Leinsdorf invited them to sing at Tanglewood, where they received a warm welcome. Left to right: Veronica Tyler (second prize), Leinsdorf, Jane Marsh (first), and Simon Estes (third).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 1,337,277
OCT 7 1966

Erich Leinsdorf conducts

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 183,929 SUN. 337,721
SEP 8 1966

Miss Tyler Sings At White House

Winner In Tchaikovsky Competition Honored With Four Others By The President

By CHARLES V. FLOWERS
[Washington Bureau of The Sun]

Washington, Sept. 7 — Baltimore's Miss Veronica Tyler, winner ni the Tchaikovsky competition in oscow last June, sang before President and Mr.s Johnson tonight in the White House.

Four other winners also performed.

About 250 musicians, composers, conductors, critics and relatives of the prize winners attended the performance in the chandeliered East Room, and then met the President and his wife at a buffet supper honoring American winners in Miscow.

Ont Thing In Common

The Russian ambassador, Anatoly F. Dobrynin, also attended.

In brief remarks before the performance, President Johnson said that music is ont thing the United States and Russia have in comm

"Music reaches across the oceans and walls that separate us," he said. "I hope that other areas of understanding can be found."

Erich Leinsdorf, director of thet Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied Miss Tyler on the piano. Miss Tyler, a soprano, sang "Cheil bel sogno" from Puccini's "La Rondine," and the spiritual, "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands."

They were among the songs she sang during auditions at the Tchaikovsky competition. Miss Tyler, 29, won second prize in the vocal contest. Miss Jane Marsh, of New York, also a soprano and the first - prize winner, sang three numbers.

The other performers were Simon Estes, a base baritone of New York who won third prize in the vocal section; Stephen Kates, a second - prize winner from Los Angeles in the cello competition; and Misha Pichter, a second - prize winner from Los Angeles in the piano competition.

In introducing the master of ceremonies, Van Cliburn, who won first prize in the piano competition in Moscow in 1958, the President had difficulty in pronouncing Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Cliburn, who praised the President's interest in the arts, amused the audience also by saying that he realized he wouldn't have been invited if he were not

President Johnson told Miss Tyler and her colleagues that they have donw what few statesmen can do, "in the briefest time, in a foreign land with which we have great differences."

AP Wirephoto

WHITE HOUSE CHAT — Veronica Tyler, of Baltimore, flanked by Simon Estes, baritone (left), and Misha Dichter, pianist, pauses for a rehearsal break at the White House.

THIS WAS THE SCENE Sunday afternoon in Chapin Hall during the annual fall convocation at Williams College. The afternoon was highlighted by the announcement by President John E. Sawyer of the receipt of an anonymous gift of $1.5 million for special support of the humanities and the awarding of three honorary degrees to leaders in the fields of music, literature and art. These were given to Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Melvill Coghill, Merton Professor of English Literature at Oxford University, England; and Peter Guille (pictured at right), retired director of the Clark Art Institute.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,593
SEP 26 1966

Williams College Receives Anonymous $1.5 Million Gift

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS. (UPI)—President John E. Sawyer of Williams College says the school has received a $1.5 million anonymous donation to support special humanities studies.

Sawyer, who announced the gift Sunday at the annual fall convocation, also presented three honorary degrees to Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Nevill Coghill, Merton Professor of English Literature at Oxford University, and Peter Guille, retired director of the Clark Art Institute, Williamstown.

221

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

SEPT 8 1966

Staff Photos by Frank Hoy

EMBRACING MUSIC: Boston conductor Erich Leinsdorf, above, got carried away with enthusiasm when he greeted President Johnson with an embrace last night at the White House reception honoring 13 American winners of the Tchaikovsky International Music Competition. Former winner Van Cliburn looks on at left. In picture at right, Mrs. Johnson and the President flank this year's first prize-winning soprano, Jane Marsh of Mill Valley, Calif. A buffet supper followed a concert by five of the winners.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 635,619 SUN. 1,337,277

SEPT 8 1966

Johnson Welcomes Music Winners to White House as National Treasures

By NAN ROBERTSON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 7—President Johnson tonight told the American winners of the 1966 Tchaikovsky International Music Competition in Moscow that they had "done what few statesmen on earth can do."

The occasion was a command performance and supper at the White House that honored the 13 winners whom the President called "our newest national treasures."

Five of them performed in the East Room before an audience of 220 people.

Van Cliburn of Kilgore, Tex., a sensation as the first-place pianist in 1958, was master of ceremonies.

The performers were 24-year-old Jane Marsh of New York and Mill Valley, Calif., a soprano who this year became the first American since Mr. Cliburn to win a gold medal in the prestigious event; Veronica Tyler, Baltimore soprano, 28, who tied for second place in the vocal competition: Simon Estes, 28, New York baritone, a third place winner; 21-year-old Misha Dichter of Los Angeles, who won second prize in the piano competition, and Stephen Kates of Los Angeles, 23, who placed second in the cello competition.

"I cannot give you a scroll or a medal bearing your new title," Mr. Johnson said. "But already you wear the brightest badge of all: the pride and admiration of your countrymen."

"Every day," the President went on, "statesmen and diplomats come and go in the airports of the world, busy with the tedious and exhausting work of peace. Often they are unnoticed; too often, they are unsuccessful. But when Jane Marsh—who holds no diplomatic portfolio—left the Moscow airport, hundreds of people came out in the early morning darkness to bring her their farewell gift."

Mr. Johnson said that the singer and her colleagues "have done what few statesmen on earth can do. In the briefest time, in a foreign land with which we have great differences, you lifted the eyes of men beyond the things which make us adversaries to the things which make us brothers: to the hunger of all men for beauty; the respect of all men for excellence; the delight of all men in art."

The President again referred to the Soviet Union in this passage: "I hope history will record this example of how music has reached across the oceans, the walls and the ideologies that separate us, and found response in the hearts of the Russian people. I hope that it will be followed by other actions in other fields, so that other threads of understanding can be strung across the space between us."

Among his listeners was Alexander I. Zinchuk, minister counselor of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Ambassador, Anatoloy F. Dubrynin, is in Moscow on vacation.

Guests included many distinguished figures in the world of music. Among them were Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, who accompanied Miss Tyler on the piano; Howard Hanson of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester; Leonard Rose, the cellist. Rudolf Serkin and André Watts, pianists; the opera stars Rosalind Elias, Roberta Peters, Eileen Farrell, Richard Tucker, Jerome Hines, Robert Merrill and Todd Duncan; James Buswell, violinist, Peter Mennin, director of the Julliard school of Music; Lukas Foss; the composer, and James Cain, director and founder of the Aspen Festival in Colorado.

Others were Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra; Ferde Grofe, the composer; Rudolf Friml, Guy Fraser Harrison, conductor of the Oklahoma City Orchestra; Winthrop Sargent, music critic of The New Yorker; Rosalyn Tureck, the pianist, and Robert Whitney, conductor of the Louisville Orchestra.

Mr. Estes, a bass-baritone, began the program with Prince Gremin's aria from Tchaikovsky's opera "Eugene Onegin" and the spiritual "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child."

He was followed by Mr. Kates, who played Bach's Adagio from the Organ Toccata in C major, and "Capriccio" by Lukas Foss. Miss Tyler sang "Che Il bel Sogno" from "La Rondine" by Puccini, and the spiritual "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands."

Mr. Dichter, at the piano, played the Intermezzo in E major, opus 116, No. 4, by Brahms, and Stravinsky's "Dance Russe" from "Petruchka." Miss March sang "Ain't it A Pretty Night?" from Carlisle Floyd's "Susannah;" Tchaikovsky "Lullaby" in Russian, and the aria, "Tu, Che di Gel Sei Cinta," from Puccini's opera "Turandot."

At the rehearsal this afternoon in the East Room, Miss Marsh, a strapping, blue-eyed brunette who was wildly acclaimed at the Moscow contest, said she had never been in the White House before, "not even as a tourist."

She called the acoustics "not bad."

About 250 pianists, cellists, violinists and singers from throughout the world entered the competition in Moscow this year. Forty-four Americans performed. The Tchaikovsky competition, inaugurated in 1958, is held every four years, and its prizes are fiercely coveted by young musicians.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

SEPT 8 1966

Postlude

President Honors Young U.S. Artists

By Paul Hume

The White House was a place of music and musicians last night as President and Mrs. Johnson gave a supper party for the recent United States winners in the 1966 Tschaikowsky Competition in Moscow.

Hume

Speaking quietly and in his warmest vein, the President welcomed the winning contestants and said that he hoped that he might, without exceeding the powers of his office, designate these young artists as national treasures. He thanked them for their accomplishments in Moscow saying, "You have achieved much in the country with which we have many differences by lifting their thoughts from those things that make us adversaries to things that make us brothers."

And what an audience the five performers faced in the East Room of the White House. Not since the memorable night when Pablo Casals played there have so many of this country's distinguished musicians come together in that historic room.

Pianists were there from Rudolf Serkin to Ralph Votapek. The country's string players were handsomely represented by cellist Leonard Rose. And for singers, there were a host of Metropolitan stars including Roberta Peters, Mildred Miller, Richard Tucker, Robert Merrill, and Jerome Hines. For conductors there were Erich Leinsdorf, Donald Johanos of Dallas, and Howard Mitchell.

Besides all these, there were composers and opera impresarios, critics, and a host of lay experts. Van Cliburn, who was first place winner in the First Tschaikowsky Competition in 1958, served as master of ceremonies. He introduced each of the performers with a brief biographical sketch, noting, in passing that he probably would not have landed the assignment if he, too, were not from Texas.

The artists who appeared were Simon Estes, bass-baritone from Iowa, a third place winner in the vocal competition; Stephen Kates, cellist of New York and Los Angeles, second place in the cello competition; Veronica Tyler, Baltimore soprano, who won second place in the vocal contest; Misha Dichter, born in Shanghai, now is a naturalized citizen, who placed second in the piano division; and Jane Marsh, soprano from California, who won first prize in the first Tschaikowsky Competition to include a vocal division.

Lowell Farr, who accompanied many United States entrants in the Moscow trials, played for four of the performers last night. Erich Leinsdorf, forsaking his conductor's stand, asked if he might play for Miss Tyler as a mark of appreciation for the Johnson's tribute to the young musicians.

The brilliance of the small audience seemed not to disturb the musicians on the stage a bit. They sang and played with a poise and ease that recalled the far tougher sessions they went through recently in Moscow. Estes has a richly handsome voice, which he uses well, while Miss Tyler and Marsh showed the benefits of their recent seasons on concert stages.

Kates is a cellist of formidable technique and obvious poetic sense, and Dichter in the subtlest Brahms and flashing Stravinsky made it easy to see why the Moscow audiences had preferred him for first rather than the second place the judges awarded him.

It was a heart-warming night for music and the White House seemed wholly at ease as a background for the young musicians of the country.

World Journal Tribune
NEW YORK, NEW YORK
D. 900,000
SEPT 18 1966

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 155,541 SUN. 203,904
SEP 18 1966

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 57,734 SUN. 45,423
SEPT 18 1966

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,425
SEP 17 1966

Betty Beale in Washington

Johnson Stumping For the Arts

DEAR ——————:

President Johnson's political poll rating may be slipping but if he doesn't watch out he's apt to end up with the title, King of Culture.

Anyone who thinks that's as unlikely a label as any that could be bestowed on the un-suave, politics-loving, cattle-loving Texan wasn't at the White House concert for Tchaikovsky winners.

LBJ himself introduced the concert in the East Room by our "national treasures," as he called the young performers—though he had to do it in the dark. Somebody goofed and forgot to put the spotlight in the darkened room on the lectern where the President stood. It didn't go on until after social secretary Bess Abell tiptoed around the back of the room to where the spotlight was concealed in a panel, in her stocking feet, carrying her pumps in her hand. "Don't write this," she asked as she accomplished her mission without making a sound.

Van Cliburn then took over as master ceremonies for the concert by the Americans who won honors in Moscow this summer. Van, who was the first American to win the Moscow contest, praised the President for his interest in the arts. "Many patrons of the arts will give money," he said, "but President and Mrs. Johnson lend their presence which is far beyond money."

★ ★ ★

ERICH LEINSDORF, the conductor of the brilliant Boston Symphony was so thrilled with the President's sponsorship that he accompanied one of the sopranos, Veronica Tyler, at the piano, and later gave LBJ a great big embrace when he went through the receiving line in the Blue Room.

Frank Thompson, the Democratic Congressman from New Jersey, who started promoting government participation in the arts years ago and did more than any other legislator to get a cultural center for Washington, said that evening that it was President Johnson's personal efforts in getting behind the arts bill that got it through.

"One of the first things he did as President was to get me on the phone and say he wanted me to get behind a national arts bill. He also called Senator Pell and also the Majority Leader and the Speaker. The bill was the President's bill, make no mistake about that," said the Congressman, who had more right than anyone else in Congress to claim most of the credit. LBJ also got the 10 per cent admissions tax removed from all opera, theater and ballet performances.

Though it will give the boys in smoke-filled rooms a blow to hear it, that southern drawl from down on the Pedernales seems about to become the voice of culture.

Victor Borge, that comical musician or that musical comedian, who nicknamed Lady Bird's husband "Gentleman Bird," their daughters the "two Mynah Birds" and the secret service "the Bird Watchers," was as amusing off-stage at that party as he is on.

Standing in the dining room and holding a plate of food, a fork and a napkin, Borge observed, with his deadpan expression, "Don't you love these seated dinners?" When composer Rudolf Friml joined him he offered him some food. Friml opened his mouth and Borge started feeding him.

"Why don't you eat some yourself?" he was asked.

"I want to see if it makes him sick," rejoined the comedian with his embarrassed giggle.

When he is being serious Borge wants to tell the world that he thinks LBJ is "the greatest president—not the greatest man—but the greatest president" to have lived in the White House because of sheer acomplishment. If someone had gone to the aid of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, etc., when Hitler started to invade, as we are aiding the Vietnamese, there would have been no World War II, said the Dane who escaped Europe in time.

★ ★ ★

JANE MARSH, the 24-year-old soprano who won the Tchaikovsky voice competition, had a ball in Moscow. She loved the Russian people—not their government. "I haven't had so much fun without having to try in years. I can't wait to get back," she enthused. "I liked it because of the people. They are the most unpretentious human beings I have ever come across."

Miss Marsh is the extraordinary girl who was a champion swimmer until she took up horseback riding, when she became a cup-winning rider until she took up voice. She didn't even know she could sing until she went to college and someone told her she had great potential. Although her voice is superb she didn't show it off to advantage at the White House because she leaned on the piano like a torch singer; she wore an overdone, matronly hairdo, and she wore long white silk gloves that added nothing to the chic of her costume.

Van Cliburn is due to play here with the National Symphony the second week in October and President Johnson told National Symphony conductor Howard Mitchell, "Unless I'm in Alaska I'll be at Cliburn's concert."

Lynda Johnson, who is mulling over whether to take a research job with the National Geographic here or continue to look for a job in New York where she really wants to work, said at the party that she gets so many letters telling her what people like or don't like about every man she goes out with, she's thinking of taking a poll. She might send out a form letter, she joked, wherein people could check off the types they think she should associate with.—Yours for more of the same.

CULTURAL COHORTS . . . President Johnson returns the embrace of Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, at the White House concert and reception.

GIGGLING GROUP . . It must have been something just said by Van Cliburn, whose head appears behind Lynda Johnson's, that has Lynda, Mrs. Johnson and Jane Marsh.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 335,705 SUN. 392,378
SEP 19 1966

KANSAS CITY FINDS OPERA TO ITS LIKING

KANSAS CITY'S own modest Lyric theater will launch its ninth annual fall season of professional repertory opera tomorrow night out on Troost avenue. Although Opera News (the primary publication in this field) has devoted space to it, the event seems scarcely one to draw much national notice, particularly amid all the fanfare that has marked the debut of the Metropolitan company's palatial new home at Lincoln Center.

Nevertheless, the success of an experiment like the Lyric's is not without some importance even to the august New York house—and its only a little less prestigious fellows in Chicago and San Francisco. For, to borrow the language of baseball, the Lyric represents essentially a minor league club, designed to afford young American singing actors the on-stage experience which is so invaluable in preparing them for the majors.

It was, indeed, a former general artistic director of the Met, Eric Leinsdorf, who pointed out that relationship, when he addressed an opening session of the Tanglewood music festival summer before last. Europe, he said, was usefully equipped with many such facilities—small provincial opera houses and side-street opera theaters—that could feel talent into the great international houses of Vienna, Paris, Rome and the like. To Leinsdorf, the operatic big league of the United States appears to need a similar training circuit.

By a coincidence, the present conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra has just furnished an illustration of his thesis, an illustration connected with the Lyric. Among the singers he recruited for his new, and possibly definitive, recording of Wagner's "Lohengrin" is William Ledbetter, a baritone who plays one of the secondary but named roles. This is the Ledbetter of the Lyric's earliest seasons, when he was at the start of his career and had an opportunity here to perform a wide variety of roles that no large company normally would have felt free to entrust to him.

The growing list of Lyric alumni credits now extends to Hamburg, Zurich, Salzburg, Dusseldorf, Paris, Vienna, New York (both Met and City Center) and Chicago, to say nothing of the Met's new national touring company. But perhaps the Lyric's most important single achievement in these first nine years has been to demonstrate the attractiveness of professional opera theater to a home public generally unfamiliar with it and to build up an audience that now regularly begins to exceed the capacity of its 815-seat house.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WEEKLY - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
SEPT 28 1966

NEW YORK ILLUSTRATED
(The Met Goes to Paris)
With Leonard Probst, others
Producer-Director: Larry Johnson
Writer-Narrator: Probst
60 Mins., Sat., 6 p.m.
BOWERY SAVINGS BANK
WNBC-TV, N.Y. (film-color)

The hidden message in this account of America's grandest opera house is that the Met shoulda stood in bed. The Metopera went to Paris for the first time in 1910, and not even the nonpareil combination of Toscanini on the podium and Caruso on the pipes could take that visit out of the flop class.

In "The Met Goes to Paris" (circa last May, 56 years and trillions of trills later), Leonard Prosbt, who narrated and scripted and is also WNBC's theatre critic, doesn't say exactly what happened in 1910; just a dud. Period. This year's "all-American" one-week stand at the old, small Theatre de France had the Met presenting "Marriage of Figaro" and "Barber of Seville" not long after scramming its ancient New York house for the Lincoln Center digs. Roberta Peters was booed and one customer, presumably a Frenchman, shouted "Bravo Callas!" during the performance. It seems Mme. Callas was in the audience. She was also a latecomer, which in itself raised a stir, but more in her favor than disfavor.

Robert Merrill, Miss Peter's co-star in "Barber," attributed the booing if not the boorishness to anti-American feeling in France. Met chieftain Rudolf Bing was described by Prosbt as "sarcastic" and "depressed" about the affair, but when interviewed for this filmed account of the Met's Paris junket, Bing observed merely that booing "has become a sport all over the world."

Among those shown at rehearsal and elsewhere, with some commenting, were director Cyril Ritchard, conductors Erich Leinsdorf and Thomas Schippers, Met singer Judith Raskin, and film actress Jean Seberg, the latter now a Paris resident.

The word from the French press: A disappointment. This color film, launching the season of the station's "New York Illustrated," was not much better, with only a superficial attempt at reporting French hostility vis-a-vis America's No. 1 opera company.

Trau.

223

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

MAR 25 1967

New England Newsclip

COUNCIL ON ARTS, HUMANITIES MEET—Gov. John A. Volpe as he met with members of the Council on Arts and Humanities in h is office at the State House, Boston. From left: Benjamin Trustman; Record American-Sunday Advertiser drama critic, Elliot Norton; Gov. Volpe; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Bos[illegible] and John Weitzel.

Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,817
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,176
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,593
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,785
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 61,129
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 14,186
OCT 14 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687
OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Item (e)
LYNN, Mass.
Circ. 34,355
OCT 14 1966

Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 40,258
041
OCT 13 1966

Arts, Humanities Council Named By Gov. Volpe

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. John A. Volpe has named the 15 members of the Massachusetts State Council on Arts and Humanities who he said are to work "to make the arts and humanities a vital aspect of modern society."

Volpe announced the appointments Wednesday. The council was set up this year with a $36,000 federal grant and a $25,000 appropriation from the state legislature.

Named to three-year terms were S. Lane Faison Jr., of Williams College; Sinclair H. Hitchings, keeper of prints at Boston Public Library; Dr. Philip Benzanson, head of the music department at the University of Massachusetts; architect Josiah H. Child Sr. of Provincetown; Robert G. Gardner of Cambridge.

Named to two - year terms were Elliot Norton, drama critic of the Boston Record-American and Sunday Advertiser; attorney Jeptha H. Wade, Boston; attorney John P. Weitzel, Cambridge; Ora J. Gatti, director of Fine Arts at Worcester Public Schools, attorney Benjamin A. Trustman of Brookline.

Named to one-year terms were Mrs. Bruce Crane Dalton; George E. Harris, Boston; sculptor Alfred Duca, Gloucester, Mrs. Emily Marks of Winchester; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Volpe named Wade chairman of the council and Norton vice chairman.

New York Post
D. 324,256 SUN. 243,637
OCT 10 1966

Tureck Forms Society To Further Bach Study

Rosalyn Tureck, celebrated Bach interpreter, has formed an international Bach Society which is currently being organized in the United States and in Europe. The first chapters to be formed are here and in San Diego, California. Carlos Moseley, manager of the N. Y. Philharmonic, is the first member of the international honorary board. Honorary members of the society include Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Rhenca Eckert-Schweitzer, daughter of the late Albert Schweitzer.

The objectives of the society will be to expand possibilities for the study and performance of Bach throughout the world. A publication is planned, a permanent orchestra will be developed and advanced studies in Bach style will be offered to selected students. For further information, write Miss Tureck, director, 165 W. 57th St.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900
OCT 7 1966

ORCHESTRAS

Flying the Coop

Nobody really sees him. Nobody really hears him. He is the fellow in the frayed white tie and tails, the one buried seven rows back, peering sourly through a cluster of elbows. He is the symphony musician—bored, frustrated and anonymous. So he didn't become the second Heifetz as everybody back in Glen Falls said he would. There was nothing else to do but join a big-city symphony, file lock-step onto the stage—no talking, please—and, at the nod of the imperious maestro, saw away mechanically at the Brahms First for the 101st time.

Now, however, there is a happy alternative. Like songbirds discovering a hole in the cage, musicians are flying the cooped-up confines of the symphony and roosting in the refuge of the university.

Among the hardest-hit symphonies is the Philadelphia Orchestra, which recently filed suit to prevent three of its best string players—Cellist Charles Brennand, Violinists Veda Reynolds and Irwin Eisenberg—from joining the faculty of the University of Washington. The orchestra contends that the musicians handed in their resignations four months shy of the year's notice that their contracts call for. The three, plus Violist Alan Iglitzin, who was released from the orchestra four months ago, are scheduled to perform their first concert next week as the university's new resident string quartet. Meanwhile, the orchestra is wrestling with even bigger problems: at week's end, the 105 Philadelphia musicians were locked in a bitter strike over salaries, forcing the cancellation of the first six concerts of their season.

Artistic Identity. The troubles in Philadelphia are symptomatic of the unrest felt everywhere in the nation's leading orchestras. Two years ago, when the Philadelphia forbade its players to moonlight with any group larger than a sextet, Concertmaster Anshel Brusilow angrily resigned, took one of the orchestra's musicians with him, and formed the 35-member Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia.

Essentially, as Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf points out, the problem "is a loss of identity." Because they can offer an opportunity for more individual expression, he says, "the universities are our biggest competition." To compensate, the progressive Boston management founded the Boston Symphony Chamber Players last year (TIME, March 18), encourages all of its players to take on as many solo engagements as they feel they can possibly handle. Says Leinsdorf: "This is very important for the morale of the players who want to keep, and have every right to keep, their artistic identity."

After all, no string player invests roughly 20 years and $25,000 for training [illegible] security of a symphony orchestra. In his heart, if not in the ear of his audience, he is a full-fledged virtuoso who, says Los Angeles Symphony Conductor Zubin Mehta, "joins a symphony only as a last resort, and then is frustrated." On the campus, however, he can assume the stature of a soloist, play largely what he wants (musicians' tastes rarely agree with those of a symphony audience) the way he wants to (instead of having interpretations dictated by a conductor).

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700
NOV 1966

for your INFORMATION

Wulsins Honor Leinsdorfs At Tanglewood Reception

Baldwin president Lucien Wulsin and Mrs. Wulsin feted Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Leinsdorf at a gala reception marking the conclusion of the 1966 Berkshire Music Festival Season at Tanglewood. The Sunday afternoon champagne buffet followed the last weekend of concerts for the summer.

The reception was held at Seranak, the beautiful Berkshire home of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony. Among the many distinguished guests were Baldwin artists Jeanne-Marie Darre' and Jorge Bolet, who had been weekend soloists at the Tanglewood concerts.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the renowned Berkshire Music Center and Music Festival. Baldwin is the official piano of the Center and Festival as well as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Left to right: Lucien Wulsin, pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre', Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and pianist Jorge Bolet.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
NOV 1966

PRESIDENT WELCOMES AMERICAN MOSCOW WINNERS

Five American winners of the Moscow Tchaikovsky Competition were greeted by President and Mrs. Johnson at a special concert and buffet supper at the White House on September 7. The President, stating that he did not wish to "exceed the powers" of his office, gave an unofficial designation of National Treasure to sopranos Jane Marsh and Veronica Tyler, pianist Misha Dichter, cellist Stephen Kates, and bass-baritone Simon Estes. The five artists performed in turn before an audience of some two hundred in the white and gold East Room; master of ceremonies was Van Cliburn.

A surprise contributor to the occasion was Erich Leinsdorf, who served as Miss Tyler's accompanist; Lowell Farr officiated for the rest. Musical as well as political figures dotted the audience—among them Rudolf Serkin, Richard Tucker, Arthur Fiedler, Rudolf Friml, Howard Hanson, and Lukas Foss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488
DEC 18 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,293
DEC 18 1966

THE ERICH LEINSDORFS attended the National Council of the Arts dinner at the White House Tuesday night. The Boston Symphony's music director was seated at the right hand of Mrs. Johnson. The next day the tireless conductor was back in Symphony Hall directing recording sessions of the orchestra followed by rehearsals for this afternoon's and tomorrow evening's concerts.

223

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

MAR 25 1967

New England Newsclip

COUNCIL ON ARTS, HUMANITIES MEET—Gov. John A. Volpe as he met with members of the Council on Arts and Humanities in h is office at the State House, Boston. From left: Benjamin Trustman; Record American-Sunday Advertiser drama critic, Elliot Norton; Gov. Volpe; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and John Weitzel.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,817

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,593

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 61,129

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 14,186

OCT 14 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Item (e)
LYNN, Mass.
Circ. 34,355

OCT 14 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 40,258

047

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,176

OCT 13 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,785

047

OCT 13 1966

Arts, Humanities Council Named By Gov. Volpe

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. John A. Volpe has named the 15 members of the Massachusetts State Council on Arts and Humanities who he said are to work "to make the arts and humanities a vital aspect of modern society."

Volpe announced the appointments Wednesday. The council was set up this year with a $36,000 federal grant and a $25,000 appropriation from the state legislature.

Named to three-year terms were S. Lane Faison Jr., of Williams College; Sinclair H. Hitchings, keeper of prints at Boston Public Library; Dr. Philip Benzanson, head of the music department at the University of Massachusetts; architect Josiah H. Child Sr. of Provincetown; Robert G. Gardner of Cambridge.

Named to two - year terms were Elliot Norton, drama critic of the Boston Record-American and Sunday Advertiser; attorney Jeptha H. Wade, Boston; attorney John P. Weitzel, Cambridge; Ora J. Gatti, director of Fine Arts at Worcester Public Schools, attorney Benjamin A. Trustman of Brookline.

Named to one-year terms were Mrs. Bruce Crane Dalton; George E. Harris, Boston; sculptor Alfred Duca, Gloucester, Mrs. Emily Marks of Winchester; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Volpe named Wade chairman of the council and Norton vice chairman.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

OCT 7 1966

ORCHESTRAS

Flying the Coop

Nobody really sees him. Nobody really hears him. He is the fellow in the frayed white tie and tails, the one buried seven rows back, peering sourly through a cluster of elbows. He is the symphony musician—bored, frustrated and anonymous. So he didn't become the second Heifetz as everybody back in Glen Falls said he would. There was nothing else to do but join a big-city symphony, file lock-step onto the stage—no talking, please—and, at the nod of the imperious maestro, saw away mechanically at the Brahms First for the 101st time.

Now, however, there is a happy alternative. Like songbirds discovering a hole in the cage, musicians are flying the cooped-up confines of the symphony and roosting in the refuge of the university.

Among the hardest-hit symphonies is the Philadelphia Orchestra, which recently filed suit to prevent three of its best string players—Cellist Charles Brennand, Violinists Veda Reynolds and Irwin Eisenberg—from joining the faculty of the University of Washington. The orchestra contends that the musicians handed in their resignations four months shy of the year's notice that their contracts call for. The three, plus Violist Alan Iglitzin, who was released from the orchestra four months ago, are scheduled to perform their first concert next week as the university's new resident string quartet. Meanwhile, the orchestra is wrestling with even bigger problems: at week's end, the 105 Philadelphia musicians were locked in a bitter strike over salaries, forcing the cancellation of the first six concerts of their season.

Artistic Identity. The troubles in Philadelphia are symptomatic of the unrest felt everywhere in the nation's leading orchestras. Two years ago, when the Philadelphia forbade its players to moonlight with any group larger than a sextet, Concertmaster Anshel Brusilow angrily resigned, took one of the orchestra's musicians with him, and formed the 35-member Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia.

Essentially, as Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf points out, the problem "is a loss of identity." Because they can offer an opportunity for more individual expression, he says, "the universities are our biggest competition." To compensate, the progressive Boston management founded the Boston Symphony Chamber Players last year (TIME, March 18), encourages all of its players to take on as many solo engagements as they feel they can possibly handle. Says Leinsdorf: "This is very important for the morale of the players who want to keep, and have every right to keep, their artistic identity."

After all, no string player invests roughly 20 years and $25,000 for training to sit in the hundred-headed obscurity of a symphony orchestra. In his heart, if not in the ear of his audience, he is a full-fledged virtuoso who, says Los Angeles Symphony Conductor Zubin Mehta, "joins a symphony only as a last resort, and then is frustrated." On the campus, however, he can assume the stature of a soloist, play largely what he wants (musicians' tastes rarely agree with those of a symphony audience) the way he wants to (instead of having interpretations dictated by a conductor).

New York Post
D. 324,256 SUN. 243,637

OCT 10 1966

Tureck Forms Society To Further Bach Study

Rosalyn Tureck, celebrated Bach interpreter, has formed an international Bach Society which is currently being organized in the United States and in Europe. The first chapters to be formed are here and in San Diego, California. Carlos Moseley, manager of the N. Y. Philharmonic, is the first member of the international honorary board. Honorary members of the society include Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Rhenca Eckert-Schweitzer, daughter of the late Albert Schweitzer.

The objectives of the society will be to expand possibilities for the study and performance of Bach throughout the world. A publication is planned, a permanent orchestra will be developed and advanced studies in Bach style will be offered to selected students. For further information, write Miss Tureck, director. 165 W. 57th St.

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 6,700

NOV 1966

for your INFORMATION

Wulsins Honor Leinsdorfs At Tanglewood Reception

Baldwin president Lucien Wulsin and Mrs. Wulsin feted Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Leinsdorf at a gala reception marking the conclusion of the 1966 Berkshire Music Festival Season at Tanglewood. The Sunday afternoon champagne buffet followed the last weekend of concerts for the summer.

The reception was held at Seranak, the beautiful Berkshire home of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony. Among the many distinguished guests were Baldwin artists Jeanne-Marie Darre' and Jorge Bolet, who had been weekend soloists at the Tanglewood concerts.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the renowned Berkshire Music Center and Music Festival. Baldwin is the official piano of the Center and Festival as well as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Left to right: Lucien Wulsin, pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre', Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and pianist Jorge Bolet.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

NOV 1966

PRESIDENT WELCOMES AMERICAN MOSCOW WINNERS

Five American winners of the Moscow Tchaikovsky Competition were greeted by President and Mrs. Johnson at a special concert and buffet supper at the White House on September 7. The President, stating that he did not wish to "exceed the powers" of his office, gave an unofficial designation of National Treasure to sopranos Jane Marsh and Veronica Tyler, pianist Misha Dichter, cellist Stephen Kates, and bass-baritone Simon Estes. The five artists performed in turn before an audience of some two hundred in the white and gold East Room; master of ceremonies was Van Cliburn.

A surprise contributor to the occasion was Erich Leinsdorf, who served as Miss Tyler's accompanist; Lowell Farr officiated for the rest. Musical as well as political figures dotted the audience—among them Rudolf Serkin, Richard Tucker, Arthur Fiedler, Rudolf Friml, Howard Hanson, and Lukas Foss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 430,488

DEC 18 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,293

DEC 16 1966

THE ERICH LEINSDORFS attended the National Council of the Arts dinner at the White House Tuesday night. The Boston Symphony's music director was seated at the right hand of Mrs. Johnson. The next day the tireless conductor was back in Symphony Hall directing recording sessions of the orchestra followed by rehearsals for this afternoon's and tomorrow evening's concerts.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

DEC 9 1966

MUSIC

ORCHESTRAS

Ladies' Day

Orin O'Brien, 31, the newest member of the New York Philharmonic, scurried into Philharmonic Hall one rainy night last week and, ignoring the musicians' locker room, got dressed in a washroom. It was not a hazing rite. Indeed, no rookie has ever been so warmly accepted by the orchestra; to a man they say, "Orin is one of the boys." Only Orin is one of the girls—the only girl, in fact, in the 104-member orchestra, a situation unique at the Philharmonic, so there is yet no place for her to dress.

Miss O'Brien, who is as curvy as the double bass she plays, does not mind. On tour, the men make up for it by falling all over themselves to carry her bags, and save her a seat on the bus. More than that, she is justifiably proud of breaking the sex barrier at the Philharmonic, which, apart from female harpists, has never in its 125-year history hired a woman musician full-time. As it is, Orin struggled through ten years and several auditions before she finally won the job this year over 33 men bass players.

Rare Birds. Elsewhere in the U.S., lady musicians are having a heyday. The Cleveland Orchestra now has 11, the San Francisco 17, the Houston 25 and the American Symphony 44. Trombonist Betty Glover, 43, adds class to the brass of the Cincinnati Symphony; Helen Taylor, 24, plays a mean English horn for the Houston Symphony. The rare bird in the Los Angeles aviary is Barbara Winters, 28, who, to produce the needed penetrating sounds from her oboe, must pit her trim 120 lbs. against male fellow oboists who average a burly-chested 200 lbs. To maintain the exceptional breath control necessary to control her contrary instrument, Winters swims and works out daily at a gym. "It leaves me almost no time for social life," she says. "I'd hate to think what I would do if I were married."

Peggy Lucchesi, mother of three, hauls around two 35-lb. timpani and beats the big bass drum for the San Francisco Symphony. While most married symphony women practice the "offbeat rhythm method"—that is, plan their babies for delivery during the off-season—Peggy merrily pounds away on her drum practically right into the labor room. Before her last delivery, the boys in the band room were betting that the baby would be born with its hands clapped over its ears.

Telltale Clicking. Despite the undeniable excellence of the ladies, some men musicians and conductors still view them with a wary eye. They subscribe to Sir Thomas Beecham's dictum: "If she is attractive, I can't perform with her; if she is not, then I won't." Lady-Killer Zubin Mehta, 30, who appreciates a well-turned ankle as much as a well-played musical phrase, has different reasons. He has enforced a limit of 16 women in his Los Angeles Philharmonic, because "a woman's life in the orchestra is not as long as a man's; she is just not as good at 60 as a man is at 60."

San Francisco's Josef Krips did not care if they were 60 or 16; he was an antifeminist for years, only recently claimed conversion when he hired a trio of "wonderful girls who play like angels." But some of the women think differently, grumble privately about the insulting way he bunches them all in the middle of the orchestra so they won't be seen. Boston's Erich Leinsdorf requires that auditioning musicians play for him behind a screen, lest his eyes influence his ears; prospective members are cautioned not to talk and to enter on tiptoe, so the telltale clicking of their heels will not give them away.

Most musicians agree that women are all right in their place—just as long as that place is not the first desk, a position that gives them authority over the other players in their section. When that happens, egos get bruised. Says a woman who is a first cellist: "How do I tell an older man that he consistently comes in early on bar 24?" The majority of conductors avoid such problems by refusing to promote women to the first desk; one noted maestro once told a string player that she played better than any of his men, but alas, "your pants are too short."

Band-Room Barbs. There is also a longstanding belief among impresarios that for psychological reasons, audiences do not respond so well to women players, because the "conflict and domination" struggle with an instrument is strictly man's work. When attractive Doriot Dwyer was appointed first flutist of the Boston Symphony 14 years ago, one proper Brahmin sent her a package with a letter demanding that she hide her exposed ankles with the enclosed pair of thick grey stockings. She demurred, and at least one Boston man is glad; since the arrival of the ladies, he has taken to watching the concerts through binoculars.

Some musicians complain that women are emotionally ill tuned to the rigors of symphony life and that they play erratically during menstruation or when they are concerned about family problems. The American Symphony's Elayne Jones, 38, surmounted three handicaps: she is a woman, a timpanist and a Negro. When she appeared with the Symphony of the Air a few years ago, she says, "two guys walked out after I walked in." In the Detroit Symphony's band room, Harpist Elyze Yockey, 27, is forever hearing somebody mutter, "Why don't you stay home and take care of your babies?" (She has two.) One man expressed his disapproval of his curvaceous desk mate by twisting the tuning pegs of her cello until it sounded like a sick cat.

Respect, Not Money. All of this only makes the girls work harder. Philadelphia Cellist Elsa Hilger, 62, who in 1935 became one of the first women ever to play with a major U.S. orchestra, feels that she is "one of the gang." She insists upon carrying her own bags, does not mind the bothersome business of changing behind trunks and fussing with her wardrobe while on tour (harpists find that pleated skirts stay neatly pressed if wound through the strings of their instruments). Says Boston's Leinsdorf: "Uniformly, the women's pride is so great that their attendance record is better than the men's. They have my utmost respect." But women rarely get the utmost money, and most orchestra managers freely admit that given equal talent, they will hire the breadwinning man over the woman every time.

Yet in the face of everything, the women can tune up that one eternally winning instrument: charm. When things get tight, as Orin O'Brien explains, "you just smile and give in." No man can cope with that, and what really counts in the end is that the girls can play exceedingly well. "Let the best man in," declares Leinsdorf, echoing the sentiments of most of the profession. "And if the best man is a woman, let her in too."

ARTHUR STATLER

BASSIST O'BRIEN

AMERICAN SYMPHONY STRINGS & WOOD WINDS

JOYCE R. WILSON

TIMPANIST LUCCHESI

When all else fails, there's always that eternally winning instrument—charm.

INGENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
M. 489,700

NOV 1966

Young Girl With A Big Future

Coming out first over a hundred competitors in Russia's famed Tchaikovsky International Competition, Jane Marsh seems extraordinary at everything!

When Jane Marsh was a teen-ager, she owned a horse named Sandy that she used to show in Western rodeos, giving exhibitions of riding and roping. She also was one of the best high school swimmers in the vicinity of Mill Valley, California (a suburb of San Francisco) and did a lot of competing in local meets. Tall, brown-haired and blue-eyed, Jane was pretty much of an all-around outdoors girl.

Today, at twenty-four, the same Jane Marsh is one of the most talked-about and sought-after young opera singers in the world. And three years ago she had hardly sung a note of music in her life!

How did this change-over come about? In the first place, Jane became famous overnight last June when she traveled to Moscow to enter the Tchaikovsky International Competition held for young musicians in the Soviet Union. This is the competition that pianist Van Cliburn won in 1958. Since then, no American had ever taken first prize—no American until Jane Marsh, that is.

When the panel of twenty judges, drawn from all over the world, heard her sing a grueling series of operatic arias, concert songs, and folk melodies (both American and Russian), they voted her the top singer over one hundred other contestants. Not only did she win the prize of 2500 rubles (about $2800), when she got back home she was praised and feted and continued on page 78 honored, deluged with offers to sing (including one by the Metropolitan Opera, which she has not yet accepted because she isn't sure she's ready) and signed to a recording contract by RCA-Victor. Her first record, containing some of the prize-winning selections she sang in Moscow, will be out soon.

I had dinner with Jane not long ago in a Chinese restaurant on Sixth Avenue in New York, not far from her apartment. She likes Chinese food, but on this occasion she polished off a thoroughly American steak dinner—with salad instead of potatoes. She told me that she first got the idea of becoming a professional singer while she was a psychology major at Oberlin College. Naturally endowed with a pure and lovely voice, she had never before really thought of training it. Now, however, she began a period of concentrated musical study, and by the fall of 1965 had progressed so well that Erich Leinsdorf, the renowned conductor, invited her to be soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its opening night performance of Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony. Then, after that, came Moscow and fame.

Jane is pretty sure that she's going to concentrate on opera in the years ahead, and every one who has heard her sing expects her to be one of tomorrow's stars. She's 5' 11" tall, but gracefully proportioned so that one is not conscious of undue height. And she's very pretty and has a fine stage presence.

What's more, she brings as much zest to the job of being an opera singer as she did to her horsemanship displays and swimming meets. In fact, those early competitions may have helped her through the arduous Moscow singing contest. For while some of the other entrants were understandably tense and nervous, Jane Marsh sailed through the successive eliminations serene and relaxed. "I never had so much fun in my life," she said. "I'd do it all over again—to lose."

—H. Kupferberg

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221

DEC 16 1966

224

Cantata On Joseph Written For JWB

NEW YORK—The major musical work on a Jewish theme commissioned by the National Jewish Welfare Board as one of the principal projects in celebration of its Golden Jubilee has been delivered by the composer to Sanford Solender, executive vice-president of JWB, it was announced today. Robert Starer wrote the [illegible] "Joseph and His Brothe[illegible]" [illegible] text selected and adapted from the Bible. He is considered one of the most talented young composers in the United States.

JWB wanted a composition that could be performed by outstanding symphony orchestras, as well as by small groups in Jewish Community Centers and Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Associations. A committee under the chairmanship of Rabbi Avraham Soltes, chairman of JWB's Jewish Music Council, commissioned Mr. Starer to compose the cantata and guided him in the selection and development of the theme.

The work has been scored for full orchestra and choir, as well as for performance by soloists, mixed chorus, organ or piano.

Mr. Starer was born in Vienna in 1924 and entered the State Academy of Music at the age of 13. In 1938 he immigrated to Palestine and continued his studies at the Conservatoire in Jerusalem. During World War II he served with the Royal Air Force and later toured the Middle East and Southern Europe as pianist and accompanist.

In 1947 Mr. Starer came on a post-graduate scholarship to the Juilliard School of Music and became a member of the faculty after his graduation in 1949. He became an American citizen in 1957. He has won two Guggenheim Fellowships.

Mr. Starer's works have been performed by the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leonard Bernstein and by other major orchestras in Europe, Israel, and North and South America under Erich Leinsdorf, Thor Johnson, Thomas Scherman, Eleazar de Carvalho and many others. He has written two symphonies, two piano concertos, choral, chamber and vocal works, a one-act opera, two ballets commissioned by CBS television, an evening-length ballet and three scores commissioned by Martha Graham.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

DEC 9 1966

MUSIC

ORCHESTRAS

Ladies' Day

Orin O'Brien, 31, the newest member of the New York Philharmonic, scurried into Philharmonic Hall one rainy night last week and, ignoring the musicians' locker room, got dressed in a washroom. It was not a hazing rite. Indeed, no rookie has ever been so warmly accepted by the orchestra; to a man they say, "Orin is one of the boys." Only Orin is one of the girls—the only girl, in fact, in the 104-member orchestra, a situation unique at the Philharmonic, so there is yet no place for her to dress.

Miss O'Brien, who is as curvy as the double bass she plays, does not mind. On tour, the men make up for it by falling all over themselves to carry her bags, and save her a seat on the bus. More than that, she is justifiably proud of breaking the sex barrier at the Philharmonic, which, apart from female harpists, has never in its 125-year history hired a woman musician full-time. As it is, Orin struggled through ten years and several auditions before she finally won the job this year over 33 men bass players.

Rare Birds. Elsewhere in the U.S., lady musicians are having a heyday. The Cleveland Orchestra now has 11, the San Francisco 17, the Houston 25 and the American Symphony 44. Trombonist Betty Glover, 43, adds class to the brass of the Cincinnati Symphony; Helen Taylor, 24, plays a mean English horn for the Houston Symphony. The rare bird in the Los Angeles aviary is Barbara Winters, 28, who, to produce the needed penetrating sounds from her oboe, must pit her trim 120 lbs. against male fellow oboists who average a burly-chested 200 lbs. To maintain the exceptional breath control necessary to control her contrary instrument, Winters swims and works out daily at a gym. "It leaves me almost no time for social life," she says. "I'd hate to think what I would do if I were married."

Peggy Lucchesi, mother of three, hauls around two 35-lb. timpani and beats the big bass drum for the San Francisco Symphony. While most married symphony women practice the "offbeat rhythm method"—that is, plan their babies for delivery during the off-season—Peggy merrily pounds away on her drum practically right into the labor room. Before her last delivery, the boys in the band room were betting that the baby would be born with its hands clapped over its ears.

Telltale Clicking. Despite the undeniable excellence of the ladies, some men musicians and conductors still view them with a wary eye. They subscribe to Sir Thomas Beecham's dictum: "If she is attractive, I can't perform with her; if she is not, then I won't." Lady-Killer Zubin Mehta, 30, who appreciates a well-turned ankle as much as a well-played musical phrase, has different reasons. He has enforced a limit of 16 women in his Los Angeles Philharmonic, because "a woman's life in the orchestra is not as long as a man's; she is just not as good at 60 as a man is at 60."

San Francisco's Josef Krips did not care if they were 60 or 16; he was an antifeminist for years, only recently claimed conversion when he hired a trio of "wonderful girls who play like angels." But some of the women think differently, grumble privately about the insulting way he bunches them all in the middle of the orchestra so they won't be seen. Boston's Erich Leinsdorf requires that auditioning musicians play for him behind a screen, lest his eyes influence his ears; prospective members are cautioned not to talk and to enter on tiptoe, so the telltale clicking of their heels will not give them away.

Most musicians agree that women are all right in their place—just as long as that place is not the first desk, a position that gives them authority over the other players in their section. When that happens, egos get bruised. Says a woman who is a first cellist: "How do I tell an older man that he consistently comes in early on bar 24?" The majority of conductors avoid such problems by refusing to promote women to the first desk; one noted maestro once told a string player that she played better than any of his men, but alas, "your pants are too short."

Band-Room Barbs. There is also a longstanding belief among impresarios that for psychological reasons, audiences do not respond so well to women players, because the "conflict and domination" struggle with an instrument is strictly man's work. When attractive Doriot Dwyer was appointed first flutist of the Boston Symphony 14 years ago, one proper Brahmin sent her a package with a letter demanding that she hide her exposed ankles with the enclosed pair of thick grey stockings. She demurred, and at least one Boston man is glad; since the arrival of the ladies, he has taken to watching the concerts through binoculars.

Some musicians complain that women are emotionally ill tuned to the rigors of symphony life and that they play erratically during menstruation or when they are concerned about family problems. The American Symphony's Elayne Jones, 38, surmounted three handicaps: she is a woman, a timpanist and a Negro. When she appeared with the Symphony of the Air a few years ago, she says, "two guys walked out after I walked in." In the Detroit Symphony's band room, Harpist Elyze Yockey, 37, is forever hearing somebody mutter, "Why don't you stay home and take care of your babies?" (She has two.) One man expressed his disapproval of his curvaceous desk mate by twisting the tuning pegs of her cello until it sounded like a sick cat.

Respect, Not Money. All of this only makes the girls work harder. Philadelphia Cellist Elsa Hilger, 62, who in 1935 became one of the first women ever to play with a major U.S. orchestra, feels that she is "one of the gang." She insists upon carrying her own bags, does not mind the bothersome business of changing behind trunks and fussing with her wardrobe while on tour (harpists find that pleated skirts stay neatly pressed if wound through the strings of their instruments). Says Boston's Leinsdorf: "Uniformly, the women's pride is so great that their attendance record is better than the men's. They have my utmost respect." But women rarely get the utmost money, and most orchestra managers freely admit that given equal talent, they will hire the breadwinning man over the woman every time.

Yet in the face of everything, the women can tune up that one eternally winning instrument: charm. When things get tight, as Orin O'Brien explains, "you just smile and give in." No man can cope with that, and what really counts in the end is that the girls can play exceedingly well. "Let the best man in," declares Leinsdorf, echoing the sentiments of most of the profession. "And if the best man is a woman, let her in too."

ALFRED STATLER

BASSIST O'BRIEN

AMERICAN SYMPHONY STRINGS & WOOD WINDS

JOYCE R. WILSON

TIMPANIST LUCCHESI

When all else fails, there's always that eternally winning instrument—charm.

INGENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
M. 489,700

NOV 1966

Young Girl With A Big-Future

Coming out first over a hundred competitors in Russia's famed Tchaikovsky International Competition, Jane Marsh seems extraordinary at everything!

When Jane Marsh was a teen-ager, she owned a horse named Sandy that she used to show in Western rodeos, giving exhibitions of riding and roping. She also was one of the best high school swimmers in the vicinity of Mill Valley, California (a suburb of San Francisco) and did a lot of competing in local meets. Tall, brown-haired and blue-eyed, Jane was pretty much of an all-around outdoors girl.

Today, at twenty-four, the same Jane Marsh is one of the most talked-about and sought-after young opera singers in the world. And three years ago she had hardly sung a note of music in her life!

How did this change-over come about? In the first place, Jane became famous overnight last June when she traveled to Moscow to enter the Tchaikovsky International Competition held for young musicians in the Soviet Union. This is the competition that pianist Van Cliburn won in 1958. Since then, no American had ever taken first prize—no American until Jane Marsh, that is.

When the panel of twenty judges, drawn from all over the world, heard her sing a grueling series of operatic arias, concert songs, and folk melodies (both American and Russian), they voted her the top singer over one hundred other contestants. Not only did she win the prize of 2500 rubles (about $2800), when she got back home she was praised and feted and continued on page 78 honored, deluged with offers to sing (including one by the Metropolitan Opera, which she has not yet accepted because she isn't sure she's ready) and signed to a recording contract by RCA-Victor. Her first record, containing some of the prize-winning selections she sang in Moscow, will be out soon.

I had dinner with Jane not long ago in a Chinese restaurant on Sixth Avenue in New York, not far from her apartment. She likes Chinese food, but on this occasion she polished off a thoroughly American steak dinner—with salad instead of potatoes. She told me that she first got the idea of becoming a professional singer while she was a psychology major at Oberlin College. Naturally endowed with a pure and lovely voice, she had never before really thought of training it. Now, however, she began a period of concentrated musical study, and by the fall of 1965 had progressed so well that Erich Leinsdorf, the renowned conductor, invited her to be soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its opening night performance of Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony. Then, after that, came Moscow and fame.

Jane is pretty sure that she's going to concentrate on opera in the years ahead, and every one who has heard her sing expects her to be one of tomorrow's stars. She's 5' 11" tall, but gracefully proportioned so that one is not conscious of undue height. And she's very pretty and has a fine stage presence.

What's more, she brings as much zest to the job of being an opera singer as she did to her horsemanship displays and swimming meets. In fact, those early competitions may have helped her through the arduous Moscow singing contest. For while some of the other entrants were understandably tense and nervous, Jane Marsh sailed through the successive eliminations serene and relaxed. "I never had so much fun in my life," she said. "I'd do it all over again—to lose."

—H. Kupferberg

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

R. I. Herald
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Weekly Circ. 12,221

DEC 16 1966

224

Cantata On Joseph Written For JWB

NEW YORK—The major musical work on a Jewish theme commissioned by the National Jewish Welfare Board as one of the principal projects in celebration of its Golden Jubilee has been delivered by the composer to Sanford Solender, executive vice-president of JWB, it was announced today. Robert Starer wrote the [illegible] "Joseph and His Brothe[illegible]" [illegible] text selected and adapted from the Bible. He is considered one of the most talented young composers in the United States.

JWB wanted a composition that could be performed by outstanding symphony orchestras, as well as by small groups in Jewish Community Centers and Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Associations. A committee under the chairmanship of Rabbi Avraham Soltes, chairman of JWB's Jewish Music Council, commissioned Mr. Starer to compose the cantata and guided him in the selection and development of the theme.

The work has been scored for full orchestra and choir, as well as for performance by soloists, mixed chorus, organ or piano.

Mr. Starer was born in Vienna in 1924 and entered the State Academy of Music at the age of 13. In 1938 he immigrated to Palestine and continued his studies at the Conservatoire in Jerusalem. During World War II he served with the Royal Air Force and later toured the Middle East and Southern Europe as pianist and accompanist.

In 1947 Mr. Starer came on a post-graduate scholarship to the Juilliard School of Music and became a member of the faculty after his graduation in 1949. He became an American citizen in 1957. He has won two Guggenheim Fellowships.

Mr. Starer's works have been performed by the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leonard Bernstein and by other major orchestras in Europe, Israel, and North and South America under Erich Leinsdorf, Thor Johnson, Thomas Scherman, Eleazar de Carvalho and many others. He has written two symphonies, two piano concertos, choral, chamber and vocal works, a one-act opera, two ballets commissioned by CBS television, an evening-length ballet and three scores commissioned by Martha Graham.

225

Philharmonic Derby: Stakes Are High

By ALAN RICH

There's nothing like a good fat mystery for keeping New York's music-lovers on their toes. The latest whodunit—or who-will-do-it, to be more precise—arose with last week's announcement that Leonard Bernstein will no longer be the New York Philharmonic's conductor after his contract expires in 1969.

The ewires are buzzing, and speculation rides the land. The Philharmonic management is keeping its mouth closed, of course, about the successor, and it has compounded the air of mystery by not letting it be known when the announcement will come. It may be next month, and it may be for years.

The stakes are high. Nobody knows exactly what Bernstein's salary has been from his Philharmonic conductorship, but it is obvious that with recordings, broadcasts, television appearances and the extended season it must come to six figures. Whoever becomes the next Philharmonic conductor will automatically become one of the most important—and most controversial—figures in music. This may not have been the casee before Leonard Bernstein, but it is true now.

In any event, the talk right now revolves around a dozen men. Some represent merely wishful thinking, and may be otherwise disqualified because of age or other commitments. Others loom large. None of these may get the job.

★ ★ ★

Here, in an alphabetical and therefore non-preferential listing, is what is generally considered the field as of now. It is subject to change without notice.

PIERRE BOULEZ (born 1925). One of the key composers in the avant-garde world, has earned sensational notices as a conductor. Predilections toward new music, naturally, but has also won high praise for 'Parsifal" at Bayreuth. Excellent speaker, and not above involvement in political and cultural controversy. His French background would be a decided novelty at the Philharmonic. An outsider, but an important one.

COLIN DAVIS (1927). Beyond doubt England's finest young conductor, a brilliant success in his few appearances here. All three London orchestras are currently having their finest hours under his leadership, and his wide-ranging sympathies are expressed with a remarkable sense of orchestral color. As far as one can tell, however, he's all business. The personality cult would diminish. Another outsider, but one to watch.

LUKAS FOSS (1922). The betting would have been stronger a season or so back, because his work here has been disappointing of late. His mistakes are interesting, however, because he is willing to take risks. A composer, an outspoken fighter for the far-out, a witty and charming personality, he would probably try to keep the Bernstein mantle with all its stripes intact. Like Bernstein, he is a Serge Koussevitzky protege, for whatever that means. Definitely on the inside, but fading slightly.

HERBERT VON KARAJAN (1908). He has everything else, so why not the Philharmonic? That may count against him, as may his political affiliations in wartime Germany. Nevertheless, he is perhaps the most important conductor in the world today, and that cannot be discounted. Austere, aloof and personally unlovable, he would certainly change the atmosphere at Philharmonic Hall.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN'S SUCCESSOR BECOMES ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT FIGURES IN MUSIC

World Journal Tribune
NEW YORK, NEW YORK
D. 900,000
NOV 11 1966

Popular, able, but hardly a favorite.

ERICH LEINSDORF (1914). Probably can't be pried from Boston, which is the one post in the country equal to the Philharmonic in prestige and income. Solid but also occasionally stolid, he has at least restored the Boston Symphony to its pristine quality. He would bring an interesting and varied repertory, but few sparks. Honorable choice, but uninspired.

LORIN MAAZEL (1931). A busy man abroad, and probably available only on a sharing-the-podium basis, but worth having on any reasonable terms. A wunderkind now fully matured, and one of the most vibrant, genuinely musical talents this country has produced, with a range of sympathy that seems to widen as we watch. Another all-business type, as far as anyone knows, but the business is worthwhile. Definitely an insider.

ZUBIN MEHTA (1936). Youngest in the field, also the most glamorous and exotic. (Pray that the choice isn't made on that basis alone.) He has the real goods, needs maturing (three years between now and 1969 may be enough), cocky and a musician of tremendous natural instincts. In Los Angeles he is practically a cult, but that is fertile territory for cults. It could work here too, however. Strong money on him right now.

GEORGES PRETRE (1924). Extremely popular at the Met, not much less so in his few concert appearances here. Like Boulez, his French background makes him an intriguing speculation, and his sympathies are extremely wide. His work is strong in personality, sometimes arbitrary, always interesting and he has a phenomenal stick technique. A genuine middle-distance possibility.

THOMAS SCHIPPERS (1930). He's still a glamour boy, but the years pass without affording the deepening in insights we had once hoped possible. His best work is in the opera house, where his clean-cut and intelligent work is always refreshing. He would come to symphonic work with a smallish repertory, interesting ideas, but an approach that—from previous observations — would be decidedly limited. Purely a glamour issue, staying power in doubt.

GEORG SOLTI (1912). One of the world's major conductors beyond doubt, a brilliant exponent of a wide range of music (not including much beyond Bartok and early Stravinsky, however). A man difficult to love, but impossible not to respect. His present success as music director at Covent Garden makes him unlikely for any but part-time work. An able contender, but probably not to be had.

WILLIAM STEINBERG (1899). Shares the big-money betting these days with Maazel and Mehta. His close identification with the Philharmonic over the past few years ("Principal Guest Conductor") leads one to suspect he has the inside track, at least on a part-time basis. Certainly a solid and rewarding conductor of the clasics, but not of much else; he would be the ideal balance on a double-bill with either of the other top contenders. His age is a minus factor, but he conducts like a man far younger. Not a shoo-in, but far from a shoo-out.

GEORGE SZELL (1897). Many consider him the finest conductor alive, and it isn't worth arguing. But his age makes it unlikely that he would consider a move from Cleveland, where he has built an orchestra second to none in this country, possibly in the world. If only we could roll back the clock!

There is the field, and it is full of fast runners. Every one of the men mentioned here, however, is presently employed gainfully. The betting is strong, therefore, that the Philharmonic will revert to the pre-Bernstein practice of having two men share the season as co-conductors. This would be a particularly desirable situation right now, since the balance between a solid classicist like Steinberg and a dashing young spirit like Mehta, Maazel or Foss would make for excellent programming.

The field of dark horses is lively, and there are some excellent choices. If you want more names, you might begin with the likes of Eleazar de Carvalho, Werner Torkanowsky and Stanislaw Skrowacewski, all of them presently doing excellent work with orchestras in the American Midwest, or the brilliant young Bernhard Haitink in Amsterdam.

Or it might be that the next conductor of the New York Philharmonic has yet to make his debut. It could happen; anything could happen. That's what mysteries are all about.

Davis Maazel Leinsdorf Mehta Schippers Von Karajan Foss

Steinberg Boulez Pretre Solti

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday November 13 1966

Is Bernstein Retiring At the Wrong Time?

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG, New York Times News Service

NEW YORK—Leonard Bernstein will leave the New York Philharmonic after the 1968-69 season.

At a press conference a week ago Bernstein sat next to Amyas Ames, president of the Philharmonic Society, and both said the proper things about each other.

A press release accompanied the ceremony in which Bernstein was named laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, for life.

Bernstein indicated that he would concentrate maximally on a type of theater compositon that would perhaps bring together opera and Broadway.

* * *

MORE POWER TO HIM! IF anybody can do it, he is the man. His serious music is not generally accepted in the international sphere, and is kept alive mostly through his own efforts (God helps those who help themselves).

But to Broadway he has brought a sophistication, melodic invention and workmanship paralleled only by Cole Porter in our time.

Has there been anywhere on Broadway since World War II a better tune than "Ohio" from "Wonderful Town," or a more imaginative specialty number than "Pass that Football" from the same score?

For better or worse — some think better, a few think worse—Bernstein has put his mark on the Philharmonic and on the American musical scene. He has brought glamor to the orchestral scene, and that is not so despicable a thing as some appear to imagine. Not since the young Stokowski had there appeared a conductor with such personality.

Bernstein had everything working for him—good looks, temperament, talent, brilliance, the mysterious aura that goes out in quantum jumps from subject to object.

He also had character flaws. Conducting is a fulltime job, the job for a monomaniac. Bernstein may be an ego-maniac, and that word is not necessarily used in a prjorative sense. Any forceful interpreter has to be an ego-maniac with a fervent belief that his ideas, his approach, his execution are the one and only truth. But Bernstein has been anything but a monomaniac.

* * *

AT THE BEGINNING OF his philharmonic tenure Bernstein had everybody on his side.

But some of Bernstein's antics grieved his admirers. They were willing to go along with his glamor-boy shenanigans; they were even willing to put up with his choreographic antics. But they were not willing to put up with his musical distortions, and there were quite a few of those.

His music-making could be brilliant, especially in the contemporary repertory. It also could be mannered and even vulgar.

* * *

HIS REPLACEMENT? PER-haps the Philharmonic already knows, although the official statement sayd that a great search will be made. What kind of a search? The number of candidates can almost automatically be eliminated to less than a dozen. Presumably the Philharmonic would like to have a dynamic young conductor with something of the Bernstein kind of glamor. Who wouldn't?

Again guessing: If a young conductor is selected, an older man will have to be nearby as anchor, just as William Steinberg has been taking most of the load when Bernstein is away.

Who are the most promising young conductors today? Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel Istvan Kertesz, Colin Davis, Seiji Ozawa. But Ozawa is still too inexperienced.

Middle generation? Herbert von Karajan (unlikely, because of his political past), Georg Solti (dare we remove this great Wagnerian from the opera houses of the world?), William Steinberg, Erich Leinsdorf (but would not leave Boston [illegible]).

226

JAN. 1967

THE LIVELY ARTS

Philharmonic Guessing Game—Who Will Succeed Bernstein?

Maazel

Ozawa

Mehta

Schippers

IF it had been Eugene Ormandy (who is 66) announcing his retirement from the Philadelphia Orchestra, or George Szell (who is 70) leaving the Cleveland Orchestra, the news might not have been so surprising. But Leonard Bernstein, at 47 still something of a "youngster" among today's foremost conductors, announcing his retirement as music director of the New York Philharmonic at the end of the 1968-69 season—could that really be?

It could. And the repercussions the news made are still reverberating.

For Bernstein himself, there will be new opportunities to broaden his activities as both a conductor and composer. The Philharmonic's directorship is one of the most exhausting and time-consuming of any in today's musical world. Not only does the Philharmonic give more concerts per week for a longer part of the calendar year than most orchestras in either the U. S. or Europe, but its recording schedule is fuller than most—not to mention its popular TV series for young people.

It's also no secret in music circles that Bernstein has felt somewhat frustrated as a composer because of his conducting schedule. Since West Side Story in 1956, Bernstein has composed only two major works—the Kaddish symphony and Chichester Psalms—and completely shelved a projected musical version of Thornton Wilder's Skin of Our Teeth.

Even as a conductor, Bernstein has been more restricted than many of his admirers realized. Since taking the Philharmonic post in 1958, Bernstein has guest-conducted only occasionally in Europe. Recently he scored phenomenal successes in Vienna, London, Paris, and Milan—especially conducting opera. He wants to do more of this.

Bernstein's "retirement" in 1969 will by no means end his association with the Philharmonic. Bernstein will have a special title as "conductor emeritus" and will continue to guest-conduct the Philharmonic both in concerts, recordings, and TV appearances.

Even so, Bernstein's change-in-status will have a tremendous impact on New York's cultural life—and because of the Philharmonic's popular weekly broadcasts, on the rest of the country as well. For Bernstein has not only sold out Philharmonic Hall week after week, but also has generated unusual excitement in classical music in general. He has done much to dispel some of the snobbish, pretentious "artiness" that used to scare people away from concert halls. He has also helped link classical music with jazz and musical comedy in a uniquely 20th-century way.

Bernstein will thus be a hard act for anyone to follow. But there is no shortage of candidates for his job. After all, there are few musical posts anywhere today more influential, more prestigious, or more crowning to a career.

Who will get the job? The Philharmonic says it has at least another season to consider the matter carefully. Meanwhile, a major guessing game has sprung up. There are "favorites," "dark horses," and "it-should-be's." Among those most frequently discussed:

LORIN MAAZEL, 35. Advantages: Young, attractive, internationally known (all good box office qualities). A former child protegé, he has an extensive, versatile repertory (present post: director of Berlin Symphony). Born in Paris of U. S. parents and raised in Pittsburgh, Maazel would continue the Philharmonic in American hands (Bernstein was first U. S.-born conductor of any major U. S. orchestra). Disadvantages: Some find his podium manner cold and arrogant. Critics often praise technical quality of his work, but quibble about substance of his interpretations.

THOMAS SCHIPPERS, 36. Advantages: Young, handsome, U. S. born. An exuberant, expressive, versatile conductor. He could combine orchestral and operatic work within Lincoln Center. Disadvantages: More experienced in opera than concert work. Has never previously been full-time director of an orchestra. Some critics say he has failed to develop as much as he should have in past five years considering opportunities given him. There are also reports he would rather become chief conductor, even manager, of Metropolitan Opera.

ZUBIN MEHTA, 30. Advantages: Young, attractive, dynamic. Continually wins exceptional critical acclaim. His Bombay birth and Viennese training add an exotic appeal. Disadvantages: Has never conducted N. Y. Philharmonic in a regular concert. As present head of Los Angeles Philharmonic, has been criticized as an "absentee conductor" with too many international commitments. Some say he is a more likely successor to Ormandy in Philadelphia.

SEIJI OZAWA, 30. Advantages: Young, exciting, one of the most colorful conductors to come along since Bernstein. In some ways a Bernstein protegé, having served three years as Philharmonic's associate conductor (presently director of Toronto Symphony and Chicago Symphony's Ravinia festival). Japanese origins provide exotic "plus." Disadvantages: Although audiences which hear him are invariably enthusiastic, he is not yet widely known. Japanese birth (in a field long dominated by Westerners) may be too unusual (or too premature) for many regular patrons. His best prospects might be as a co-conductor with a "native son" like Maazel or Schippers, or with an older, more established name like Steinberg (Bernstein was originally a Philharmonic co-conductor with Mitropoulos).

WILLIAM STEINBERG, 67. Advantages: One of the most respected of present-day musicians, with vast experience in Europe and U. S. Has been Philharmonic's principal guest-conductor for several seasons (he is regular conductor of Pittsburgh Symphony). Disadvantages: His advanced age. Limited audience appeal (despite vast respect, he has never been "popular" in sense of other great conductors). His selection might appear to set back youthful, forward-looking image Bernstein established for the Philharmonic.

ERICH LEINSDORF, 53. Advantages: Well known, broadly experienced (presently director of Boston Symphony), respected as a top orchestral disciplinarian. Could combine symphonic and operatic work within Lincoln Center (he formerly headed New York City Opera and is a Met veteran). Disadvantages: Some consider him stolid as well as solid. After an initial splash in Boston in 1962, his popularity there has waned—a poor omen for trying to follow the popular Bernstein in New York. Also, to those who consider the Boston Symphony a shade above the Philharmonic, a Leinsdorf move to New York might seem anticlimactic.

PIERRE BOULEZ, 41. Advantages: One of the most influential composers in today's avant-garde. Has recently earned sensational acclaim as a conductor in his native France. Would be likely to spark lively creative upsurge in any major post. Disadvantages: Not well known among general public. His own music antagonizes as many as it pleases. His outspoken political views might cause controversy. Extent of Philharmonic's schedule might be as restrictive to his composing as it has been to Bernstein's.

Those are the chief players, and the beginning of the scoreboard. The guessing game may go on for quite a while.

—ROY HEMMING

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,531,000
DEC 26 1966
NATIONAL AFFAIRS

UPI

A tree glitters in Washington, and so do guests at the ornate holiday season dinner-dance for the National Council on the Arts. Photos by Newsweek's Phil MacMullan.

The great Christmas tree between the White house and the Washington Monument glowed red and yellow at the touch of his hand. The clean cold smell of a snowy evening was in his nostrils. It was the buoyant season, a time for laughter and parties and optimism. But for Lyndon Baines Johnson, approaching his fourth Christmas as President, it was the downbeat December of his White House years.

Yet last week even this low point had a few high moments, most notably the glittering dinner-dance for the National Council on the Arts, attended by friends from among the very sort of people who have lately felt most alienated from the Administration. (Novelist Ralph Ellison was there; so were ballerina Maria Tallchief, and conductors Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf.) He held another party, the traditional one, for the White House staff and dropped in on a reception for 125 men wounded in Vietnam. "I wish I could tell you that what you have fought for—peace in the world—is just around the corner," he advised the men, many of them on litters and crutches, "but there will be some long and difficult days ahead."

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, L. A., CAL.
D. 9,200
JAN 3 1967

60Grant Enables AFM Widen Strings Program

American Federation of Musicians has obtained a dual grant of $60,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation to establish east and west coast wings of Federation's Congress of Strings program, reports AFM prexy Herman Kenin.

Under terms of grant, the coin will be split evenly between the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in Saratoga, N.Y., and USC to help defray expenses involved in establishing the two branches. Since its inception in 1959, Congress of Strings provided 100 young string instrumentalists, aged 16-23, to study and perform under batons of such longhair conductors as Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Josef Krips, Eric Leinsdorf, etc. Revamped program will enable a greater number of students to participate. According to Kenin, the 1967 Congress will enroll 120.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
NOV 1966

Masuko Ushioda, second-prize winner at the Tchaikovsky Competition, is flanked by Arthur Kerr of the National Music League and maestro Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood this summer, where she played the Prokofiev G minor Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
DEC. 16 1966

Leinsdorfs at White House

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA was honored in the nation's capitol this week by the invitation to its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, and Mrs. Leinsdorf to attend the National Council on the Arts dinner at the White House, Tuesday evening, The Boston conductor was seated on Mrs. Johnson's right.

Next day, the tireless Mr. Leinsdorf was back in Symphony Hall directing recording sessions of the orchestra, followed by rehearsals for the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, featuring the virtuoso Israeli violinist, Itzhak Perlman.

226

JAN. 1967

THE LIVELY ARTS

Philharmonic Guessing Game—Who Will Succeed Bernstein?

Maazel

Ozawa

Mehta

Schippers

IF it had been Eugene Ormandy (who is 66) announcing his retirement from the Philadelphia Orchestra, or George Szell (who is 70) leaving the Cleveland Orchestra, the news might not have been so surprising. But Leonard Bernstein, at 47 still something of a "youngster" among today's foremost conductors, announcing his retirement as music director of the New York Philharmonic at the end of the 1968-69 season—could that really be?

It could. And the repercussions the news made are still reverberating.

For Bernstein himself, there will be new opportunities to broaden his activities as both a conductor and composer. The Philharmonic's directorship is one of the most exhausting and time-consuming of any in today's musical world. Not only does the Philharmonic give more concerts per week for a longer part of the calendar year than most orchestras in either the U. S. or Europe, but its recording schedule is fuller than most—not to mention its popular TV series for young people.

It's also no secret in music circles that Bernstein has felt somewhat frustrated as a composer because of his conducting schedule. Since West Side Story in 1956, Bernstein has composed only two major works—the Kaddish symphony and Chichester Psalms—and completely shelved a projected musical version of Thornton Wilder's Skin of Our Teeth.

Even as a conductor, Bernstein has been more restricted than many of his admirers realized. Since taking the Philharmonic post in 1958, Bernstein has guest-conducted only occasionally in Europe. Recently he scored phenomenal successes in Vienna, London, Paris, and Milan—especially conducting opera. He wants to do more of this.

Bernstein's "retirement" in 1969 will by no means end his association with the Philharmonic. Bernstein will have a special title as "conductor emeritus" and will continue to guest-conduct the Philharmonic both in concerts, recordings, and TV appearances.

Even so, Bernstein's change-in-status will have a tremendous impact on New York's cultural life—and because of the Philharmonic's popular weekly broadcasts, on the rest of the country as well. For Bernstein has not only sold out Philharmonic Hall week after week, but also has generated unusual excitement in classical music in general. He has done much to dispel some of the snobbish, pretentious "artiness" that used to scare people away from concert halls. He has also helped link classical music with jazz and musical comedy in a uniquely 20th-century way.

Bernstein will thus be a hard act for anyone to follow. But there is no shortage of candidates for his job. After all, there are few musical posts anywhere today more influential, more prestigious, or more crowning to a career.

Who will get the job? The Philharmonic says it has at least another season to consider the matter carefully. Meanwhile, a major guessing game has sprung up. There are "favorites," "dark horses," and "it-should-be's." Among those most frequently discussed:

LORIN MAAZEL, 35. Advantages: Young, attractive, internationally known (all good box office qualities). A former child protegé, he has an extensive, versatile repertory (present post: director of Berlin Symphony). Born in Paris of U. S. parents and raised in Pittsburgh, Maazel would continue the Philharmonic in American hands (Bernstein was first U. S.-born conductor of any major U. S. orchestra). Disadvantages: Some find his podium manner cold and arrogant. Critics often praise technical quality of his work, but quibble about substance of his interpretations.

THOMAS SCHIPPERS, 36. Advantages: Young, handsome, U. S. born. An exuberant, expressive, versatile conductor. He could combine orchestral and operatic work within Lincoln Center. Disadvantages: More experienced in opera than concert work. Has never previously been full-time director of an orchestra. Some critics say he has failed to develop as much as he should have in past five years considering opportunities given him. There are also reports he would rather become chief conductor, even manager, of Metropolitan Opera.

ZUBIN MEHTA, 30. Advantages: Young, attractive, dynamic. Continually wins exceptional critical acclaim. His Bombay birth and Viennese training add an exotic appeal. Disadvantages: Has never conducted N. Y. Philharmonic in a regular concert. As present head of Los Angeles Philharmonic, has been criticized as an "absentee conductor" with too many international commitments. Some say he is a more likely successor to Ormandy in Philadelphia.

SEIJI OZAWA, 30. Advantages: Young, exciting, one of the most colorful conductors to come along since Bernstein. In some ways a Bernstein protegé, having served three years as Philharmonic's associate conductor (presently director of Toronto Symphony and Chicago Symphony's Ravinia festival). Japanese origins provide exotic "plus." Disadvantages: Although audiences which hear him are invariably enthusiastic, he is not yet widely known. Japanese birth (in a field long dominated by Westerners) may be too unusual (or too premature) for many regular patrons. His best prospects might be as a co-conductor with a "native son" like Maazel or Schippers, or with an older, more established name like Steinberg (Bernstein was originally a Philharmonic co-conductor with Mitropoulos).

WILLIAM STEINBERG, 67. Advantages: One of the most respected of present-day musicians, with vast experience in Europe and U. S. Has been Philharmonic's principal guest-conductor for several seasons (he is regular conductor of Pittsburgh Symphony). Disadvantages: His advanced age. Limited audience appeal (despite vast respect, he has never been "popular" in sense of other great conductors). His selection might appear to set back youthful, forward-looking image Bernstein established for the Philharmonic.

ERICH LEINSDORF, 53. Advantages: Well known, broadly experienced (presently director of Boston Symphony), respected as a top orchestral disciplinarian. Could combine symphonic and operatic work within Lincoln Center (he formerly headed New York City Opera and is a Met veteran). Disadvantages: Some consider him stolid as well as solid. After an initial splash in Boston in 1962, his popularity there has waned—a poor omen for trying to follow the popular Bernstein in New York. Also, to those who consider the Boston Symphony a shade above the Philharmonic, a Leinsdorf move to New York might seem anticlimactic.

PIERRE BOULEZ, 41. Advantages: One of the most influential composers in today's avant-garde. Has recently earned sensational acclaim as a conductor in his native France. Would be likely to spark lively creative upsurge in any major post. Disadvantages: Not well known among general public. His own music antagonizes as many as it pleases. His outspoken political views might cause controversy. Extent of Philharmonic's schedule might be as restrictive to his composing as it has been to Bernstein's.

Those are the chief players, and the beginning of the scoreboard. The guessing game may go on for quite a while.

—ROY HEMMING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508

DEC 12 1966

Leinsdorfs at White House

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA was honored in the nation's capitol this week by the invitation to its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, and Mrs. Leinsdorf to attend the National Council on the Arts dinner at the White House, Tuesday evening, The Boston conductor was seated on Mrs. Johnson's right.

Next day, the tireless Mr. Leinsdorf was back in Symphony Hall directing recording sessions of the orchestra, followed by rehearsals for the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, featuring the virtuoso Israeli violinist, Itzhak Perlman.

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,537,000

DEC 26 1966

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

UPI

A tree glitters in Washington, and so do guests at the ornate holiday season dinner-dance for the National Council on the Arts. Photos by Newsweek's Phil MacMullan.

The great Christmas tree between the White house and the Washington Monument glowed red and yellow at the touch of his hand. The clean cold smell of a snowy evening was in his nostrils. It was the buoyant season, a time for laughter and parties and optimism. But for Lyndon Baines Johnson, approaching his fourth Christmas as President, it was the downbeat December of his White House years.

Yet last week even this low point had a few high moments, most notably the glittering dinner-dance for the National Council on the Arts, attended by friends from among the very sort of people who have lately felt most alienated from the Administration. (Novelist Ralph Ellison was there; so were ballerina Maria Tallchief, and conductors Leonard Bernstein and Erich Leinsdorf.) He held another party, the traditional one, for the White House staff and dropped in on a reception for 125 men wounded in Vietnam. "I wish I could tell you that what you have fought for—peace in the world—is just around the corner," he advised the men, many of them on litters and crutches, "but there will be some long and difficult days ahead."

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, L. A., CAL.
D. 9,200

JAN 3 1967

60Grant Enables AFM Widen Strings Program

American Federation of Musicians has obtained a dual grant of $60,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation to establish east and west coast wings of Federation's Congress of Strings program, reports AFM prexy Herman Kenin.

Under terms of grant, the coin will be split evenly between the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in Saratoga, N.Y., and USC to help defray expenses involved in establishing the two branches. Since its inception in 1959, Congress of Strings provided 100 young string instrumentalists, aged 16-23, to study and perform under batons of such longhair conductors as Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Josef Krips, Eric Leinsdorf, etc. Revamped program will enable a greater number of students to participate. According to Kenin, the 1967 Congress will enroll 120.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

NOV 1966

Masuko Ushioda, second-prize winner at the Tchaikovsky Competition, is flanked by Arthur Kerr of the National Music League and maestro Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood this summer, where she played the Prokofiev G minor Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

227

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733

DEC 2 0 1966

Boston May Get Second Symphony Orchestra

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Boston may get a second symphony orchestra. It won't happen before the Fall of 1968. If and when it does, it will be part of a new training program for young professional musicians that is now being planned by an ad hoc committee of musical leaders here.

Members of the committee are Arthur Berger, professor of music, Brandeis University; Hartford N. Gunn Jr., general manager, WGBH; Harry J. Kraut, assistant to the manager, Boston Symphony Orchestra; A. Tillman Merritt, professor of music, Harvard University; Edwin Stein, dean, School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University; and Chester W. Williams, president, New England Conservatory.

The plan would offer instrumentalists who have finished college or conservatory, a three-year schedule of activities designed to develop skilled muscians of the highest professional order, each receiving an annual stipend for financial security.

The program would consist of three major areas:

—Advanced study in one or more of the participating schools;

—Supervised internship teaching in colleges and schools in the metropolitan area;

—Performance in an orchestra and various chamber ensembles in the Boston area and elsewhere in New England.

The idea originated in the mind of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony.

It occurred to Leinsdorf soon after his move to Boston in 1962 that, given the possibilities implied by the existence here of the Boston Symphony and of the universities and specialized schools in the area, Boston should become a center for first-rate musical education, much as it was already such a center in medical training.

With the establishment in 1940 by the late Serge Koussevitzky of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony became the first instiution of its kind in this country to realize that a major symphony orchestra needed to assume cultural responsibilities beyond playing concerts.

The Boston Symphony has continued to remain a leader and pace-setter in this field, and the as yet unnamed Boston program could well turn out to be the most significant move in American musical education since the establishment of Tanglewood.

Harry J. Kraut, representing the committee, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., Boston Symphony manager, were anxious to emphasize that the projected program and the activities encompassed by it are being considered only as a supplement to present teaching and performance in Boston.

To be constructive, the committee feels, the program must create its own activities and neither supplant nor absorb those now existing.

It is assumed, for example, that members of the new orchestra will not compete directly with free-lance musicians in this area or with Boston Symphony players in getting engagements to play for operatic, ballet, or choral performances here.

Many things must be done before the orchestra can play its first concert. Suitable arrangements must be made with the American Federation of Musicians, for, whether the orchestra plays to paying audiences or gives special programs of contemporary music free of charge at universities (one idea being considered), it cannot function except with union blessing.

Not least, money must be raised. At a very rough estimate, about one million dollars would be needed for the first three years' operation.

Persons already apprehensive about the various fund drives, present and future, being conducted here by cultural institutions will be relieved to know that there is no thought of raising the money locally. Application will be made to foundations, in particular to those interested in educational projects.

The program will be placed in the hands of a separate organization, to be formed for the purpose. It would operate independently, but would have available to it the advice of existing institutions in the Boston area.

MUSIC CLUBS MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
5 TI. A YR. 5,500

FEB 1967

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, Boston Symphony Orchestra

Below, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf greet Sen. Edward Kennedy after he narrated Tanglewood premiere of Copeland's Lincoln Portrait.

The Boston Sunday Globe — January 1, 1967

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850

FEB 8 1967

New England Newsclip

STORY-TELLER—Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delighted members of the Harvard Business School Assn. with stories about the Symphony at a dinner at the Harvard Club. Mr. Leinsdorf, left, chats with F. Gorham Brigham Jr., vice president of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Co., president of the association, and Charles H. Hood, assistant treasurer of H. P. Hood & Sons.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

FEB 7 1967

New England Newsclip

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is home from a four-week vacation abroad during which time he was guest conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam. He'll return to the podium at Symphony Hall on Friday.

Last night he was principal speaker at the mid-winter dinner meeting of the Harvard Business School Assn. of Boston. His topic was "What Does a Conductor Do?"

Photo above—President Harry Cabot of Symphony and Mrs. Ralph B. Williams, 25-year donor, at Gardner Museum.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789

JAN 13 1967

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

FEB 2 1967

New England Newsclip

FURNITURE DESIGN AND MANUFACTURING
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY 9,700

JAN 1967

FDM Unitized Management

In a recent "Bell Telephone Hour" on TV, dealing with the Boston Symphony, its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, referred to his job as being "first among equals." This is a healthy concept. While he handles his group with a firm hand, he respects and uses the contributions of ideas which his people can and do offer for the common good of the orchestra. Its superior results testify to the soundness of Leinsdorf's approach.

No real accuracy of process planning, costs, or scheduling can be hoped for unless the practical knowledge of the people at the operating levels is fed into operational programs in the planning stage.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100

FEB 5 1967

New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf to Speak At Harvard Monday

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the principal speaker at the mid-winter dinner meeting of the Harvard Business School Association of Boston on Monday.

"What Does A Conductor Do?" will be his topic.

The meeting will be held at the Harvard Club.

FALSTAFF NO!

Joe Namath Tied to Ted

By HAROLD BANKS

A MEMBER of the real Jet-set—quarterback Joe Namath of the American Football League's New York entry—couldn't get into the Sheraton-Boston's Falstaff Room, not because he was wearing those white sneakers, as usual, but because he was too informal at the other end—no necktie . . . (like Ted Williams) . . . Does Erich Leinsdorf go to the Metropolitan Opera eventually and is that why the Boston Symphony seems to be trying out such guest conductors as Colin Davis of England's BBC and Rafael Kubelik of the Bavarian Radio Orchestra? . . .

Leinsdorf in Amsterdam

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, away from Boston on a four-week holiday, will begin a short engagement tomorrow as guest conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra. He will lead the orchestra in four concerts: one in Scheveningen Saturday evening and three in Amsterdam Sunday afternoon and Wednesday and Thursday evenings. His program with the Concertgebouw will include Roussel's Symphony No. 4, "Permutazioni" by Landre and the Schubert Symphony No. 9, in C major.

This will be the first time since Dr. Leinsworf came to his Boston post in 1962 that he has conducted any other orchestra during the regular Winter season. He last conducted the Concertgebouw in June, 1965, at the Holland Festival.

Among the other orchestras he has conducted during his vacations between the Boston and Tanglewood seasons are the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra at the Prague Spring Festival last May, the Metropolitan Opera in its Paris presentation of "The Marriage of Figaro" last June and several opera recording engagements for RCA Victor in Rome.

227

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733

DEC 20 1966

Boston May Get Second Symphony Orchestra

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Boston may get a second symphony orchestra. It won't happen before the Fall of 1968. If and when it does, it will be part of a new training program for young professional musicians that is now being planned by an ad hoc committee of musical leaders here.

Members of the committee are Arthur Berger, professor of music, Brandeis University; Hartford N. Gunn Jr., general manager, WGBH; Harry J. Kraut, assistant to the manager, Boston Symphony Orchestra; A. Tillman Merritt, professor of music, Harvard University; Edwin Stein, dean, School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University; and Chester W. Williams, president, New England Conservatory.

The plan would offer instrumentalists who have finished college or conservatory, a three-year schedule of activities designed to develop skilled muscians of the highest professional order, each receiving an annual stipend for financial security.

The program would consist of three major areas:

——Advanced study in one or more of the participating schools;

—Supervised internship teaching in colleges and schools in the metropolitan area;

—Performance in an orchestra and various chamber ensembles in the Boston area and elsewhere in New England.

The idea originated in the mind of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony.

It occurred to Leinsdorf soon after his move to Boston in 1962 that, given the possibilities implied by the existence here of the Boston Symphony and of the universities and specialized schools in the area, Boston should become a center for first-rate musical education, much as it was already such a center in medical training.

With the establishment in 1940 by the late Serge Koussevitzky of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony became the first instiution of its kind in this country to realize that a major symphony orchestra needed to assume cultural responsibilities beyond playing concerts.

The Boston Symphony has continued to remain a leader and pace-setter in this field, and the as yet unnamed Boston program could well turn out to be the most significant move in American musical education since the establishment of Tanglewood.

Harry J. Kraut, representing the committee, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., Boston Symphony manager, were anxious to emphasize that the projected program and the activities encompassed by it are being considered only as a supplement to present teaching and performance in Boston.

To be constructive, the committee feels, the program must create its own activities and neither supplant nor absorb those now existing.

It is assumed, for example, that members of the new orchestra will not compete directly with free-lance musicians in this area or with Boston Symphony players in getting engagements to play for operatic, ballet, or choral performances here.

Many things must be done before the orchestra can play its first concert. Suitable arrangements must be made with the American Federation of Musicians, for, whether the orchestra plays to paying audiences or gives special programs of contemporary music free of charge at universities (one idea being considered), it cannot function except with union blessing.

Not least, money must be raised. At a very rough estimate, about one million dollars would be needed for the first three years' operation.

Persons already apprehensive about the various fund drives, present and future, being conducted here by cultural institutions will be relieved to know that there is no thought of raising the money locally. Application will be made to foundations, in particular to those interested in educational projects.

The program will be placed in the hands of a separate organization, to be formed for the purpose. It would operate independently, but would have available to it the advice of existing institutions in the Boston area.

MUSIC CLUBS MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
5 TI. A YR. 5,500

FEB 1967

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, Boston Symphony Orchestra

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850

FEB 8 1967 New England Newsclip

STORY-TELLER—Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delighted members of the Harvard Business School Assn. with stories about the Symphony at a dinner at the Harvard Club. Mr. Leinsdorf, left, chats with F. Gorham Brigham Jr., vice president of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Co., president of the association, and Charles H. Hood, assistant treasurer of H. P. Hood & Sons.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

FEB 7 1967 New England Newsclip

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is home from a four-week vacation abroad during which time he was guest conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam. He'll return to the podium at Symphony Hall on Friday.

Last night he was principal speaker at the mid-winter dinner meeting of the Harvard Business School Assn. of Boston. His topic was "What Does a Conductor Do?"

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800

FEB 2 1967 New England Newsclip

Below, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf greet Sen. Edward Kennedy after he narrated Tanglewood premiere of Copeland's Lincoln Portrait.

The Boston Sunday Globe — January 1, 1967

Photo above—President Henry Cabot of Symphony and Mrs. Ralph B. Williams, 25-year donor, at Gardner Museum

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 411,789

JAN 13 1967

FURNITURE DESIGN AND MANUFACTURING
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY 9,700

JAN 1967

FDM Unitized Management

In a recent "Bell Telephone Hour" on TV, dealing with the Boston Symphony, its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, referred to his job as being "first among equals." This is a healthy concept. While he handles his group with a firm hand, he respects and uses the contributions of ideas which his people can and do offer for the common good of the orchestra. Its superior results testify to the soundness of Leinsdorf's approach.

No real accuracy of process planning, costs, or scheduling can be hoped for unless the practical knowledge of the people at the operating levels is fed into operational programs in the planning stage.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100

FEB 5 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf to Speak At Harvard Monday

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the principal speaker at the mid-winter dinner meeting of the Harvard Business School Association of Boston on Monday.

"What Does A Conductor Do?" will be his topic.

The meeting will be held at the Harvard Club.

FALSTAFF NO!

Joe Namath Tied to Ted

By HAROLD BANKS

A MEMBER of the real Jet-set—quarterback Joe Namath of the American Football League's New York entry—couldn't get into the Sheraton-Boston's Falstaff Room, not because he was wearing those white sneakers, as usual, but because he was too informal at the other end—no necktie . . . (like Ted Williams) . . . Does Erich Leinsdorf go to the Metropolitan Opera eventually and is that why the Boston Symphony seems to be trying out such guest conductors as Colin Davis of England's BBC and Rafael Kubelik of the Bavarian Radio Orchestra? . . .

Leinsdorf in Amsterdam

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, away from Boston on a four-week holiday, will begin a short engagement tomorrow as guest conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra. He will lead the orchestra in four concerts: one in Scheveningen Saturday evening and three in Amsterdam Sunday afternoon and Wednesday and Thursday evenings. His program with the Concertgebouw will include Roussel's Symphony No. 4, "Permutazioni" by Landre and the Schubert Symphony No. 9, in C major.

This will be the first time since Dr. Leinsworf came to his Boston post in 1962 that he has conducted any other orchestra during the regular Winter season. He last conducted the Concertgebouw in June, 1965, at the Holland Festival.

Among the other orchestras he has conducted during his vacations between the Boston and Tanglewood seasons are the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra at the Prague Spring Festival last May, the Metropolitan Opera in its Paris presentation of "The Marriage of Figaro" last June and several opera recording engagements for RCA Victor in Rome.

228

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 1966

winterfest

The Protracted Conflicts of Erich Leinsdorf

by F. PETER MODEL

LAST FALL, in a helicopter over New York harbor, the 36th President of the United States and the 11th Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra looked down at the Statue of Liberty and began to wax nostalgic over their first meeting twenty-seven years earlier.

It was on May 1, 1938, that a mutual friend summoned 29-year-old freshman Rep. Lyndon B. Johnson to the lobby of Washington's Mayflower Hotel so that he might take an interest in the case of a shy and panic-struck 26-year-old Viennese conductor, only seven days removed from deportation to Nazi-occupied Austria (and almost certain extermination). Erich Leinsdorf had come to the U.S. the year before on a visitor's visa to guest-conduct at the Metropolitan Opera; he could not stay, as the Austrian "quota" was oversubscribed.

Known even then as an "operator," Johnson borrowed a nickel, strode to a pay phone, and deftly put into motion the legislative machinery that would, in the span of 47 days, whisk Leinsdorf to Havana and (under unofficial State Department sanction) back again, this time as a landed Cuban immigrant.

To Leinsdorf, Johnson was the man who saved his life. To Johnson, Leinsdorf was the man who got him so riled up about the "national origins" or quota clause in U.S. immigration statutes that it seemed the most natural thing in the world to have Leinsdorf witness the signing of the liberalized 1965 Immigration Bill on Liberty Island.

The deep and personal friendship between the two men—both of whom reached their respective pinnacles at more or less the same time—has long vexed many intellectuals. But not Harvard economist and former U.S. Ambassador to India John Kenneth Galbraith, who is close to both.

"Erich, like Lyndon," he suggests, "is an extrovert who feels obliged to be involved in just about everything that goes

LEINSDORF continued

The Core Of The Conflict

"MUSICIANS," observed the patrician stockbroker Henry Lee Higginson shortly after founding the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in 1881, "are not like other men, and must be treated differently."

But Higginson spoke at, and for, a time in which the three existing symphony orchestras—Boston, New York and St. Louis—literally belonged to the very rich and the socially-ambitious. Deficits were covered privately, and discreetly; one simply did not discuss "unions," or use that other dirty word, "the masses." To Brahmins who mattered, the players were "our players," and their world was protected by a cordon sanitaire in which cultism thrived.

While the blue-stocking crowd still wields enormous influence, it knows too well that today's symphonic picture is geared to Mass-Cult. Today, there are not three but 58 major symphony orchestras in the U.S., and their repertoires and performance schedules reflect the dictates of a public-opinionated mass audience. In one word, more.

Starting in 1955, after Munch's heart-attack had led to the temporary engagement of Switzerland's Ernest Ansermet, the trustees began looking for a different kind of drummer: one who could pack Symphony Hall during the fall-winter season, would crowd the Tanglewood lawns in the summer, would sell the RCA Victor records and reap the royalties, old enough to seduce the philanthropists, young enough to humor the press, and one who, above all, would not be a Divine Creature.

For the players, more than the natives, were restless. Though paid more than twice the going scale of the "average symphony orchestra musician," blessed with a 50-week work schedule, paid vacations and a unique retirement pension plan, Boston's orchestral aristocrats claim to be members of an artistic poverty corps. In truth, their unhappiness is less economic than it is professional. For it is only when one looks at the current conflict of co-existence between the Boston's 104 players and their 11th Music Director, that the hard truth emerges. Namely, that in a game where both the name and the rules are changed, the conductor can no longer be judged solely as an artist, but as an administrator of a corporate trust; and that, as a result, the players are having the damndest time adjusting to the fact that they are more than just musical virtuosi: they are paid employees, subject to the same disciplines as Mr. Leinsdorf's secretary.

—FPM

on. Both of them like to give direction. They share a constructive kind of vanity that too few men manage to live up to, probably because this requires great inner discipline, almost a sense of ruthlessness."

It is this "sense of ruthlessness," coupled with a tuned affinity for making waves, that has long stereotyped the incumbent of what Time calls "the world's most prestigious musical throne." At fifty-four, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a conspicuously compact (5' 5", 150 lbs.), highly volatile and, above all, exasperatingly brilliant musicologist with a fetish for seeking technical perfection. Suffering from obsessive good taste, he confounds friend and foe alike with his contentiousness, his sharply focused intellectuality and, especially among his female followers, enormous masculine appeal.

His piercing brown eyes "seem intent on hypnotic exercises," one fan has written, while another chronicler—admittedly no admirer—notes that "even in casual conversation, he makes few statements that haven't already been properly indexed and cross-referenced."

One of the most frequently quoted Leinsdorf pronouncements questions the desirability of objectivity "in a world that, after all, flourishes on an interplay of many ideas and professions." He has often explained his flair for generating controversy by pointing out that "without friction, there can be no progress. The music world cannot live without it."

Neither can Leinsdorf. For the past 32 years, here and abroad, he has resorted to just about every device short of The Rack to get his players to enunciate every note, phrase, and nuance that the composer had put into the score. Second balcony critics will smugly describe his performances as "Teutonic," forgetting that the Viennese Leinsdorf studied under that other noted Teuton, Arturo Toscanini, who likewise made a fetish of exorcising 19th Century interpretive frills. Even today, Leinsdorf will privately describe the sound of colleague Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra as "pure orange sauce."

As a young conductor, Leinsdorf crusaded so violently that his wife, to keep his sleeves intact, used to sew his shirt cuffs to his jackets. Today, he makes the point far more devastatingly with heavy-handed sarcasm. "I am not aware that music can be improved by inaccuracy," he will waspishly tell his Boston players, pausing long enough for this to sink in before thrusting home, "you are anti-Strauss!"

This Hochschulmeister approach has doubtless managed to alienate most of the Boston's 104 players over the past four seasons, but it seems not to disturb Leinsdorf, who feels he was hired not to uphold hoary traditions of laissez-faire but to run a tightly-disciplined orchestra.

Today, when one of the players will complain of Leinsdorf's alleged tyranny, B.S.O. manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. is hard pressed to conceal his amusement. He feels there may be something necrophilic in the way musicians tend to worship dead conductors, conveniently forgetting the bad good old days under Koussevitzky. "Memory," he murmurs, "is a magnificent filter."

At the time his appointment was announced, in April, 1961—less than four months after first guest-conducting the B.S.O.—Leinsdorf embraced Dr. Charles Munch and amiably declared that as he'd be inheriting "a perfect orchestra and a perfect organization," he would come to Boston the following year "not as a bricklayer, as I do not have to build."

He wisely said nothing about reconstruction. For he must have known, as many of the players admit today, that during Munch's 13 actively-benign years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had grown flabby through lack of discipline.

Back on September 21, 1962—Leinsdorf's first closed rehearsal—the men seemed eager for rehabilitation. They welcomed their new resident whip with almost indecent passion. "We are the happiest orchestra in the world. Never before has an orchestra needed such a man," cried bass clarinetist and personnel manager Rosario Mazzeo, adding "nor has such a man needed an orchestra!"—an unfortunately impolitic reference to Leinsdorf's well-publicized wanderlust for his own symphony orchestra.

With the exception of a handful of players who believed themselves to be members of a symphonic monarchy where the game of musical first chairs was governed by a Divine Rule of Inheritance, most of them sat back to take the full brunt of Leinsdorf's "willpower" (he disdains the word "discipline"). Several prima donnas left to sample Ormandy's orange sauce, others transferred elsewhere, a few retired. Though grumbling, the orchestra hailed the twice-daily rehearsals, each session being clocked to precisely two and a half hours. Moonlighting was out (Munch having often allowed players to absent themselves, with pay, to accept outside engagements on the theory that "it is good for ze morale, non?") Instead, Leinsdorf prodded the trustees to set up The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, which allows the principal chair holders to supplement their salaries (and their egos).

He was even tough on himself: long known as a habitué of New York's finest restaurants and frequent theatre- and party-goer, he abruptly turned recluse in his 11-room white clapboard house on Brookline's Dean Road (which he had ordered screened by a high picket fence to discourage site-seers). "I assiduously avoid public exposure, not for any particular social reason, but should I catch a cold and so miss rehearsals or performances." Up to the week of Nov. 29th last year, when he did catch cold, Leinsdorf's attendance record was perfect.

The long-heralded, so-called "Boston Sound" he attributed not to the collective genius of his players but to the thoughtfulness of Major Henry Higginson in having built an acoustically-perfect hall. "I want many 'Boston Sounds,'" he declares, "as the sound of an orchestra should be like the costumes, gestures and speech of a great actor. I want this to be a repertory orchestra!"

Mr. Leinsdorf with Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the B.S.O.

To this extent, he has succeeded admirably. Up to his arrival, the repertory had been grounded on the 19th Century, Russo-French, romantic idiom —Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Berlioz, Ravel, et al, punctuated occasionally by an American Copland. Now, almost at once, 45 years went by the board as an astonished audience was "introduced" to Bartok, Mahler, Scriabin, Hindemith, Strauss, Milhaud, Webern, Kodaly, Schönberg, Bruckner, Shostakovitch, and Prokofieff.

Warned that Bostonians would not take kindly to anything that would steal their orchestra's instrumental thunder, say choral music, Leinsdorf unperturbedly opened the repertory to the Requiems of Mozart, Verdi, Britten and Brahms, Strauss' Salome, Schumann's E-Flat Mass, Wagner's Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, and courteously arranged for his predecessor, Dr. Munch, to preside over the world premiere of Native Son Leonard Bernstein's Kaddish. (Last Fall, during rehearsal for an extra concert, under the auspices of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston, a visitor remarked that the program—Tchaikovsky's 4th, Beethoven's Leonore #3, and Mendelsohn's Violin Concerto—wasn't terribly "challenging." To this euphemism, Leinsdorf smiled mischievously and said, "Aha, my friend, don't forget that we shall be playing for a philanthropic audience.")

He was so anxious to get out to Lenox to resuscitate the ailing Berkshire Music Center (which he calls "a summer academy and not a school") that he didn't even wait for his term to begin. Sunning himself at poolside in the French Riviera village of Beaulieu in 1962 (where an expansively-minded Brahmin came up to him one day and said, "welcome to Boston"), Leinsdorf began stiffening Berkshire's entrance requirements for the next summer, and back in Massachusetts met with manager 'Tod' Perry to set up a "Performance Department" where singers, instrumentalists, and composers might study under fellowship grants that would free them from having to wait on tables. Ever-mindful of "the imbalance that exists in today's musical establishment" and "the alienation between today's audiences and contemporary composers," he persuaded the trustees to let him add a Tanglewood Institute. Its purpose: to train music teachers, administrators, and even a few privileged amateurs in the art of listening with both ears.

At the end of his second summer, here in Boston, he initiated a still-running, still-inconclusive dialogue between the B.S.O. and neighboring New England Conservatory of Music, Harvard, M.I.T., Boston University, and Brandeis, that may yet result in the establishment of a year-round, jointly-sponsored music training center—a perpetual urban and exurban Tanglewood, with seed-money coming from certain unidentified foundations.

Not unmindful of the B.S.O.'s annual $350-500,000 deficit, he balanced his academic enthusiasm by tackling the Berkshire Music Festivals in the best Sol Hurok tradition: he used all the wiles, charms, and stratagems at his command to add marquee value to the programs, resulting in blanket-room-only, box-office records.

Because of this frantic pace, one man's zeal may well be another man's arrogance. Not surprisingly, a good part of the Leinsdorf Rhapsody in C Sharp Major has turned discordant. The superlatives that attended Leinsdorf's ascendancy back in 1962 are being heard less frequently these days. Instead, one gets accustomed to hearing people speak of Leinsdorf as a "ruthless martinet" or an "insensitive pedagogue" or an "insatiable egoist" who is "as musically adventurous as a metronome," whose performances are "cold and uninspired" or "methodical and unemotional"—one who in trying to do too much is accomplishing too little. The only trouble here, of course, is that the critics fail to catalogue their bill of particulars, bringing to mind Kenneth Tynan's apt description of a critic as "one who knows the way but can't drive the car."

If one may particularize generalities, the principal complaints show Leinsdorf as wanting to squeeze every stem out of the score while dismissing his rationale ("I want each work to 'settle in' to the repertoire") as "a flimsy cover-up for the man's incapacity to feel." These detractors, their memories filtering overtime, conveniently forget that Koussevitsky departed so often from the score that critic Alan Rich recalls "his ability to make an audience believe that Mozart really was a Russian."

(WCRB station manager Richard L. Kaye, who agrees that Leinsdorf's methodology often gets in the way of the performance, nevertheless will defend the Maestro's exactness by pointing out that it was the "settling-in" process that had permitted the players to perform, abruptly, faultlessly, Beethoven's Eroica Funeral March minutes after Leinsdorf announced, to a horror-struck Friday afternoon audience, that John F. Kennedy had been murdered in Dallas, that Nov. 22, 1963.)

Some of the players bridle at his flair for pedantics ("I often indulge in pictorial explanations I know are neither critical nor profound") by suggesting his rehearsals are little more than music appreciation lessons for unappreciative musicians. Snorts one of them: "I simply dread Monday mornings, when he starts playing Lennie Bernstein doing the Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra." Those with grudges to carry will bring up his early, tactless transgressions of dispatching, just before the bell, terse memoranda ("two bars before M, the B-Sharp longer, please! E.L.") that seemed almost calculatingly offensive to all but the most insensitive professional.

True, to a man, the players will sympathize with Leinsdorf's lament that "of all performers, I am the only one who has no chance to 'practice on my instrument' until all the players are assembled at rehearsal." But when he tries to defend his quest for musical precision on grounds that "an orchestra's margin for error is no broader than the distance to the nearest record store," they will pounce on this remark as "proof" that Leinsdorf has, in effect, sold out the non-profit B.S.O. to those profit-hungry scoundrels at RCA. In truth, a great deal of the new repertory has been recorded on Victor—some, like last summer's Tanglewood Lohengrin, within 24 hours after the last Wagnerian note died in the Shed. And when his close friend George R. Marek of RCA expresses delight at Leinsdorf's open concern for such technical details as stereo balance, the purists on stage at Symphony Hall are simply enraged. They forget, of ccurse, that the ten classical LP's (and the eight they cut as members of Arthur Fiedler's Pops) increase their take-home pay by a minimum of $2,000 a year in recording fees, to say nothing of the fattened pension fund—the result of having WCRB syndicate the concerts to some 70 other stereo radio stations.

What it all comes down to, of course, is that Erich Leinsdorf has been unable to breach that traditional wall of hostility that has always divided the American orchestral landscape into "him and us." Still regarding themselves as creative artists instead of paid employees (no differently from those baseball players on the other side of the Fens), the musicians resent Leinsdorf also for not having been consulted before his selection, citing the fact that such involvement is de rigeur in most European orchestras.

In Boston's case, the protracted conflict is aggravated by the mutual knowledge that Leinsdorf was not the trustees' first choice; that before selecting him the trustees had considered Wolfgang Sawallisch of Vienna, Carlo Maria Guilini of Rome, and William Steinberg of Pittsburgh—who lost out, rumor has it, solely to Leinsdorf's comparatively young age, at that time, 49. This prompts Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg (no relation) to gibe that "our unmusical trustees, inspired by a quarter century of Koussevitzky, seemed to work on the curious syllogism that tenure guarantees eventual greatness."

Another handicap is Leinsdorf's reputation as the Phantom of the Metropolitan Opera, where he made his brilliant U.S. debut as a 26-year-old Wünderkind conductor, and to which he returned in 1957 as a free-wheeling pit conductor-cum-consultant to the equally controversial Rudolf Bing. The reputation haunts him still. "Americans are inordinately fond of labels, and people forget that after my first turn at the Met I went into the symphony business. Yet, I am still forced to wear the label of opera, and worse, German opera specialist."

Born in Vienna on Feb. 4, 1912, Leinsdorf quite early knew that he would someday be a "performer," not a journalist as his mother and uncle had ordained. At 18, he quit the University of Vienna, enrolled in Vienna's Musik Akademie, and in 1933 walked to Salzburg to present himself to Bruno Walter as a volunteer apprentice. Walter in turn introduced him to Toscanini, who taught him just about everything he practices today. After four seasons as a Salzburg fixture, Leinsdorf so impressed the great singer Lotte Lehmann that she urged The Met's manager Edward Johnson to hire Leinsdorf to substitute for ailing house conductor Artur Bodansky.

On Jan. 21, 1938, exactly 23 years before the day Leinsdorf would first guest-conduct the B.S.O. in 1961, Leinsdorf dazzled New York with his Die Walküre—and an enfant terrible was born.

In 1940 came his now-famous feud with Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior, and in June, 1943, when Artur Rodzinsky left Cleveland to take over the New York Philharmonic, Leinsdorf saw a chance to try and remove the label: he moved to the midwest, winning the Cleveland post over contenders Vladimir Golschmann and Efrem Kurtz. Hardly had he unpacked than Uncle Sam sent his greetings to newly-naturalized U.S. citizen Leinsdorf. He suffered silently at Ft. Lee, Virginia, there being precious few vacancies for an Army M.O.S. of "symphony conductor." A back ailment fetched him a discharge after nine months, but by the time he returned to Cleveland, hoping to pick up his career, he'd found the trustees had asked guest conductor George Szell to stay for dinner. Now began that part of his life that composer Virgil Thomson pictured as Leinsdorf in search of some Jordan to cross. It took him two years, and even then the Jordan turned out to be the Mohawk Canal: in 1946, he was appointed Music Director of the Rochester Philharmonic.

Had it not been for a favorable union situation there that freed Columbia Records from the high cost of featherbedding, Leinsdorf might have been doomed to obscurity; but to A&R Director Goddard Lieberson, now president of Columbia and an intimate Leinsdorf companion, Leinsdorf in Rochester was the opportunity to cut some fine Beethoven. But by 1956, Leinsdorf had had enough of shuttling between his family home in Larchmont, N.Y., and Rochester, "particularly of those philanthropic dinners for which one must devote half the time preparing a speech, the other half digesting the chicken." He took the post of music director of the money-strapped New York City Opera Co. and his short tenure there is now unanimously described as an artistic success but financial failure. Bing at the Met offered him a refuge, and he took it—meanwhile continuing to record the complete Mozart symphonic catalogue for Westminster with the Vienna Philharmonic, flying to California to record with the Los Angeles Philharmonic on Capitol, finally landing a fat contract with Marek to do Met operas on Victor. In Manhattan, in 1961-62, he revived the complete Wagnerian Ring Cycle—and there was that damned label again.

Largely at the urging of his intimate friends, artist representative Walter Surovy and his wife, erstwhile Met prima donna Risë Stevens (now the touring Met's impresario), Leinsdorf started back on the symphonic trail in 1961, which ended—one now assumes—in Boston.

The putative Phantom has more or less hung up his operatic cloak. Still, he finds it hard to control the urge to —as trustee Henry B. Cabot puts it— "play all the instruments, on stage as well as off." Until quite recently, he not only insisted on playing the abominable showman (by conducting from astride the harpsichord) but worse— from management's viewpoint—of concerning himself with railroad timetables and press releases. One trustee suggests that Leinsdorf "sought desperately to prove himself. Hell, we knew we had the best there was. I think now he knows that we know."

More secure in his position, Leinsdorf excels at disarming people with gentle mockery. For example, he playfully teased the co-eds of the Harvard Glee Club-Radcliffe Choral Society during rehearsal of the Brahms German Requiem by noting that if they were only as bosomy as the German mädchen, they might give the work more oomph. Rushing to the aid of their flat-chested readers, the Crimson editors suggested tongue-in-cheek that at concert time, the girls should wear padded brassieres.

Those professional Leinsdorf baiters who delight in exhuming incidents of his former insensitivities, will likewise be hardpressed to explain what manner of man would deliberately withhold news of Kennedy's assassination until a young composer got his chance to premiere his work. William Sydeman, 37, was to have his Study for Orchestra #2 premiered that afternoon of November 22. The concert began at 2 p.m. with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-Flat Major; by 2:39 p.m., the news from Dallas was confirmed, but not until the Sydeman work had been played did Leinsdorf make his announcement, yanking Rimsky-Korsakov's Coq d'Or for the Eroica Funeral March. He explains "I did not want the stunned audience to walk out before Mr. Sydeman's work had been played."

The last person to say that Leinsdorf has changed will be Erich Leinsdorf. He will make a wry face when it is suggested that he has "mellowed." He will feign surprise when it is pointed out to him that now no longer an unseen pit conductor, he will use a baton and gesture more readily with his knees, hips and those steely large eyes. He claims not to read the music critics ("they are paid to have opinions about me, I am not paid to have opinions of them") and yet, Mike Steinberg of the Globe recently got a long-distance telephone call from Leinsdorf for no other reason than to apprise the critic that in doing the Bruckner Fourth Symphony, Leinsdorf would consider using an edition that Steinberg—in a column written nearly a year earlier—had felt Leinsdorf should use. "His memory," says Steinberg, "is almost sinister." (For all the printed sniping, the two German-speaking musicologists get along famously.)

Clarinetist Rosario Mazzeo thinks Leinsdorf has become "much freer, emotionally." The test of any conductor, he says, "comes not by exposure such as on the road or on records, but when the man is installed, when he's exposed and vulnerable." Personal manager Walter Surovy agrees in toto, adds that "the biggest change, I think, is that Erich has become conscious of the commercial facts of life. He knows that in Tanglewood, for example, where the orchestra cannot depend on subscriptions and must rely on box office, he cannot permit himself to fight useless battles." The same, it might be said, applies to his relationship with RCA: he may well seethe at having to record such over-recorded standards as Cliburn and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto; but he knows, too, that by selling enough Cliburns, he might convince Marek to let him do a Bartok violin concerto with "unknown" concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. He did.

It is not that Leinsdorf has ceased being rigid. "He can be little else," says fellow Austrian Surovy, who explains that "as young people, we in Vienna grew up with the understanding that to get ahead in life one simply needed chutzpah, gemuttlichkeit and schmaltz —in that order. It worked for neither of us, but then Erich went to the other extreme. He became what you might call an ascetic."

Thus, when Leinsdorf last year came across an 1801-02 Beethoven sketchbook that had wended its way from Leipzig to the Soviet Union and back to Western Europe, he insisted on taking up Russian lessons at Harvard—stopping after he'd felt he'd learned enough to tackle the Russian translation himself. Most others might have gone on in their studies, but Leinsdorf had gotten all he'd wanted out of his lessons.

His entertainments are likewise not frivolous. A voracious reader, he literally consumes the Congressional Record and the London Times Literary Supplement, and he digests—not just reads—three or four serious books at the same time. (His latest: Runciman's The Fall of Constantinople.) For sheer relaxation, he will slip off to New Mexico to ride horses and read the poems of Josef von Eichendorff and Eduard Friedrich Morike, from whose 19th Century works he draws many of his rehearsal dicta. Fiction bores him "as it always pictures man as a product of genetics and childhood frustrations." Music commentator John M. Conly finds that Leinsdorf "distrusts words, although he uses them well. Objectively, he is eloquent, subjectively uncontrollably reticent." In trying to profile him for High Fidelity, Conly found the man impossible to get on paper—so he wrote him a list of queries. Back in the mail came a bulging envelope and a letter that might have begun "unaccustomed as I am to talking about myself . . ." and which ran to exactly 2,548 words.

He loves his work, and yet he will complain that his current schedule is "like asking a pitcher to go 18 innings three times a week." He also complains that his vacations are too long, and he has Surovy booking him, between the end of the 1965-66 season and Tanglewood, into the concert halls of Amsterdam, Prague, Paris, Vienna and Copenhagen—not forgetting the Rome recording of Verdi's Masked Ball in August, his 14th opera for RCA since 1957.

In some ways, Leinsdorf is very much like his old mentor, Lyndon Baines Johnson. He also seems to have those "extra glands" that enable him to play Everyman at Symphony Hall and yonder in the Shed at Tanglewood; he, too, is a taskmaster satisfied with nothing less than 110 per cent perfection, who can be relied to get things done, usually his way. And, like Johnson, he still suffers by being generally misunderstood and unloved by his many publics. In the final analysis, therefore, the conflict is not one of winning or losing, or of popularity, but of doing what one was hired to do. The natives may be restless, but the hall is filled, the lawns in Lenox are trampled, the records are selling, the press is enchanted, the deficit is now down to $200,000—and not even that outspoken septuagenarian, Henry B. Cabot, can think of a complaint.

(more on page 32)

229

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 20 1967
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf: Opera House Needed

Eric Leinsdorf
As he appeared at the time of his first appearance in the old Boston Opera House.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his feelings on Boston's need for a new and adequate opera house. "I hope and expect," the conductor said in a statement to The Globe, "that Boston in the shortest possible time will have a glorious opera house worthy of the musical traditions of this city and its operatic aspirations."

It was announced last week that the Back Bay Theater, the home now of The Opera Company of Boston and of The Boston Ballet, will be torn down and unavailable beyond the end of the current season.

This development leaves both companies, in effect, homeless. Other theaters in Boston are either unavailable for the amount of time a resident company would need for rehearsals and performance, or they are unsuitable because of lack of proper equipment or because they are of an inappropriate size.

Ironically, the announcement about the Back Bay Theater was followed almost at once by news of the founding of a new American National Opera Company under the direction of Sarah Caldwell, Artistic Director of The Opera Company of Boston. Thus, what could be very good news for Boston's operatic life is counteracted by a situation that seriously jeopardizes the operations of The Opera Company of Boston and those here of the new National Company.

Fear has been expressed that Boston stands in danger of losing the services of Sarah Caldwell, nationally acknowledged as the most vital force in operatic production in America today.

Erich Leinsdorf said: "Some of my most cherished memories of Boston in the late 1930s and '40s are connected with the Opera House on Huntington Avenue, where I conducted opera performances in an ideal setting. When that house was torn down I felt as sad as when one loses an old friend."

"Now that the Back Bay Theatre must go, I hope and expect that in the shortest possible time Boston will have a glorious opera house worthy of the musical traditions of this city and its operatic aspirations; and may we hope that official Washington which has shown interest will be of concrete help."

Leinsdorf understands well that a city cannot pretend to a complete musical culture without a rich operatic life. Immediately before coming to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Music Director in 1962, Leinsdorf served as Musical Consultant and Conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. Leinsdorf's association with the Metropolitan Opera began when he first came to America from his native Austria in 1937, and he made his Boston debut conducting a Metropolitan performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" at the Boston Opera House on April 2, 1938.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAR 13 1967
New England Newsclip

THE BELL TELEPHONE HOUR'S 100th birthday salute to the late, great maestro Arturo Toscanini on Ch. 4 last night, was a magnificent musical tribute with some priceless film never before shown.

It caught all the passion and fire of the tempestuous conductor who was 70 when he first raised his baton over the NBC Symphony and 87 when he retired.

The Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf was among the four famous conductors who helped the viewer to better understand Toscanini by discussing his great genius and technical accomplishments.

Among the most impressive moments: the kinescope from "Aida" with singers Richard Tucker, Herva Nelli, Eva Gustavson and Giuseppe Valdengo and the informal, happy hours that showed another uide of Toscanini at the Villa Pauline in Riverdale, N.Y. and in Italy.

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 245,503 SAT. 182,801
APR 8 1967

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in appearance Tuesday night at the Academy of Music. Concert is event of the All Star-Forum Series.

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 27,000
APR 30 1967

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
APR 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf to Conduct Concerts in Israel

Erich Leinsdorf, who completed his fifth winter season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday, is on a European holiday.

After a short rest he will travel to Israel for a series of concerts with the Israel Philharmonic, an orchestra Leinsdorf has conducted on three previous occasions. Thirteen concerts will be given in Haifa, Jerusalem, and Tel Aviv, the first May 18.

Leinsdorf will return to this country for the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox June 25, the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer activities at Tanglewood. He conducts the first concert at the Berkshire Festival June 30.

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
HERALD-TELEPHONE
D. 16,500
MAR 29 1967

Leinsdorf To Appear Here

Erich Leinsdorf is the 11th conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear on the Indiana University Auditorium Series Wednesday, April 5, at 8 p.m.

He took over the musical directorship of the Orchestra in 1962 after five years as music consultant and conductor at the Metropolitan Opera.

Born in Vienna, the 55-year-old conductor began his conducting career as assistant to Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the 1934 Salzburg Festival. His first years in America were spent with the Metropolitan Opera, followed by a period of symphonic activity, during which he was conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra and, for a decade, music director of the Rochester Philharmonic. He returned to the Metropolitan in 1957 and remained there through the 1961-62 season.

Through his many successful guest - conducting appearances with the world's foremost symphony orchestras, and through his numerous recordings, Leinsdorf's career has been an international one. Among the American orchestras which have played under his direction are those of Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Rochester, Los Angeles, and Houston. Abroad, he has conducted the London Philharmonic, London Symphony, Concertgebouw, Vienna Philharmonic, Berlin Philharmonic, Bayreuth Festival Orchestra, and the Israel Philharmonic.

The Boston Symphony came into existence in 1881 through the endeavors of a Boston banker, Henry Lee Higginson.

The Orchestra's regular conductors have included Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, and Charles Munch.

ERICH LEINSDORF

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
TRIBUNE
D. 32,000
OCT 22 1966

Souvenir Book Has Some Historical Facets

By URITH LUCAS
Tribune Staff Writer

The handsome 35th anniversary program for the opening concert of the Albuquerque Symphony Orchestra looks forward and backward.

With a cover design of an orchestra conductor . . . an impressionistic photograph of Conductor Maurice Bonney . . . the souvenir book for Wednesday's concert is a beautiful pictorial one.

THE WORD "Salud" indicates it is a toast for the well being of the orchestra in the new Concert Hall at the University of New Mexico.

A gala crowd is expected for the concert. The orchestra is to play Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's monumental "Ninth Symphony with vocal soloists and chorus.

The house is almost sold out by season subscriptions. There will be some single admission reserved seats on sale at the box office that night.

THERE WILL be two parties to celebrate the symphony opening.

The board of directors and patrons of the orchestra will be honored at a "black tie" buffet in the Desert Room of the Student Union Building following the concert. This is by invitation.

The orchestra and chorus will be entertained following the concert in the downstairs lobby of the Concert Hall. The new hall was designed with some room for such social events. Mrs. Sherman Smith is making arrangements for both parties.

THE ANNIVERSARY program traces the growth of the symphony since it was organized in 1931 as the Civic Symphony.

Albuquerque historian Will Keleher is poetic in his sketch "The Old Corral." It is one of the many treasured features of the book.

"Some day a creative artist by birth, adoption or inclination may compose a symphony dedicated to the Albuquerque of yesteryear" Mr. Keleher said.

The anniversary book includes pictures of some of the nation's outstanding conductors and their messages to the orchestra.

THEY INCLUDE Eleazar de Carvalho, conductor and music director of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

John Whiteside, Albuquerque photographer, did the art photographs for the book and Gerry Winstin was artist for the project.

Mrs. Thomas Cook and Mrs. Concha Ortiz y Pino de Kleven had charge of arrangements for the book which was a project of the symphony board.

PICTURES include a view of Albuquerque, shots of San Felipe de Neri Church in Old Town, the UNM Concert Hall, the Big I, UNM President and Mrs. Tom Popejoy and one of Mrs. Emmanuel Schifani and Mrs. Rudolph Dreyer.

There is a reproduction of a drawing on an orchestra by Ellen Oppenheim. Miss Oppenheim won the art competition sponsored by the Albuquerque Women's Assn. for UNM art students.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
MAR 1967

Jack Romann (left), manager of the Baldwin Piano Artists Department, ran into the Boston Symphony music director, ERICH LEINSDORF, at Caneel Plantation in St. John, Virgin Islands, over the Holidays. The two were escaping the rigors of Boston and New York but took time during the vacation to discuss some of the new Baldwin artists, PETER SERKIN and ANDRE WATTS.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 17 1967
New England Newsclip

Conservatory Centennial

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

The New England Conservatory of Music celebrated its centennial Thursday night with 512 guests filling the ballroom of the Sheraton-Plaza to commemorate the occasion.

President-elect Gunther Schuller, Pres. Chester W. Williams, Sherwin Badger and David Crockett welcomed the gathering.

Musicians from the Conservatory played selections, with graduate and Metropolitan basso Justino Diaz rendering solos.

In the big gathering were names known to musicians everywhere. Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the famous Boston Symphony conductor and founder of Tanglewood, was at the head table, as were her sister, the Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg; Mrs. James Perkins, only woman trustee of the Boston Symphony and Mrs. Brook Potter, noted music patron and daughter of the late Wendell Endicott, conservatory trustee and founder of the Boston Metropolitan Opera Committee.

Also in attendance were composer Mabel Daniels Mr. and Mrs. Jose de Varon, MIT's Klaus Lipemann, Mrs. Theresa Putnam, A. Howard Abell, Talcott Banks, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Weld, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Zighera, William Shurcliff, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Adrain Rubel, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Opdycke, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Ohl, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Mugar, Mrs. Alen orse, Mrs. Laurence Lombard, rs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Keller, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Kutten, former Gov. and Mrs. Robert Bradford.

229

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

FEB 20 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf: Opera House Needed

Eric Leinsdorf
As he appeared at the time of his first appearance in the old Boston Opera House.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his feelings on Boston's need for a new and adequate opera house. "I hope and expect," the conductor said in a statement to The Globe, "that Boston in the shortest possible time will have a glorious opera house worthy of the musical traditions of this city and its operatic aspirations."

It was announced last week that the Back Bay Theater, the home now of The Opera Company of Boston and of The Boston Ballet, will be torn down and unavailable beyond the end of the current season.

This development leaves both companies, in effect, homeless. Other theaters in Boston are either unavailable for the amount of time a resident company would need for rehearsals and performance, or they are unsuitable because of lack of proper equipment or because they are of an inappropriate size.

Ironically, the announcement about the Back Bay Theater was followed almost at once by news of the founding of a new American National Opera Company under the direction of Sarah Caldwell, Artistic Director of The Opera Company of Boston. Thus, what could be very good news for Boston's operatic life is counteracted by a situation that seriously jeopardizes the operations of The Opera Company of Boston and those here of the new National Company.

Fear has been expressed that Boston stands in danger of losing the services of Sarah Caldwell, nationally acknowledged as the most vital force in operatic production in America today.

Erich Leinsdorf said: "Some of my most cherished memories of Boston in the late 1930s and '40s are connected with the Opera House on Huntington Avenue, where I conducted opera performances in an ideal setting. When that house was torn down I felt as sad as when one loses an old friend."

"Now that the Back Bay Theatre must go, I hope and expect that in the shortest possible time Boston will have a glorious opera house worthy of the musical traditions of this city and its operatic aspirations; and may we hope that official Washington which has shown interest will be of concrete help."

Leinsdorf understands well that a city cannot pretend to a complete musical culture without a rich operatic life. Immediately before coming to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Music Director in 1962, Leinsdorf served as Musical Consultant and Conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. Leinsdorf's association with the Metropolitan Opera began when he first came to America from his native Austria in 1937, and he made his Boston debut conducting a Metropolitan performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" at the Boston Opera House on April 2, 1938.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

MAR 13 1967 New England Newsclip

THE BELL TELEPHONE HOUR'S 100th birthday salute to the late, great maestro Arturo Toscanini on Ch. 4 last night, was a magnificent musical tribute with some priceless film never before shown.

It caught all the passion and fire of the tempestuous conductor who was 70 when he first raised his baton over the NBC Symphony and 87 when he retired.

The Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf was among the four famous conductors who helped the viewer to better understand Toscanini by discussing his great genius and technical accomplishments.

Among the most impressive moments: the kinescope from "Aida" with singers Richard Tucker, Herva Nelli, Eva Gustavson and Giuseppe Valdengo and the informal, happy hours that showed another uide of Toscanini at the Villa Pauline in Riverdale, N.Y. and in Italy —

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 245,503 SAT. 182,801

APR 8 1967

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in appearance Tuesday night at the Academy of Music. Concert is event of the All Star-Forum Series.

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 27,000

APR 30 1967

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

APR 26 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf to Conduct Concerts in Israel

Erich Leinsdorf, who completed his fifth winter season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday, is on a European holiday.

After a short rest he will travel to Israel for a series of concerts with the Israel Philharmonic, an orchestra Leinsdorf has conducted on three previous occasions. Thirteen concerts will be given in Haifa, Jerusalem, and Tel Aviv, the first May 18.

Leinsdorf will return to this country for the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox June 25, the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer activities at Tanglewood. He conducts the first concert at the Berkshire Festival June 30.

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
HERALD-TELEPHONE
D. 16,500

MAR 29 1967

Leinsdorf To Appear Here

Erich Leinsdorf is the 11th conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear on the Indiana University Auditorium Series Wednesday, April 5, at 8 p.m.

He took over the musical directorship of the Orchestra in 1962 after five years as music consultant and conductor at the Metropolitan Opera.

Born in Vienna, the 55-year-old conductor began his conducting career as assistant to Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the 1934 Salzburg Festival. His first years in America were spent with the Metropolitan Opera, followed by a period of symphonic activity, during which he was conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra and, for a decade, music director of the Rochester Philharmonic. He returned to the Metropolitan in 1957 and remained there through the 1961-62 season.

Through his many successful guest - conducting appearances with the world's foremost symphony orchestras, and through his numerous recordings, Leinsdorf's career has been an international one. Among the American orchestras which have played under his direction are those of Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Rochester, Los Angeles, and Houston. Abroad, he has conducted the London Philharmonic, London Symphony, Concertgebouw, Vienna Philharmonic, Berlin Philharmonic, Bayreuth Festival Orchestra, and the Israel Philharmonic.

The Boston Symphony came into existence in 1881 through the endeavors of a Boston banker, Henry Lee Higginson.

The Orchestra's regular conductors have included Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitzky, and Charles Munch.

ERICH LEINSDORF

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
TRIBUNE
D. 32,000

OCT 22 1966

Souvenir Book Has Some Historical Facets

By URITH LUCAS
Tribune Staff Writer

The handsome 35th anniversary program for the opening concert of the Albuquerque Symphony Orchestra looks forward and backward.

With a cover design of an orchestra conductor . . . an impressionistic photograph of Conductor Maurice Bonney . . . the souvenir book for Wednesday's concert is a beautiful pictorial one.

THE WORD "Salud" indicates it is a toast for the well being of the orchestra in the new Concert Hall at the University of New Mexico.

A gala crowd is expected for the concert. The orchestra is to play Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's monumental "Ninth Symphony with vocal soloists and chorus.

The house is almost sold out by season subscriptions. There will be some single admission reserved seats on sale at the box office that night.

THERE WILL be two parties to celebrate the symphony opening.

The board of directors and patrons of the orchestra will be honored at a "black tie" buffet in the Desert Room of the Student Union Building following the concert. This is by invitation.

The orchestra and chorus will be entertained following the concert in the downstairs lobby of the Concert Hall. The new hall was designed with some room for such social events. Mrs. Sherman Smith is making arrangements for both parties.

THE ANNIVERSARY program traces the growth of the symphony since it was organized in 1931 as the Civic Symphony.

Albuquerque historian Will Keleher is poetic in his sketch "The Old Corral." It is one of the many treasured features of the book.

"Some day a creative artist by birth, adoption or inclination may compose a symphony dedicated to the Albuquerque of yesteryear" Mr. Keleher said.

The anniversary book includes pictures of some of the nation's outstanding conductors and their messages to the orchestra.

THEY INCLUDE Eleazar de Carvalho, conductor and music director of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

John Whiteside, Albuquerque photographer, did the art photographs for the book and Gerry Winstin was artist for the project.

Mrs. Thomas Cook and Mrs. Concha Ortiz y Pino de Kleven had charge of arrangements for the book which was a project of the symphony board.

PICTURES include a view of Albuquerque, shots of San Felipe de Neri Church in Old Town, the UNM Concert Hall, the Big I, UNM President and Mrs. Tom Popejoy and one of Mrs. Emmanuel Schifani and Mrs. Rudolph Dreyer.

There is a reproduction of a drawing on an orchestra by Ellen Oppenheim. Miss Oppenheim won the art competition sponsored by the Albuquerque Women's Assn. for UNM art students.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

MAR 1967

Jack Romann (left), manager of the Baldwin Piano Artists Department, ran into the Boston Symphony music director, ERICH LEINSDORF, at Caneel Plantation in St. John, Virgin Islands, over the Holidays. The two were escaping the rigors of Boston and New York but took time during the vacation to discuss some of the new Baldwin artists, PETER SERKIN and ANDRE WATTS.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

FEB 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Conservatory Centennial

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

The New England Conservatory of Music celebrated its centennial Thursday night with 512 guests filling the ballroom of the Sheraton-Plaza to commemorate the occasion.

President-elect Gunther Schuller, Pres. Chester W. Williams, Sherwin Badger and David Crockett welcomed the gathering.

Musicians from the Conservatory played selections, with graduate and Metropolitan basso Justino Diaz rendering solos.

In the big gathering were names known to musicians everywhere. Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the famous Boston Symphony conductor and founder of Tanglewood, was at the head table, as were her sister, the Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg; Mrs. James Perkins, only woman trustee of the Boston Symphony and Mrs. Brook Potter, noted music patron and daughter of the late Wendell Endicott, conservatory trustee and founder of the Boston Metropolitan Opera Committee.

Also in attendance were composer Mabel Daniels Mr. and Mrs. Jose de Varon, MIT's Klaus Lipemann, Mrs. Theresa Putnam, A. Howard Abell, Talcott Banks, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Weld, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Zighera, William Shurcliff, Mr. and Mrs. Perry Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Adrain Rubel, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Opdycke, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Ohl, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Mugar, Mrs. Alen orse, Mrs. Laurence Lombard, rs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Keller, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Kutten, former Gov. and Mrs. Robert Bradford.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

APR 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Home is where the score is to Erich Leinsdorf. A high intensity bulb in an old gas lamp, and a tape recorder update the old world hour glass and Venetian table.

Above he is shown with his wife in the living room of their home at Dean rd., Brookline.

GLOBE PHOTOS
BY WILLIAM RYERSON

BSO Harmony Begins at Home

By PHYLLIS COONS
Globe Staff Reporter

Brookline is home to Erich Leinsdorf, but say the word "house" to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, and it means concert halls all over the world. When he spoke to the Globe this week, Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston was on his mind.

"We must have an honest to goodness opera house!" said Boston Symphony conductor Leinsdorf. "I am very much of a supporter of Boston Opera." The Vienna-born musician has spent most of his musical life in America, starting as an assistant conductor at the Metropolitan Opera 30 years ago at the age of 25.

"Does a conductor have favorites among music? Certainly. I think the late Bela Bartok was one of the outstanding composers of the 20th century. "He was reading the score of a Bartok concerto for next year's concert repertoire. The National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences gave him an award for his recording of the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Favorites, yes, but I think that when you consider the total statistics including 75 pieces in 26 different programs to be heard by well over 30,000 people in Boston, Providence and New York, there is no place for favorites," said Leinsdorf.

Leinsdorf voiced some of the concerns he expresses in his open letters to subcribers in the final 1967 Symphony programs: "That "vital musical life" is possible only with constant interaction of both audience and performer; that it is the conductor's role to give "the most idiomatic reading of many styles," including over a five year period (which he has just completed with the B.S.O.) a wide spacing and broad coverage of the best of the old and new music.

Moving to the piano in the music room which he and his wife added to their house on Dean rd., Leinsdorf punctuated his ideas with vigorous bursts of music. Behind him in the white walled room was a painting suggesting a Paris street scene.

"I collect cities rather than paintings," explained Leinsdorf. An abstract by de Chachard hangs in the dining room. Chicago's Michigan Boulevard, which he bought on the way back from a concert to his hotel, strikes a contemporary note in the living room, filled with 18th and 19th century furniture.

Music boxes, with Shakespearean characters and harmonious animals, are everywhere in the big white century-old house, the oldest on Fisher Hill. "We brought them back to our children from wherever we travelled," said Mrs. Leinsdorf.

The five Leinsdorf children are now grown. David, the eldest, is married and will graduate from the Columbia Law School in June. The youngest, Jennie, is a Brookline High School freshman. Her older sister, Hester, who is at B.U., hung paintings on the slanted ceiling of the Leinsdorf music room.

Everywhere in the Leinsdorf house, there are stands for scores. Some are for duets, like the carved wooden holder with room for two candles and two scores. Many are for lap or table reading.

"There was more than enough furniture from our house in Larchmont, so we weeded some out," said Mrs. Leinsdorf. What they chose to keep is definitely old world, predominantly French. They range from country pieces like the dining room sideboard to an elaborate inlaid armoire, which wound up in the pantry.

Terra cotta tiles, covered here and there with Aubusson rugs, show a varied floor pattern. Miniature chairs in a room just wide enough for a loveseat, are another favorite of the Leinsdorfs. Small versions of French bergere armchairs are also decoratice in red and gold in the living room.

"This we do not use much," said Leinsdorf, making a sweeping motion with his hand towards the most formal room. His favorite corner were easy to spot. There was a coffee cup beside the music room shelves, filled with scores. A wine glass was half empty on a table beside a desk built to hold a score.

You don't need a citation for "single handed commitment to the highest tradition of a demanding art" (from Williams College), to know where Leinsdorf's heart is.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515

APR 2 1967

Erich Leinsdorf brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Orchestra hall Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, replacing the touring Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the regular subscription concerts.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

MAR 2 1967 New England Newsclip

Nursery Roundup Under Way

L.A. Times-Washington Post

WASHINGTON—At the intermission of the recent Boston Symphony concert, Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf asked Mrs. Lyndon Johnson how she was coming with preparations for daughter Luci Nugent's first baby, expected in June.

Mrs. Johnson, like many grandmothers-to-be, indicated she was busy rounding up some of the furniture used when her girls were babies, long since loaned out to relatives and friends.

"We've found the baby bed," said the First Lady, "but we're still trying to track down the bassinet." The bed is being scraped and painted now," she explained.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

MAR 1 1967

By Margaret Sandahl, Staff Photographer

THE PAUSE THAT REFRESHED—President Johnson took time out from White House duties last night, when he and Mrs. Johnson attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall. The President was greeted by Mrs. Eric Leinsdorf, wife of the conductor.

LBJ Greets Leinsdorf

Long 'n' Short of Music

By Helen Dudman
Washington Post Staff Writer

Last night, the President got up from the dinner table, went down to his big, black Lincoln Continental and was driven two blocks to Constitution Hall to hear his old friend Erich Leinsdorf conduct the Boston Symphony.

His arrival with Mrs. Johnson was greeted by a standing ovation from the capacity audience. In the Presidential Box with the Johnsons were Mrs. Leinsdorf and Mrs. Roger L. Stevens, wife of the special assistant to the President on the arts.

In the adjoining box were Stevens, the Special Assistant to the President, Robert Kintner, and Mrs. Kintner, and Senator Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) and Mrs. Pell. Senator Pell was instrumental in establishing the National Endowment for the Arts.

THE PRESIDENT listened attentively to the first half of the program, leaning to one side of his chair, sometimes watching the orchestra, or putting his eye glasses off and on.

Mrs. Johnson, sometimes interrupted with an aside from Mrs. Leinsdorf, concentrated on the music.

"Gay and fey," was the way Mrs. Johnson described the music premiered at the concert, a piece by Michael Colgrass entitled "As Quiet As." Others in the audience tittered at some of the unusual orchestral sounds in the new composition.

At the intermission the President, First Lady and their party met with the maestro and three Japanese exchange musicians, who are members of the orchestra for this season. They also met National Symphony manager, M. Robert Rogers, and Mrs. Rogers.

As the President left the DAR President General's reception room to return to his box, he wished Leinsdorf "happy landings."

The 5'5" maestro jumped up to kiss the 6'3" President on the left cheek.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON first became acquainted with Leinsdorf 29 years ago when, as a young Texas congressman, Mr. Johnson helped the young Viennese refugee musician get a visa to visit the United States.

This is the first public entertainment the President has attended since the opening concert of the National Symphony last October.

Mrs. Johnson has been a guest at public performances of the San Francisco Opera and at the opening of the new Metropolitan Opera house.

231

GREENSBORO DAILY NEWS
GREENSBORO, N. C.
D. 94,531 SUN. 108,231

MAY 14 1967

NOTES A FIELD:

Beginning on May 18 the Boston Symphony's conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, will guest conduct 13 concerts with the Israel Philharmonic in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem, returning to the U.S. in time for the June 25 opening of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

New York Post
D. 324,256 SUN. 243,637

MAY 15 1967

Richard Tucker Will Sing With Israel Philharmonic

Richard Tucker, Metropolitan Opera tenor, left last night for Israel, where he will give a series of concerts. He will sing in Tel Aviv and Jersusalem with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

His visit is sponsored by the American Israel Cultural Foundation, which supports the orchestra.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 49,600

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 44,600

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Roberta Peters

One prominent American musician has canceled an appearance in Israel because of the Middle East crisis but two others are staying to sing. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, left Tuesday after the U.S. embassy advised all Americans who could to leave the area. He had been conducting the Israeli Philharmonic in a series of concerts and had one more scheduled, on June 3. Soprano Roberta Peters, in Tel Aviv with her husband, plans to go ahead with concerts she has scheduled for the next few days. So does tenor Richard Tucker.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

LEINSDORF

CRISIS in Mideast has prompted one prominent American musician to cancel an appearance in Israel, but two others are staying to sing.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony left yesterday after the U.S. Embassy advised all Americans who could to leave the area. He had been onducting the Israeli Philharmonic in a series of concerts and had one more scheduled, on June 3rd.

Soprano Roberta Peters, here with her husband, plans to go ahead with concerts she has scheduled for the next few days. So does tenor Richard Tucker.

(Associated Press)

EVENING EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
COMB. CIRC. 43,400

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Orchestra Director Told To Flee Israel

BROOKLINE, Mass. (UPI) —

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Appearance in Israel Canceled by Leinsdorf

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Cancels Trip to Israel Because of Crisis

NEWS-TIMES (e)
DANBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,000

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

U.S. Musician Cancels Appearance In Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,200

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Director Warned To Quit Israel

BROOKLINE, Mass. (UPI) — The musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Wednesday he acceded to a middle-of-the-night United States embassy request to leave Israel but was reluctant to go.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf said he was awakened Tuesday morning following a concert with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra at Tel Aviv. He boarded a plane at noon for Amsterdam, reached New York Tuesday and arrived at his home here Tuesday night.

Leinsdorf had conducted four concerts of a series of 13 programs for which he had volunteered his services. He said he promised the Israelis he would return to complete the tour as soon as world conditions permitted.

Leinsdorf said the embassy in Tel Aviv had scheduled a Friday cocktail party and there was no hint as late as Monday evening that it would be advisable for him to leave.

He said a cultural attache called three times before awakening his hosts. Though told Leinsdorf was asleep, the embassy caller said: "Never mind the sleep, wake him up."

Because of the Mideast crisis, Leinsdorf said, he had been in touch with the embassy previously. The Monday noon rehearsal was carried out on time, as was the evening concert.

Leinsdorf said he was due back in the United States by June 4 anyway to attend the Columbia University commencement. The Berkshire Music Center at Lenox opens in early June.

He said he saw no visible evidence of anxiety among the Israeli concertgoers despite the worsening Mideast situation.

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 44,600

MAY 22 1967 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said he was greatly impressed by Israelis' calm and fortitude in the face of the current Middle East crisis. Leinsdorf, currently conducting a series of concerts of the Israel Philharmonic, at Tel Aviv, Israel, said "We have been playing to full houses as if nothing was happening." He added: "It is wonderful to see how people here find comfort in the music of the great masters."

Leinsdorf Says He'll Return To Israel Tour

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 49,600

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

LEINSDORF CANCELS ISRAEL CONCERT

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 27,700

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Cancels Concert

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 98,600

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Ends Visit in Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Mideast Tour Cut Short, Leinsdorf Flies Home

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,250

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

RECORDER-GAZETTE (e)
GREENFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 13,200

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Musician Gets Out Of Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

TIMES (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 635,600

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Leaves Israel

TEL AVIV, May 24 (AP) —

HERALD (e)
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,050

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

One Musician Cancels Appearance in Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

HOUR (e)
NORWALK, CONN.
CIRC. 21,100

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

MUSICIAN LEAVES ISRAEL BUT 2 STAY

Israel Concerts Planned, Canceled

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,850

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Cancels Israel Concert; 2 Others Staying

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) —

TIME (e)
GREENWICH, CONN.
CIRC. 11,850

MAY 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Ends Tel Aviv Tour, Singers Linger

Leinsdorf Cuts Short Tour With Orchestra in Israel

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

CRISIS FORCES LEINSDORF TO CUT SHORT ISRAELI TOUR

The tensions in Israel and the Mideast, cut short a visit there by Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf said Wednesday that he had received a middle-of-the-night request Tuesday from the U.S. embassy to leave Israel, but he was reluctant to go.

He had been in Israel for a series of 13 programs for which he volunteered his services, but he was able only to conduct four. He had conducted a concert Monday with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra in Tel Aviv, and later at his hotel an embassy aide called and suggested that he leave the country.

He boarded a plane at noon for Amsterdam and flew into New York City Tuesday evening. From there he returned to his home in Brookline.

REPUBLICAN (m)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 25,300

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

U. S. Asked Musician To Leave Israel

BROOKLINE, Mass. (UPI)— The musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Wednesday he acceded to a middle-of-the-night United States embassy request to leave Israel but was reluctant to go.

KENNEBEC JOURNAL (m)
AUGUSTA, ME.
CIRC. 14,850

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Mideast Crisis Cuts Off Tour

Leinsdorf quits Israel

Boston

Eric Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left a concert tour in Israel because of the Middle East crisis. He said he will return when the crisis subsides. Mr. Leinsdorf was conducting the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra in a concert series. He was advised by the United States Embassy Tuesday to leave the country immediately. He told the orchestra he thought he should abide by the wishes of the United States officials but would return to complete the tour when the crisis abated.

News of May 24 and 25 compiled from Associated Press and staff dispatches.

TELEGRAPH (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
CIRC. 14,900

MAY 25 1967 New England Newsclip

Crisis Ends Tour

MISCELLANEOUS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
AUG 27 1966

er in Boston—Dullsville

By SARA DAVIDSON
Globe Critic

Why is the Hatch Shell used only 11 nights a year?

Why can't the American Federation of Musicians sponsor public concerts in Boston as it does in Washington?

Why no Summer arts festival in the city since 1964?

When the curtain went down on the last Esplanade concert in July, Boston went dark. No music, drama or dance will be found in the city until late September.

Out of the wasteland—whispers of hunger.

Carl Devitt, a sandy-haired electronics engineer living in Watertown, recalls the company brochure that enticed him to move East:

"Come to work in Boston, home of the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra." Devitt chuckles. "I couldn't get tickets last season. I was sick the 11 days of the Esplanade concerts. I'd probably have a better chance of seeing the symphony if I lived in Philadelphia."

Ernest Silver, a student at Northeastern, returned from Washington singing praise of the Watergate Concerts on the banks of the Potomac and repertory theater under the Washington monument. "Why can't we have things like that here. I'm sure Boston is as cultural as Washington."

Rose Anne Malfa of Dorchester mourns the demise of the Boston Summer Arts Festival. "It was truly a great mistake," she says. "This activity afforded a pleasant and entertaining way to spend a day or evening."

To these voices comes a reply from a celloist who last played at the Boston Opera House. "O.K., they're all clamoring for more culture. But will they lift a penny to organize or support it?"

The cellist's sour note is reinforced by the cacophony of contradictions surrounding the Boston scene.

Citizens say it is a disgrace that the Hatch Shell is vacant most of the year. But the Metropolitan District Commission, which owns the shell, says no groups have applied to use the shell, other than Arthur Fiedler for the 11-day Esplanade season.

Theater-goers complain about the long dark Summer. Yet the Theater on the Wharf plays to half-filled houses, and sighs over the lack of community interest.

Music fans ask why the musicians' union doesn't use its royalties trust fund to sponsor public concerts. The local union says there is no reason. "No one's ever been in here to see us about it. I don't know if we could do it or not."

★

Everyone wonders why there is no new symphonic group formed when the Boston Symphony is incapable of serving all those interested in the community. Businessmen and artists charge that the Boston Symphony has a stranglehold on the city. "Everyone's afraid of the B.S.O.," a public relations manager says. "The B.S.O. feels it owns the musical life of the community. Because it has a grip on the money sources, it makes sure nothing can thrive here except itself."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, says if another music group were to organize, "I'd be all for them. The more music the better."

Cabot says he has never heard talk of another group forming. "The symphony's position makes it a good deal harder for a new group," he says. "Because they wouldn't have practiced and played together as much as the Symphony has. They would have trouble matching the quality."

Cabot says he is deeply concerned about maintaining the Esplanade season. "It's getting to be a problem, because we don't know how much music a man can play and still keep in form. But I have every hope we can bring the season back to two full weeks."

A gain of three days in the Esplanade season, alas, will be less than a drop in a dry well. What is needed and wanted is a full Summer festival of music, drama, visual and performing arts.

★

The city is not wanting for facilities. Hatch Shell, Boston Common, the Public Garden an Faneuil Hall can be used by non-political, non-sectarian, non-profit organizations.

Lanning Humphrey, a spokesman for the Symphony, who was present when Hatch Shell was built, said it was designed with tiers and multiple levels to accommodate drama and pageantry as well as concert work. An M.D.C. regulation prohibits any sale of tickets or solicitation at performances. But this policy could be changed, according to M.D.C. staff member Alice Banard, through "involved political procedures."

As long as the no-sale policy sticks, it remains for Boston businessmen and civic groups to support public outdoor performances. There is certainly enough wealth in the community to underwrite a Summer-long series.

There is also a full supply of talent. "I guarantee you could assemble a full orchestra from the area," said a member of the musicians' union. "And heaven knows there are plenty of dancers, singers and actors out of work all Summer."

Boston has all the ingredients: audiences, artists, money, natural settings and suitable stages. What it lacks is unity of spirit and action—from cultural groups as well as the community. If cultural groups would set aside suspicions and jealousies to bolster each other, there would be no vacuum in the Shell.

If benefactors of the arts would work together instead of competitively, there might have been an arts festival this Summer. If the voices who wail in the wasteland would seek an active part in organizing activities, there will certainly be a different spectrum next Summer in the city.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
AUG 15 1966

Social Chatter
By Alison Arnold

Gunther Schuller Honored in Lenox

Also to be presented at the ball are ELIZABETH STEELE, daughter of Mrs. A. Werk Cook of Sarasota Fla., and Cohasset, and the late Edwin J. Steele, and her stepsister, ELIZABETH LONG; LINDA FOSTER, daughter of Mr. William B. Foster of Westwood; LEE BOWEN, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Bowen, and MARILEA CARTER, whose parents are Mr. and Mrs. Philip Sidney Carter.

A BUFFET SUPPER at the Lenox House in Lenox was given Saturday evening by the Board of Trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music, in honor of Gunther Schuller, who will become the ninth president of the Conservatory. He will succeed Chester W. Williams, who has resigned his administrative responsibilities in order to devote full time to teaching at the Conservatory.

Mr. Schuller is a composer and conductor. He has been guest conductor with symphony orchestras both in this country and abroad and will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston in November.

A distinguished French horn player, Mr. Schuller, at the age of 17, became the first horn player of the Cincinnati Symphony. At 9 he joined the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, where he remained for 15 years. He has written several books and articles about music.

Mr. Schuller is married to the former Marjorie Black of Fargo, N. D. The Schullers have two sons, Edwin and George and they are living in Tanglewood this summer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
AUG 23 1966

RETIRING MEMBERS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were honored recently at Tanglewood by Erich Leinsdorf (center), conductor. With him, from left, are Rosario Mazzeo, personnel manager and clarinetist, and K. Vinal Smith, tuba, both members since 1933; Henri Girard, bass (1920), and Osbourne McConathy (1944). Also honored were Georges Moleux, principal bass (1930), and Richard Burgin, former concertmaster and associate conductor (1920).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 56,200
AUG 31 1966

Musician Retires

Kilton Vinal Smith, a native son of Vinalhaven, has retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The clarinetist was born and brought up in Vinalhaven, receiving, he says, guidance, direction and not "infrequent admonishings" from his mother Mrs. Albra J. V. Smith, who was a New England Conservatory of Music graduate and music supervisor of the island.

Smith says he also received invaluable coaching from W. Adelbert (Bert) Smith, a cousin who now lives in Portland, and from famous clarinet soloist, R. Mont Arey, another cousin who was former first clarinet with the Detroit, Philadelphia, and Rochester symphonies.

Smith's wife, Cecilia, also a New England Conservatory graduate, was formerly concertmeister of the original Women's Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

He said his first and only mentor in Boston was Jacob Raichman, first trombonist, who, with Rosario Mazzeo, were early and consistent visitors to Vinalhaven. Three other friends also found Vinalhaven the right place in which to relax—Roger Voisin, trumpet; Paul Francis Keaney, French horn, and Joseph Orosz, trombone, euphonium and tuba.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
AUG 15 1966

N.E. Conservatory Names New Head

Gunther Schuller has accepted the position of president of the New England Conservatory of Music, succeeding Chester W. Williams, who has resigned to teach full time at the conservatory.

The announcement was made by Sherwin C. Badger, chairman of the Conservatory's Board of Trustees. Schuller will become the ninth president in the 100-year history of the conservatory, and will assume the duties at the beginning of the new school year next month.

Born in New York City in 1925, the son of a violinist with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, Schuller brings to his new job a record of accomplishment as composer, conductor, performer and writer, Badger said.

Currently associate professor of music at Yale University, he is also chairman of the composition department of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, a position he has held since 1963.

As a composer he has been working under the commission of the Hamburg, Germany, State Opera on a jazz-oriented opera entitled "The Visitation" which is scheduled for the world premiere on Oct. 12.

As a conductor he organized a series of concerts in New York City's Carnegie Hall entitled "Twentieth Century Innovations" and will also serve as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

A distinguished French horn player, he became first horn of the Cleveland Symphony at the age of 17. At 19 he joined the Metropolitan Opera orchestra where he remained for 15 years, nine of them as horn soloist.

He is married to the former Marjorie Black of Fargo, N.D., and they have two sons.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 52,173
AUG 21 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
SEP 1 1966

CORRECTION

The wrong photograph inadvertently appeared with the caption below in last week's issue. The Advocate regrets the error.

BSO PH.D.—A violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Giora Georg Bernstein, received the degree of doctor of musical arts from Boston University on August 20. He was the only person at the summer commencement to receive a doctorate. Mr. Bernstein was graduated from the Juilliard School of Music in 1957 and in 1959 he received a master of fine arts degree from Brandeis University. In 1959 he became the Spalding Fellow at Boston University, where he studied violin with Joseph Silverstein. Since 1963 Mr. Bernstein has been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He lives at 458 Beacon St., Boston.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 51,098
AUG 5 1966

SOCIETY
by Miriam Tod

Though there are still several weeks of summer to go, the thoughts of many charitably minded people are already turning toward the fall and the various benefits planned for their favorite causes.

The opening Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sept. 23 seems to be the signal for the start of the social season as regards charitable affairs. The next evening, Sept. 24, sees a benefit performance for the American Cancer Society of the Mary Martin musical "I Do, I Do" at the Colonial Theatre, and the afternoon after this, Sept. 25, the Friends of the Deaconess Hospital are sponsoring a performance of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at Symphony Hall. On Oct. 1 the Vassar Club of Boston have arranged a benefit performance of the Royal Highland Fusiliers at Boston Garden.

233

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,393 SUN. 693,178

JULY 2 8 1966

ROBERT C. MARSH

Critic At-Large

THE TOSCANINI CENTENNIAL

Arturo Toscanini was born March 25, 1867, and the centennial of that event will fall in the forthcoming season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has already announced that its concerts of March 24-25 will be dedicated to the memory of the Maestro, and the program will consist of the "St. John Passion" of Bach.

The score is fitting in every way, although one cannot but note that it is not music that Toscanini himself performed. Like many Italian artists, the Maestro had limited affinity for Bach and played relatively few of his works.

TO BOSTON'S music director Erich Leinsdorf, it is another matter. Reared in the Central European tradition, Leinsdorf became Toscanini's assistant at the Salzburg Festival of 1934 and as a 22-year-old colleague of the 67-year-old Toscanini, played the piano for rehearsals, coached singers and worked at all the chores of preparation. It was a demanding apprenticeship, but it started Leinsdorf on his American career. Three years later, at Toscanini's recommendation, Leinsdorf became a member of the conducting staff of the Metropolitan.

ARTURO TOSCANINI

One can hope that other conductors who have been associated with Toscanini in the past will take this opportunity to pay homage to the great man on a 100th birthday that is also, nearly exactly, a commemoration of 10 years since his death.

We can probably expect at least one new book about Toscanini during the season. There will not be a special centennial revision of my book about the Maestro. I couldn't sell the idea. Nor can we look for any particularly large quantity of new Toscanini recordings from the archives, although there will be at least one major release on the anniversary.

SO FAR AS A CHICAGO observance of the date goes, I doubt if you can expect much at Orchestra Hall, because Jean Martinon makes no secret of the fact that he is no admirer of the Toscanini approach to music. (I wish he were an equally bad conductor!) It is too early to hear from the FM stations, but it will be quite out of character if several of them do not provide retrospective presentations of the Toscanini legacy. NBC's "Toscanini: The Man Behind the Legend" will presumably continue through its network outlets.

Thus it looks as if the centennial will be observed, here and there, but with only modest display. At that Toscanini will be better off than Koussevitzky, whose 90th birthday passed in 1964 with hardly a ripple and whose centennial will probably be noted only in Boston.

IT IS PERPLEXING to contrast the power and prestige that conductors now enjoy in their lifetime with the rapid decline in their public image after death. Of the great triumvirate of the 1930s—Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky, Stokowski has emerged the dominant figure, while Koussevitzky has almost receded into an earlier generation. This is an astonishing phenomenon, for there are many (even in Chicago) to recall that he was a great man.

What of Toscanini?

I think it is now clear that there is not a single conductor in the world who can be called his successor. He was a unique figure in a unique role, and when he retired it seemed historically impossible that any young man could appear to take his place. We thought of Toscanini as a contemporary, but he never really belonged to the musical world of the mid-20th Century. The composers were alien to him.

HIS FORTE WAS the classical literature of the century past and the new music of his youth, Richard Strauss, Debussy and Puccini. His link to Verdi made him a figure of immense authority in this literature, but many a lesser man has equaled his success with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Indeed, the fact that he played Gershwin, or (worse) Grofe rather than Hindemith, Stravinsky or Schoenberg shows us the gap in time. Toscanini needed to hear a tune. That may be the reason why the reputations of conductors sometimes die fast. The men have become living remnants of an artistic past years before their death. Stokowski's importance is surely due in large measure to the fact that he still is very much a part of today.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 177,755
JUL 3 1 1966

Concerts for Toscanini

Arturo Toscanini will be remembered in two Boston Symphony concerts on March 24 and 25, 1967. The Friday-Saturday pair of concerts will include the St. John Passion by Bach, according to Erich Leinsdorf, music director. Mr. Leinsdorf had a long personal association with Toscanini, and the orchestra's program book for March, 1967, will carry an article of personal recollections about the maestro.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 182,632
JUN 1 9 1966

Bushnell Roundup

36th Season Nears End

The Bushnell Memorial will close out its current season with eight major events scheduled for the final 12 days of this month.

First of this varied list of programs ending the Memorial's 36th season will be a recital at 3 p.m. today by the dance pupils of Helyn Flanagan.

West Hartford's Hall High School will have its graduation exercises in the Bushnell next Wednesday, and Conard High School, also of West Hartford, on Thursday.

On June 26, there will be a statewide observance of the 1000th anniversary of the introduction of Christianity to Poland, at 4 p.m. The same evening at 8:30 the Kiwanis Club of Hartford will present a concert by Gisele MacKenzie with the Jimmy Dorsey Band.

Hartford's three public high schools will have their commencement exercises in the Bushnell the last week of the month, Weaver on Tuesday, Bulkeley on Wednesday and HPHS on Thursday.

The new season will open with the Democratic State Convention scheduled for July 1 and 2.

New to Hartford

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has introduced several of the world's most celebrated musicians to Hartford as guest conductors, will do it again next season when it brings Rafael Kubelik. It was through the Boston orchestra that Leonard Bernstein made his first Hartford appearance, and that Pierre Monteux and Ernest Ansermet were brought here in recent years.

Maestro Kubelik will replace Erich Leinsdorf on the podium for the Boston Symphony concert scheduled for Jan. 23 when Leinsdorf will be vacationing.

So highly rated is Kubelik in Europe that for a number of years he has been selected to teach conducting at the Lucerne Festival. His career, however, has been international in scope.

Born 52 years ago in Bychory, Czechoslovakia, he was the son of celebrated violinist Jan Kubelik. After graduating from the Prague Conservatory he toured for two years as his father's piano accompanist, then became conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, at the age of 22. In 1948, with the Communist coup d'etat, he quit his native land.

In the past 15 years his activities have included three years as conductor of the Chicago Symphony, three as music director of the Royal Opera House in London, a number of years as regular conductor of Munich's principal orchestra, and guest-conducting stints with such ensembles as the Berlin Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, Amsterdam Concertgebouw, Pittsburgh Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra and others.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 56,795
OCT 3 0 1966

(A Look At the Arts

By E.J.D.

Boston Symphony to Present Two World Premieres

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present two world premieres in Boston during the first two weeks of November. The first of these, William Sydeman's "In Memoriam, John F. Kennedy," will receive its first performance in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon. The work, for orchestra and narrator, will include excerpts from Allen Nevins' introduction to the second volume of Kennedy's speeches; Stephen Spender's poem, "I Think Continually of Those Who Were Truly Great;" the old Testament book of Ecclesiastes; Arthur Schlesinger's "The Thousand Days;" Theodore Sorensen's "Kennedy," and from Kennedy's speeches themselves.

The second world premiere will be that of Elliott Carter's "First Piano Concerto," with Jacob Lateiner as soloist, in Symphony Hall on Friday, Nov. 11. In three movements, the work was commissioned by Mr. Lateiner as part of the Ford Foundation Program for Performing Musical Artists.

Both Mr. Sydeman and Mr. Carter will be present in Symphony Hall for the performance of their respective works.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,304
AUG 20 1966

Gabrielli Trio To Give Concert At Art Center

MANCHESTER, Vt. — An evening concert by the Gabrielli Trio, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the next musical event on the summer festival program at the Southern Vermont Art Center here Sunday at 8:30 p.m.

The program by Alfred Schneider, violin; Earl Hedberg, viola, and Richard Kapuscinski, cello, will include "Three Fantasies" by Gibbon, Mozart's duo for violin and viola, K. 424, and trio in C Minor, Opus 9, No. 3, by Beethoven.

Named for Violinist

In residence at the Boston Conservatory of Music and with extensive chamber music background, in addition to their work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trio takes its name from the master violin maker of Florence, Italy.

Only two other concerts remain on the SVA music series. On Sunday, Aug. 28, at 8:30 a group of young singers from Cardiff, Wales, known as the Polyphonic Choir, will return to present a concert of folk songs, madrigals, contemporary and sacred songs. The group is on a month's tour of Canada and the United States.

On Sunday, Sept. 4 at 8:30, SVA will present Peter Serkin in a piano recital.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 115,186
SEP 11 1966

Woolsey Hall Concert Series

Robert Shaw Chorale
Wednesday, April 5

Gianna d'Angelo, soprano, Oct. 18

Concertgebouw
Monday, May 1

George Szell, Cleveland Orchestra, Feb. 7

Boston's Kubelik
Tuesday, Jan. 24

1966-67 Season

Pittsburgh's Steinberg
Thursday, Nov. 3

Claudio Arrau, pianist, Nov. 22

With four of the world's major symphony orchestras featured, the return of a famous choral-orchestral group and two distinguished artists listed for solo performances, the 1966-67 Woolsey Hall Series is expected to be an exciting one.

The orchestras will be the Boston, Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Concertgebouw of Amsterdam. The choral-orchestral group is the Robert Shaw Chorale and Orchestra, and the soloists Gianna d'Angelo, Connecticut's soprano gift to the Metropolitan Opera, and Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist.

The dates of the concerts will be as follows: Tuesday, October 18, Gianna d'Angelo; Thursday, November 3, Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra; Tuesday, November 22, Claudio Arrau; Tuesday, January 24, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Tuesday, February 7, Cleveland Orchestra; Wednesday, April 5, Robert Shaw Chorale and Orchestra; Monday, May 1, Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam.

The forthcoming series marks the first time that four major symphonies have been engaged for the Woolsey Hall Series during a single season. In fact, outside of the Carnegie Hall Series of Visiting Orchestras in New York, the local series will be the only one in the country to present this quartet of great orchestras.

Special attention will no doubt be focused on the conductors, three of whom have never appeared on the Yale podium. William Steinberg will do the conducting honors for the Pittsburgh, which is making its first visit here; Rafael Kubelik, conductor of the Munich (Germany) Symphony Orchestra is coming to this country to direct the Bostonians during their January concerts, and Bernard Haitnik is the regular conductor of the Concertgebouw, which will give only a few concerts in the United States while enroute to Canada to open the Montreal World's Fair May 17-18-19. Only dynamic George Szell, who as usual will be at the Cleveland helm, is familiar to local music lovers.

The Robert Shaw Chorale and Orchestra, consisting of sixty-eight singers and instrumentalists, has appeared on the Woolsey Hall Series five times under its distinguished leader. With over one hundred releases on the RCA Victor label, the group is probably the best known chorus in the world.

This season will be the third time here for Claudio Arrau, the first in the 1943-44 season, and again on the 1954-55 program. Today his name is renowned in every music center of the world — from London to Berlin, to Tel-Aviv, to Sidney and back to New York where, in the opening season of Philharmonic Hall at the Lincoln Center of Performing Arts, he played no less than four sold out all-Beethoven recitals.

Gianna d'Angelo is a newcomer to the New Haven musical scene, although she has been on the Met roster since her sensational debut in "Rigoletto" on April 5, 1961, which brought from the New York World-Telegram critic the comment, "A new star is born at the Metropolitan."

Born in Hartford and reared in Bristol, Miss d'Angelo is the first Connecticut born artist from the Met to sing here since our own Charles Kullman several years ago, and the first native woman singer since Rosa Ponselle in 1931. Her Metropolitan Opera period for the coming season has been set by Manager Bing from December 3 to January 14.

The coming season for the Woolsey Hall Series is the thirty-eighth, the last twenty-two of which have been sold out by subscription before the opening concert, a record not enjoyed by any other concert series in the United States.

METUCHEN, N. J.
RECORDER
W. 7,000
JUNE 2 3 1966

The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, a French baritone and a Greek pianist will be among those who will help celebrate the 50th season of the Rutgers University Gymnasium Concert Series during the 1966-67 academic year.

The golden anniversary series will be part of an 11-event concert schedule, including a special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Voorhees Chapel Series at Douglass College.

The Pittsburgh Symphony will open the Gymnasium Series October 31. The Robert Shaw Chorale and Orchestra, Robert Shaw conductor, will conclude the series next spring, May 8.

In between, the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Rudolf Barshai, will play November 30, French baritone Gerard Souzay will perform February 14 and Gina Bachauer, Greek pianist, will play April 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rutgers University Choir will appear in a special concert March 2. The program will be featured by a performance of "Et Occidentem Illustra," a work by Robert W. Moevs, Rutgers' associate professor of music, commissioned for the Rutgers Bicentennial. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony. The Rutgers Choir will be directed by F. Austin Walter.

The Drolc String Quartet, a Yugoslav ensemble, will open the Voorhees Chapel Series October 17. Julian Bream, guitarist and lutenist, will follow on November 17, the Early Music Quartet on December 8, the Netherlands Chamber Choir on February 2 and Evelyne Crochet, young

235

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,404

SEP 8 1966

Young Music Stars a 'National Treasure'

President and Mrs. Johnson receive Moscow Music Festival winners from U.S. at the White House. From left: Simon Estes, baritone; Misha Dichter, pianist; Van Cliburn, previous Moscow piano winner, who was master of ceremonies; Mrs. Johnson; Jane Marsh, soprano; Mr. Johnson; Veronica Tyler, soprano and Stephen Kates, cellist.

Winners At Moscow Honored

PAGE ONE

OP WINNER of International music competition in Moscow, Jane Marsh, congratulated at White House by President Johnson. (UPI)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838

SEP 8 1966

LBJ Hails Top Musical Diplomats

WASHINGTON, (AP) — President Johnson hailed 13 young American musicians—winners of an international competition in Moscow—for doing more than diplomats to inspire understanding between the United States and Russia.

He bestowed the title "National Treasures" on the winners last night before a White House audience that included some of the elite of America's world of music and the performing arts. With Russia's minister counselor, Alexander I Zinchuk, in a front row East Room seat, Johnson declared:

"I hope history will record this example of how music has reached across the oceans, the walls and the ideologies that separate us, and found response in the hearts of the Russian people. I hope that it will be followed by other actions in other fields so that other threads of understanding can be strung across the space between us."

Afterwards, mingling at a buffet supper in the state dining room, diplomat Zinchuk said Johnson's remarks were "very true."

Five of the winners—three singers, a pianist and a cellist—staged an hour-long concert, receiving ovations from the 350 White House guests and congratulations from the Johnsons and pianist Van Cliburn, winner of the International Tchaikovsky competition when it was inaugurated in 1958.

Cliburn, 34, of Longview, Tex., was cast in a new role—master of ceremonies.

Star of the evening was statuesque soprano Jane Marsh, 24, of Mill Valley, Calif., and New York, who won first prize in the vocal division of the Moscow competition—the first American to receive that honor.

In his brief speech, Mr. Johnson said Miss Marsh and her colleagues "have done what few statesmen on earth can do. In the briefest time, in a foreign land with which we have great differences, you lifted the eyes of men beyond the things which make us adversaries to the things which make us brothers: to the hunger of all men for beauty; the respect of all men for excellence; the delight of all men in art."

Amid all the emphasis on excellence, the White House stage lighting failed and the President had to make his speech in a darkened ballroom.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was cast in a special role, serving as piano accompanist for 29-year-old soprano Veronica Tyler of Baltimore, a second-place winner in the vocal competition.

The other six winners, who had a front row seat with the Johnsons, were:

—Pianists Edward Auer of Los Angeles and James Dick of Hutchinson, Kan., who had tied for fifth prize winners in the piano competition.

—Violinists Erick Friedman of West Orange, N.J., and Charles Castleman of Braintree, Mass., sixth and eighth place winners respectively in the violin competition.

—Cellists Laurence D. Lesser of Los Angeles who took a fourth prize and Nathaniel K. Rosen, Pasadena, Calif., who was awarded a contest diploma.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,404

SEP 6 1966

Tanglewood Artists Perform Tomorrow At White House

The Americans who were among the winners of the Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow in August and who came directly to Tanglewood to appear in the Berkshire Festival programs are to play at the White House tomorrow night.

The first and second-place winners of the vocal competition were Jane Marsh and Veronica Tyler, respectively, both of whom had appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra previous to the contest. The second-place winner in the cellist competition was Stephen Kates and the winner of the analogous place in the piano class was Moshe Dichter.

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 240,562 SUN. 334,694

SEP 11 1966

Second Benefit Concert Slated September 18 At Art Museum

Four years ago the Portland Junior Symphony Association established an Endowment Fund to provide a solid economic base for the Orchestra's many-sided program. The first concert to benefit this fund was given at the Portland Art Museum with two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest artists: Doriot Dwyer, first flute, and Joseph Hearne, bass, an alumnus of the Portland Junior Symphony.

In the meantime the fund has grown to four times its original size and a second benefit concert will take place on Sunday, Sept. 18 at 5:30 p.m., also at the Art Museum. Admission to the concert is by invitation.

The program this time will feature guest artists who have been previously associated with the Orchestra. John Gibbens, former principal cellist, will play the Vivaldi Concerto No. 3 in A minor. At present he is the administrative assistant at the University of Oregon School of Music.

'Nardini' Scheduled

Mary Lou Speaker will play the Nardini Violin Concerto in E-minor. She returns to Portland after a Music Festival which is directed by Rudolf Serkin. Miss Speaker entered the Portland Junior Symphony in 1955 at the age of eleven and left it in 1963 having been soloist and serving as concertmaster for three seasons.

Both these concertos will be accompanied with a chamber ensemble from the Portland Junior Symphony consisting of 18 of the leading players who will open the program with the "Capriol" Suite by Peter Warlock.

Margaret Moore To Play

Margaret Moore will be heard in the Portland premiere of a work by Carl Beacher; Platero Suite. The music was written in appreciation of the book "Platero & I" by the Spanish poet and Nobel prizewinner, Jaun Ramon Jiminez.

Mr. Beacher is the "elder statesman" of the Junior Symphony's Board of Directors, and the endowment fund is largely the result of his creative counsel.

Margaret Moore will be remembered for her performance last May of Aaron Avshalomov's Piano Concerto which was recorded for Composers Recordings, Inc. of New York. She was also soloist with the Orchestra in 1955, when as a 15 year old student she performed the Chopin E minor Concerto.

The concert will be conducted by Jacob Avshalomov.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News (e)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 79,208

SEP 9 1966

Liked Reviews

To The Editor:

Camden

As a former Symphony orchestra player and handler of music for 60 years, it has been my good fortune to read the several reviews of chamber music and other concerts which Robert H. Newall wrote for your paper this summer.

Seldom does one find a reviewer who is not a member of a mutual admiration society but who writes in a discriminative and fearless manner. Mr. Newall is one such and stands out even among reviewers for large city papers in the respects just mentioned.

I know very well how touchy third and fourth rate musicians are, and how they ape the characteristic of genius that thinks everything they do is wonderful. Why, I have even heard Boston Symphony players say after a concert, "Boy, didn't we give that Overture a lousy performance!" Top notch performers, like top notch golfers have their bad days. It is the little squirts that never come up with such a confession and singers are the worst of all the squirts.

I found Mr. Newall fair, without grudge or malice, and I want next summer to read more of his reviews. My string quartet may be among them, and that won't get buttered, I am sure.

Robert C. Givler (Ret.)

The Courier-Journal
LOUISVILLE, KY.
D. 229,925 SUN. 338,841

SEP 26 1966

Music Review

Cellist Waxes Athletic, Heavy Arm Snaps String

Stephen Kates, cellist, assisted by Samuel Sanders, pianist; presented yesterday afternoon at Catherine Spalding College Center by Young Artists Promotions and Catherine Spalding College. The programs: Sonata in C major, by Boccherini; Four Fugitives, by Banshikov; Pezzo Capriccioso, by Tchaikovsky; Prelude from Suite No. 6 in D major, by Bach; Concerto for Cello, Opus 107, by Shostakovich.

By WILLIAM MOOTZ
Courier-Journal Critic

Cellist Stephen Kates, who made an impressive Louisville debut two years ago, returned for his second Louisville recital yesterday afternoon in Catherine Spalding College Center. Yesterday's program, like his debut two seasons ago, was sponsored by Young Artists Promotions, in cooperation with Catherine Spalding College.

When Kates first played here, he was a student of unusual promise. Yesterday, he returned as an international celebrity, a winner of last summer's Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow, and veteran of an appearance with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood that won him a story in Time magazine.

With this kind of flurry bursting about his career, it was good to see Kates buckle down to the task of honest music-making yesterday. Not only is he an artist of extraordinary gifts. He is a performer of appealing and modest stage deportment. A small audience greeted him with mounting enthusiasm.

Kates has studied with Gregor Piatigorsky, and there is more than a trace of the master tutor in the young disciple. Kates uses a wide vibrato in the Piatigorsky style, and sometimes bears down on the strings with a heaviness of right arm that is reminiscent of Piatigorsky's response to musical passion. A string even broke under the strain yesterday.

But Kates is also growing into an individual who is undoubtedly destined to leave his own mark on cello repertory. There is an exuberance in his playing that is tremendously exciting.

Kates was most impressive in works that called forth his reserves of virtuosity. His playing of Boccherini sonata was extremely romantic, and the Prelude from Bach's Sixth Solo Suite was more athletic than idiomatic. After a string broke near the end of the movement, Kates started over from the beginning. The second time through, the Prelude was more relaxed, and plagued less by slight deviations from true pitch.

Still, Kates was most involved with Banshikov's astringent "Four Fugitives," with Tchaikovsky's fleet Pezzo Capriccioso and, most especially, with Shostakovich's Cello Concerto. All demand bravura playing, and Kates was dazzling in all three.

Kates dedicated his performance of the concerto in honor of Shostakovich's 60th birthday, which fell yesterday. His intense explosive performance was fitting tribute to the veteran Soviet composer.

Samuel Sanders was Kates' accomplished associate at the piano. In response to audience acclaim, the young men offered two encores, an Adagio by Bach, and a Capriccio by Lucas Foss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 517,080
SEP 4 1966

Mme. Koussevitzky's fascinating sculpture of Sibelius at Symphony Hall interests Mrs. Lauriston Ward Jr. and Miss Dorothy Seccomb, co-chairmen of the Sept. 25 Deaconess Hospital benefit — an afternoon gala with Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic. Boston Symphony founder Henry Lee Higginson looks on from his gold-framed portrait. Left, ancient instruments offer background for contemporary music committee meeting — Mrs. David P. Boyd and Mrs. George Rohrbough of the Deaconess Friends. (Globe Photos by Joe Dennehy)

Getting a glimpse of Leonard Bernstein and the Philharmonic are committee members at Symphony Hall.

Help for the Deaconess

MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Once again, the "Friends" of the Deaconess, both as an organization and in the individual sense of the word, are pledging their help in expanding the hospital. They are trying to raise a quarter of a million dollars in the next five years toward enlarging the Central Building.

First benefit on their list is very special. Lawrence-born, Harvard graduate Leonard Bernstein, a student of Serge Koussevitzky's at the Berkshire Music Center and now conductor of the New York Philharmonic, will bring the orchestra to Boston on Sept. 25.

Composer Bernstein, who "loves Boston," where his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel J. Bernstein still live, is planning an unusual concert.

Chairman for the three o'clock gala at Symphony Hall is Mrs. Lauriston Ward Jr., who has come from her Summer home, "Pinetrees," Douglas Hill, Me., to complete plans with her co-chairman, Miss Dorothy Seccomb of Newton and ticket chairman Mrs. John Hill of Boston.

Honorary chairmen are Mme. Serge Koussevitzky and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf. Others of a representative and hard-working committee are Mrs. James T. Mountz, Mrs. David P. Boyd, Mrs. John H. Nichols Jr., Mrs. George Rohrbough, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. Richard S. Paige, Mrs. C. Cabell Bailey, Mrs. Allen P. Joslin and Mrs. Halfdan Lee.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
SEP 2 6 1966

Bernstein Was Born to Conduct Mahler

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The Richmond Celebrity Series began with a Sunday afternoon Symphony Hall concert by the New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein conducting. The program: Beethoven's "King Stephen" Overture, Copland's Dance Symphony, and the Mahler First.

The Boston Symphony, too, had begun its season with monumental Mahler in D, the Third, and it was interesting to be able to compare such different approaches to similar problems.

Leinsdorf with the Symphony was generally painstaking, hardly ever spontaneous and not often flexible, sometimes beautifully refined, rather inhibited, not quite commanding. Bernstein with the Philharmonic was full of abandon, eleastic, unsubtle, almost entirely convincing.

Bernstein was born to conduct Mahler. The flair for drama, the penchant toward the grandiose and the sentimental, the delight in the unexpected, the feeling for popular music, the internal contradictions, all these awaken sympathetic and intelligent response in Bernstein the conductor, probably by way of Bernstein the composer.

And he is a man, after all, with an extraordinary musical equipment. He has marvelous rhythm. It is an unaccustomed pleasure in Boston to hear a 4/4 measure with a full quota of 16 sixteenth notes, but one of the further pleasures is that within so firm and shapely a rhythmic context syncopations take on immense expressive power.

While the pressure tends to be high, there is a variation of intensity that gives life and breath to the music. In the largest rhythmic dimensions Bernstein's pacing of the work was generally clear and right, whether dealing with Mahler's tricky abruptions or the even more difficult gradual transitions.

One reservation about the performance concerns the Trio of the Scherzo which, best left simple, had a tortured espressivo imposed on it.

This tends to happen to Bernstein's performances of the more naive Mahler, the second movements of the Second and Third, for instance, and most of the Fourth, though one of the most beautifully realized passages in the First was the touchingly tender quotation from the "Wayfarer" Songs in the third movement.

Another reservation pertains to the disappointing underplaying, so surprising for Bernstein, of the Luftpause, the little gasp of silence, before the surprise return to the home key of D major in the finale, a rare instance of his missing the force of a dramatic gesture.

★

The first half of the program was fresh and delightful. "King Stephen" is maligned by everybody, but even if not the great piece one might expect from the period of the Seventh Symphony, it is an engaging one. It also has some thoroughly Beethovenian passages, and the opening with its descending fourths is arresting indeed. Bernstein conducted it well.

Copland's adapted the Dance Symphony in 1929 from a ballet he had worked on four to seven years earlier. Some of its derivations are a little naive, for example the silence-trill-crash ending from "Le Sacre," but obviously Nadia Boulanger had taught the young Copland an imposing command of craft as well as some Gallic mannerism. The Dance Symphony is already an altogether personal work, shaped and scored with assurance, and, too rarely encountered, it was a pleasure to hear. The performance was inclined to violence and tumult more than to clarity.

★

Player for player, the New York Philharmonic could be a very good orchestra. Its horns and trombones are first-rate, and so are the lower strings. The style of the solo woodwinds is mostly quite vulgar; the violin playing is an execrable noise. The total effect, the product of years of carelessness in the chairs and on the podium, is raucous. But if Sunday's concert brought a demonstration of the art of orchestral playing at a distressingly low ebb, Bernstein himself brought considerable excitment, and that, in the Huntington av. temple of tedium, is welcome.

At intermission, Leonard Bernstein was given a special Boston University citation for his services to music.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN (left) receives citation from B.U. Pres. Harold C. Case.
(Thomas Landers Photo)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Friday, September 2, 1966

JOSEPH F. RINELLO, who will teach instrumental music in the Eastchester elementary schools this year, was formerly instrumental music director for the Dover-Sherborn public-schools in Massachusetts. Mr. Rinello received his B.S. from Fredonia State Teachers College and his M.M. from the New England Conservatory of Music. He has played the French horn professionally with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler at Tanglewood.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100
SEPT 1966

. . . Charles Wilson is the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. He joined the New York City Opera Company in 1960, and has a repertoire of fourteen operas and operettas. He conducted two performances of Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte and Bizet's Carmen with the Cincinnati Opera Company this past summer . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 517,080
SEP 4 1966

Mme. Koussevitzky's fascinating sculpture of Sibelius at Symphony Hall interests Mrs. Lauriston Ward Jr. and Miss Dorothy Seccomb, co-chairmen of the Sept. 25 Deaconess Hospital benefit — an afternoon gala with Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic. Boston Symphony founder Henry Lee Higginson looks on from his gold-framed portrait. Left, ancient instruments offer background for contemporary music committee meeting — Mrs. David P. Boyd and Mrs. George Rohrbough of the Deaconess Friends. (Globe Photos by Joe Dennehy)

Getting a glimpse of Leonard Bernstein and the Philharmonic are committee members at Symphony Hall.

Help for the Deaconess

MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Once again, the "Friends" of the Deaconess, both as an organization and in the individual sense of the word, are pledging their help in expanding the hospital. They are trying to raise a quarter of a million dollars in the next five years toward enlarging the Central Building.

First benefit on their list is very special. Lawrence-born, Harvard graduate Leonard Bernstein, a student of Serge Koussevitzky's at the Berkshire Music Center and now conductor of the New York Philharmonic, will bring the orchestra to Boston on Sept. 25.

Composer Bernstein, who "loves Boston," where his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel J. Bernstein still live, is planning an unusual concert.

Chairman for the three o'clock gala at Symphony Hall is Mrs. Lauriston Ward Jr., who has come from her Summer home, "Pinetrees," Douglas Hill, Me., to complete plans with her co-chairman, Miss Dorothy Seccomb of Newton and ticket chairman Mrs. John Hill of Boston.

Honorary chairmen are Mme. Serge Koussevitzky and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf. Others of a representative and hard-working committee are Mrs. James T. Mountz, Mrs. David P. Boyd, Mrs. John H. Nichols Jr., Mrs. George Rohrbough, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. Richard S. Paige, Mrs. C. Cabell Bailey, Mrs. Allen P. Joslin and Mrs. Halfdan Lee.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
SEP 26 1966

Bernstein Was Born to Conduct Mahler

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The Richmond Celebrity Series began with a Sunday afternoon Symphony Hall concert by the New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein conducting. The program: Beethoven's "King Stephen" Overture, Copland's Dance Symphony, and the Mahler First.

The Boston Symphony, too, had begun its season with monumental Mahler in D, the Third, and it was interesting to be able to compare such different approaches to similar problems.

Leinsdorf with the Symphony was generally painstaking, hardly ever spontaneous and not often flexible, sometimes beautifully refined, rather inhibited, not quite commanding. Bernstein with the Philharmonic was full of abandon, eleastic, unsubtle, almost entirely convincing.

Bernstein was born to conduct Mahler. The flair for drama, the penchant toward the grandiose and the sentimental, the delight in the unexpected, the feeling for popular music, the internal contradictions, all these awaken sympathetic and intelligent response in Bernstein the conductor, probably by way of Bernstein the composer.

And he is a man, after all, with an extraordinary musical equipment. He has marvelous rhythm. It is an unaccustomed pleasure in Boston to hear a 4/4 measure with a full quota of 16 sixteenth notes, but one of the further pleasures is that within so firm and shapely a rhythmic context syncopations take on immense expressive power.

While the pressure tends to be high, there is a variation of intensity that gives life and breath to the music. In the largest rhythmic dimensions Bernstein's pacing of the work was generally clear and right, whether dealing with Mahler's tricky abruptions or the even more difficult gradual transitions.

One reservation about the performance concerns the Trio of the Scherzo which, best left simple, had a tortured espressivo imposed on it.

This tends to happen to Bernstein's performances of the more naive Mahler, the second movements of the Second and Third, for instance, and most of the Fourth, though one of the most beautifully realized passages in the First was the touchingly tender quotation from the "Wayfarer" Songs in the third movement.

Another reservation pertains to the disappointing underplaying, so surprising for Bernstein, of the Luftpause, the little gasp of silence, before the surprise return to the home key of D major in the finale, a rare instance of his missing the force of a dramatic gesture.

★

The first half of the program was fresh and delightful. "King Stephen" is maligned by everybody, but even if not the great piece one might expect from the period of the Seventh Symphony, it is an engaging one. It also has some thoroughly Beethovenian passages, and the opening with its descending fourths is arresting indeed. Bernstein conducted it well.

Copland's adapted the Dance Symphony in 1929 from a ballet he had worked on four to seven years earlier. Some of its derivations are a little naive, for example the silence-trill-crash ending from "Le Sacre," but obviously Nadia Boulanger had taught the young Copland an imposing command of craft as well as some Gallic mannerism. The Dance Symphony is already an altogether personal work, shaped and scored with assurance, and, too rarely encountered, it was a pleasure to hear. The performance was inclined to violence and tumult more than to clarity.

★

Player for player, the New York Philharmonic could be a very good orchestra. Its horns and trombones are first-rate, and so are the lower strings. The style of the solo woodwinds is mostly quite vulgar; the violin playing is an execrable noise. The total effect, the product of years of carelessness in the chairs and on the podium, is raucous. But if Sunday's concert brought a demonstration of the art of orchestral playing at a distressingly low ebb, Bernstein himself brought considerable excitment, and that, in the Huntington av. temple of tedium, is welcome.

At intermission, Leonard Bernstein was given a special Boston University citation for his services to music.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN (left) receives citation from B.U. Pres. Harold C. Case.
(Thomas Landers Photo)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Friday, September 2, 1966

JOSEPH F. RINELLO, who will teach instrumental music in the Eastchester elementary schools this year, was formerly instrumental music director for the Dover-Sherborn public-schools in Massachusetts. Mr. Rinello received his B.S. from Fredonia State Teachers College and his M.M. from the New England Conservatory of Music. He has played the French horn professionally with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops under Arthur Fiedler at Tanglewood.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100
SEPT 1966

. . Charles Wilson is the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. He joined the New York City Opera Company in 1960, and has a repertoire of fourteen operas and operettas. He conducted two performances of Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte and Bizet's Carmen with the Cincinnati Opera Company this past summer . . .

237

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

OCT 1966

ARTIST LIFE

BY DORLE J. SORIA

THE NAME Mengelberg is back on the New York scene in the person of multitalented Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg, new president of the Mannes College of Music. Stefan, who is both mathematician and musician, is distantly related to Willem Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor with the Franz Hals face (red) and figure (round) who electrified New York Philharmonic audiences in the early Twenties. (It was the prohibition era and Mengelberg, who had a diplomatic passport, used to arrive with vast quantities of Holland gin in his trunks.) Stefan describes himself as a grand-nephew of Willem because he has never figured out the actual relationship; actually, the great conductor was Stefan's maternal grandfather's first cousin. Stefan, who was born in Heidelberg, knew "Uncle Willem" when he was a small boy. He used to spend summers in the country in his grandmother's house in Krefeld; Willem Mengelberg lived next door. Stefan came to this country in 1939. After serving with the U.S. Army in Korea he obtained his B.A. (summa cum laude) and M.S. degrees from New York University. He studied orchestral conducting both at Mannes College and at Juilliard. In 1959-60 he was one of Leonard Bernstein's assistants at the New York Philharmonic; the next two years he was music director of the St. Louis Philharmonic. He then decided to retire from conducting. His last public appearance was with the Philharmonic in January 1964, when he directed the world premiere of Stefan Wolpe's Symphony No. 1. He has taught philosophy and mathematics at various institutions, including Columbia University, where he is now working on a research project under a grant from the Ford Foundation to develop a computer-controlled process for music printing. When we spoke to him in August he was leaving for the State

Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg.

University of New York at Binghamton (Harpur College, which has the Guarneri String Quartet as a quartet-in-residence) to join a workshop-seminar where he was to introduce to musicologists the use of the computer as a tool in music analysis. For Mannes College—of which he is not only an alumnus but a former staff member—Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg plans "organic but not revolutionary changes." We asked this prodigious young president how old he was. "Thirty-nine, like Jack Benny," he said.

Tanglewood Tales

We went to the Sunday afternoon Tanglewood concert when the three American singers who had won prizes at the Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow appeared: Jane Marsh and Veronica Tyler (both wore long yellow dresses, both looked ravishing) and Simon Estes [for a look at the threesome, see this month's "Musical Whirl"]. Afterwards CAMI, the artists' management, gave a garden cocktail party at the Lenox Club. We introduced first-prize winner Jane Marsh to Olga Koussevitzky, who praised the soprano's Russian pronunciation in the difficult Letter Scene from Eugene Onegin. "We will have lunch together and we will talk Russian," said Mme. Koussevitzky in her soft, persuasive voice. Twenty-four-year-old Jane Marsh is a real Californian, who could as easily have won prizes in sports as in music. Her swimming is so good that she almost tried out for the last Olympic team, and she is a fine horsewoman. But she doesn't ride in New York City's Central Park. "Those stable horses are all brain-washed," she says. Statuesque, with brown hair and blue eyes and a warm, outgoing personality, Jane is made to be a Brünnhilde or that Girl of the Golden West. But will she put up with those brain-washed theatre horses?

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf was, of course, there—the center of attention shifting as he moved from group to group. He told us that his elder daughter Hester (who the summer before last had seemed all set for a ballerina's life) had spent the past summer working at the Stockbridge theatre. She was now helping in production, he said, but she had started as a "gopher." We repeated: "Gopher?" "Yes, you know," explained the Maestro. "A Go-for Girl. Go-for coffee. Go-for paint. Go-for this. Go-for that." We understood, wishing we could have a "Go-for" too.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

John N. Burk

Program Editor Retires; At Symphony Since 1918

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

On its third page the Boston Symphony's concert program has for years carried the words "with historical and descriptive notes by JOHN N. BURK." When the new season opened nine days ago that was missing, and a few pages further on one could read a little notice of John Burk's retirement "after 48 years of devoted service to the Boston Symphony."

Reading on, one learned that Burk, born in San Jose, Calif., and Harvard '16, came to Symphony Hall as publicity director after a brief stint as assistant to H.T.P. on the Transcript. He became program annotator and editor in 1934 on the death of Philip Hale. There was also mention made of his books on Mozart, Beethoven and Clara Schumann, and of his work in editing the Burrell collection of Wagner letters.

By his writing, John Burk has earned the gratitude, not just of the Boston Symphony, but of that orchestra's large public. We have, all of us, been the beneficiaries of his conscientious scholarship and his fastidious style.

John Burk is a writer. That is, he is not merely a person capable of achieving coherent and literate prose, though that is in itself valuable and by no means to be taken for granted in his profession, but he is a man sensitive to wards, to their precise meanings, and to their most subtly elusive flavors as well. Proceeding from a clear and disciplined intellect, his essays are shapely and forceful.

The task which John Burk has performed for so long at the highest level of competence, and often with distinction, is important and it is difficult. First, there should be accurate vital statistics about the piece, its date and circumstances of composition. Where there are problems about variant versions, say, in Bach's St. John Passion, Handel's Messiah, the Bruckner and Mahler symphonies, or in many of Stravinsky's scores, these should be clarified.

After that, the interpretation of just what the program annotator's job is becomes more subjective. It is the function of the writer's good sense, imagination, and taste, to determine what he can say that will be illuminating to the reader. The purpose, after all, is to enable the reader to be a better listener, perhaps by pointing out this detail or that relationship which he might miss on his own, perhaps by placing the individual work into a broader context within whose frame it can be more richly and interestingly understood.

Notes can help, but they can also be a distraction and a nuisance. They do mischief if they concentrate on offering a blow-by-blow description of a composition's progress: The principal theme is announced by the clarinet against a syncopated accompaniment in the lower strings, then restated by the trumpet with . . . that sort of thing. The listener who cannot hear that is not helped by the redundancy of verbal description. The listener who can is likely to be distracted into using the program notes as a kind of checklist and, as a result, not to attend to the events between the readily described high points as duly catalogued in the notes.

Writers like to be read. John Burk is no exception, but it always distressed him to see people reading while music was being played. There is always some bored person idly leafing through the program and coming suddenly across "I'm sure Father would have wanted me to have a Rolls," ready to chuckle over it in one of the silences of Leonore No. 2, but what really appalled Burk is the thought of his notes getting in the way of the music by being used as a kind of substitute. Anyone who goes to concerts much is familiar with the member of the audience who suddenly goes into a frenzy of page-flipping in search of enlightenment, never thinking that the only relevant, indeed the only possible source of enlightenment at that moment is the sound coming off the stage.

The time for program notes is before and after the performance. Perhaps John Burk can take some of the credit for the Boston Symphony audience's tendency to arrive quite early for concerts. I also believe that to some extent that if an audience leaves a small number of programs behind in the house, that, too is an index of the annotator's success, and there again John Burk scores high.

What of the future? For the Boston Symphony there is more than the self-evident responsibility of appropriately filling the gap left by John Burk's retirement. The Boston Symphony has a responsibility to its own standards and traditions in this field. Since the days of Philip Hale, who began furnishing "historical and descriptive notes" in 1901, the Boston Symphony has provided the criterion by which such things are judged.

The appointment of John Burk's friend and associate Donald T. Gammons to "act as program editor" is, one presumes, not offered as a long-term solution. The Symphony will, let us hope, search hard for someone completely professional as musician and writer. And, to enter a special plea, it should be someone competent in contemporary music, for that area, one where audiences can especially use sympathetic guidance, offers the one cause of complaint about the notes of recent years, for they have tended to be skimpy and not even completely dependable as to facts.

Finally, to John Burk, along with a renewed expression of appreciation, go our good wishes for the future. This may be the time for him to return to the useful task of bringing M. A. DeWolfe Howe's history of the Boston Symphony up to date again.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 51,098

SEP 13 1966

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Boston can never be called dull! Whatever type of entertainment you prefer, or whatever cause is nearest to your heart, there is something for everyone being offered this fall. Whether it be serious to improve your mind, or fun for fun's sake, you can take your pick and spend your time doing something different every day.

A glance at the social calendar shows that it is rapidly filling up for the remainder of this month, and for October. The unofficial opening of the season is the start of the Friday afternoon concerts at Symphony. This means that "everyone" is back from the country and seashore, and ready to be caught up in the winter whirl of activities.

This year the opening is a week earlier that last, and the [illegible] will be on Sept. 23. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, who is starting his fifth season with the [illegible] Orchestra, has announced that the orchestra will perform Mahler's "Third Symphony" at the opening concert.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

OCT 21 1966

MUSIC

SILVERSTEIN

Bos[redacted]n, 33, raised [redacted]op three or concertmasters in the world. That [redacted]me achiev[redacted] view of the fact [redacted]e was [redacted] from Philadelphia's [redacted]s Institut[redacted] was too dis[redacted]d by girls and baseball"). Silver[redacted] is one of the few concertmasters [redacted]k his way up from the ranks; he [redacted]ined the Boston string section in 1955, [redacted]cended to the first chair in 1962. [redacted]oston Symphony Conductor Erich [redacted]orl: "He has some sort of beam [redacted]ntenna, so that he knows what I [redacted] almost before I do."

[redacted] good concertmaster is as rare as [redacted] humble conductor. He is indispensa[redacted]le to a conductor's success and, as such, [redacted]s guarded and pampered like a mistress. [redacted]ir John Barbirolli refers to his man as [redacted]his "chief of staff," Eugene Ormandy's [redacted] his "mind reader," William Steinberg's his "seismograph," Donald Johanos' his "stroke oar."

A concertmaster is all that and more, relying on a sixth sense to translate the ideas of the conductor to the musicians. He derives his authority from the simple fact that he can play better than anyone else in the orchestra, sets the standard that the rest of the players are expected to live up to. He plays all the important violin solos in an orchestral piece, and, indeed, ought to be so familiar with the literature that he can substitute at the last minute for an absent violin soloist. He is also responsible for keeping everyone in tune, determines the proper bowing for the strings, an all-important factor in correct phrasing. When the maestro wiggles a meaningful finger, the con[redacted] and in [redacted]ad [redacted] players [redacted] orchestra. [redacted] is a subconductor, able, and often compelled, to rescue the maestro when he misses an entrance or loses his place. Ravel was such a notoriously bad conductor that soloists who were condemned to play under his baton sometimes made a secret pact to take all their cues from the concertmaster. Says Leinsdorf: "If you have a good concertmaster, you don't have to move your left arm so much."

Switch, Switch. A concertmaster's influence is so strong, in fact, that by his example he can alter the entire sound of an orchestra. The suavity and elegance of Nadien's playing, for example, have already given his string section a correspondingly new tone. Beyond that, the concertmaster helps decide promotions, auditions, prospective new players, and acts as a father confessor as well as a liaison between the men and the maestro. Barbirolli says that the Italian appellation for concertmaster, violino di spalla, is more apropos: "His is the shoulder that the conductor leans on."

Or anybody else who happens to be onstage. During a Cleveland Orchestra concert six months ago, the E string on Soloist Isaac Stern's violin suddenly snapped in the final movement of a Brahms concerto. Concertmaster Druian quickly gave Stern his Stradivarius, passed the disabled instrument to Assistant Concertmaster Daniel Majeske and continued playing on Majeske's violin. Majeske replaced the string and—switch, switch—Stern finished with a flourish on his fiddle, having missed only one measure of music. Says Druian, with the understatement typical of the supercool concertmaster: "It's all part of the job."

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

OCT 20 1966

Orchestra Cancels U.N. Concert Here

THE FIVE-MAN negotiating committee of the Philadelphia Orchestra has refused to interrupt the orchestra's current strike to play for the United Nations Day concert scheduled for Monday, Oct. 24, in Constitution Hall.

Gerald Wagner, Washington representative for the UN Association, said Tuesday, "It is incomprehensible that the Philadelphia Orchestra Association and the committee negotiating for the musicians cannot agree to play the Sixth Annual United Nations Day concert scheduled for Oct. 24. 82 chiefs of diplomatic missions and their wives have accepted the invitation of the Secreatary of State to be present."

Wagner continued, "Vice President Humphrey will speak at the concert which is under the patronage of President and Mrs. Johnson."

He concluded, "Regardless of whether or not the Philadelphia Orchestra plays, there will be a United Nations Concert and it will be magnificent."

A report from Philadelphia pointed out that it was not the Orchestra Association that could not agree to play. Nor was the decision made by a vote of the entire orchestra, but by the Musicians Union and the negotiating committee which is made up of five members of the orchestra.

The strike, now in its fourth week, has resulted in the cancellation of the regular concerts of the orchestra in Philadelphia and New York. The first program in the Philadelphia's regular Constitution Hall series is set for Monday, Oct. 31.

Following Wagner's statement that there would be a United Nations concert on the 24th, there was speculation as to whether, for example, the Boston Symphony Orchestra members would agree to play in place of the striking Philadelphians, thus putting themselves in the position of strike-breaking.

While the question had not been raised officially, the unofficial presumption was that no other orchestra would agree to play while the Philadelphia strike was in progress.

WILLIAMSVILLE, N. Y.
AMHERST BEE
W. 7,500

OCT 13 1966

WILLIS PAGE

Page Will Conduct

PAGE ONE

Willis Page, music director of the Nashville (Tenn) Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Amherst Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the auditorium of Amherst Central Junior High School, Kings Highway, Snyder, at 3:00 p.m. Sunday, Oct. 23. The concert will be open to the public.

Before coming to Buffalo in 1955, Mr. Page conducted concerts and recordings in Boston. A protege of Pierre Monteux, he was guest conductor of the Boston Pops and Esplanade Concerts and conductor of the Cecelia Society Chorus. In 1953 he became music director of the New Orchestral Society of Boston, composed entirely of members of the Boston Symphony, making hi-fi records that received high praise from critics.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.
VISITOR
W. 843,142 COMB.CIRC.OF ALL EDITIONS (C)

OCT 16 1966

World Famous Musicians

Concert Season at SJU Announced

COLLEGEVILLE, Minn. — Saint John's University will begin its 1966-67 concert season on October 18th with a concert by world famous organist Berj Zamkochian

Jean Madeira and Prof. Track from the Boston Symphony, at 8:30 p.m. in the Abbey and University Church.

Mr. Zamkochian will be accompanied by 60 string-players of the Metropolitan Youth Symphony of Minneapolis in Poulenc's Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani.

He returned recently from a successful concert tour in the Soviet Union, his second trip there in two years.

The Metropolitan Youth Symphony is now in its third year under the direction of Mr. Gerhard Track of the Saint John's Music Department.

Ibes will present his annual piano

On November 8th, Mr. Willem recital at 8:30 p.m. in the SJU Auditorium. He will play Bach's Prelude and Fugue in c minor from Well-tempered Clavier Book I, Beethoven's Sonata in c minor, opus 111, Berg's Sonata, and Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exposition.

Mr. Ibes, a resident instructor in music at Saint John's, is a native of Nijmegen, The Netherlands where he began his music studies at the young age of 12. He has been on the University faculty since 1957.

The choirs of the College of St. Cathrine, St. Paul, and Saint John's will perform jointly in a "John F. Kennedy Memorial Concert" on November 22 at 8:30 p.m. in the Abbey and University Church. Mr. Track will conduct the ensemble as they sing Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass and Track's own Kennedy-Cantata.

World famous contra-alto Jean Madeira of the Metropolitan Opera, New York, will give a concert together with the Saint John's Symphony Orchestra and the Men's Chorus on December 2 in the University gymnasium at 8:30 p.m. In the first part of the program, Miss Madeira will perform the Alto-Rhapsody by Brahms and The Serenade by Schubert. Following intermission, she will perform with the orchestra highlights from Bizet's Carmen.

Miss Madeira gained wide acclaim while performing with the Vienna State Opera in the 1950's. She has recently returned to the U.S. from Munich, Germany, where she sang at the Munich Opera-Festival, 1966.

BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN, right, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Gerhard Track.

On Thursday, February 2, Miss Micaela Maiart-Track and Mr. Willem Ibes will present a duo-piano recital in the SJU Auditorium at 8:30 p.m. Both popular artists will combine their talents featuring some of the works of Mozart, Schubert, Brahms, Stravinsky, Poulenc and Gerhard Track.

The Augsburg College Choir of Minneapolis will make an appearance in the Abbey and University Church at Saint John's on Thursday, February 9 at 8:30 p.m. The Choir, under the baton of Leland B. Sateren, will present a concert of sacred music. Last year the group made its first European tour giving concerts in West Germany and Scandinavia.

The Saint John's University Men's Chorus will perform two home concerts on March 1 and 2, following its first concert tour on the west coast. They will sing a program of sacred and secular works, folksongs and spirituals. The time is set for 8:30 p.m. in the SJU Auditorium.

The University Concert Band under the direction of Mr. Frank Herring will give its annual home concert on April 4. Mr. Herring is the chairman of the Music Department at Saint John's and the national president of Catholic Bandmasters Asociation.

Admission will be free on the following concert dates: October 18; November 8 & 22; February 9; and April 4. Tickets for the remaining concerts may be purchased at St. John's Box Office.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.
VISITOR
W. 843,142 COMB.CIRC.OF ALL EDITIONS (C)

OCT 16 1966

ANAHEIM, CALIF.
BULLETIN
D. 17,500

OCT 1 1966

Boston Symphony Organist To Perform In Abbey Church

On Tuesday, Oct. 18, at 8:30 p.m., the famous American organist, Berj Zamkochian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert in the Abbey Church at St. John's University, Collegeville. There is no admission charge.

Berj Zamkochian will be accompanied by sixty string players of the Metropolitan Youth Orchestra from Minneapolis under the direction of Gerhard Track, in Foulenc's Concerto for organ, strings and timpani. In the first part of the program, Mr. Zamkochian will perform Handel's Organ Concerto No. 2 in B flat Major. Between the two major works he will be heard in a solo recital. Included in this section will be the world premiere performance of a new composition by Gerhard Track: "Festival Prelude and Liturgy, arranged for organ by B. Zamkochian.

1. Hymn of Vesting
2. The Lord's Prayer.

Festival Prelude and Fugue in D minor, (dedicated to B. Zamkochian.

DEDICATION — Berj Zamkachian, organist of the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras, will be guest organist at the Oct. 8 dedication of a new organ in the Faith Lutheran Church, 2219 W. Orange Ave., Anaheim. Dedication rites are scheduled at 8 p.m.

Conservatory of Music where he studied organ with George Faxon. During his years of graduate study at the same school, he was appointed a member of the Organ Faculty. His musical accomplishments since his graduation have been many and numerous. At the age of twenty-six he was appointed Organist of the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra; a post which he has held for the past nine years. Nine years ago, he signed his first recording contract with RCA Victor Records. This year recitals will take him throughout the United States, Mexico, Europe and Asia.

In 1965, Berj Zamkochian became distinguished as the first American Organist to tour the Soviet Union. During the tour he played concerts in Moscow, Leningrad and Erevan. The Soviet News Agency Tass said of his Moscow concert ". . . There is about Berj Zamkochian, the American born Armenian Organist, a powerful magnetic musical personality that makes an immediate communication with each and every person in his audience. Playing his entire program without the assistance of printed page or person, he showed himself truly the master of this very difficult instrument. Furthermore he revealed a musical and coloristic approach to the instrument we never before had known."

The Soviet Union immediately invited Mr. Zamkochian to perform during the 1966 Concert Season and he will be featured as one of the guest artists of the Centennial Celebration of the Tchaikovsky Conservatory.

Mr. Zamkochian has also been the recipient of distinctive honors from Pope Paul VI and Cardinal Agagianian. Most recently Berj Zamkochian received the "Knighthood of St. Vartan." He is a dedicated church musician. He serves as Director of Music at St. Theresa's church, West Roxbury, Massachusetts; Director of Music at Catholic Memorial High School, also in West Roxbury; and lecturer in Music at Regis College, Weston, Massachusetts.

Mr. Zamkochian has recorded with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in addition to the Poulenc Organ Concerto, the Organ Symphony of Camille Saint — Saens, Symphony No. 3. He has also recorded for Gregorian Institute of America.

239

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Friday, November 18, 1966 047

No Fractures, X-Ray Says Of Violin Bow

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BINGHAMTON PRESS
Friday, November 18, 1966 047

My Diagnosis Is: Bow(ed), But Not Bent

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 20,016
NOV 19 1966

'Ailing' Violin Bow X-rayed

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 132,266
NOV 18 1966

Bow . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sentinel (e)
ANSONIA, Conn.
Circ. 15,929
NOV 18 1966

Only a Scratch, No Fracture

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200 - year - old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and ask- Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X - ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X - ray; returned with the diagnosis: "Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 12,703
NOV 21 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News-Times (e)
DANBURY, Conn.
Circ. 26,024
NOV 18 1966

Violin X-Ray, 'No Fracture'

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 9,367
NOV 18 1966

EMERGENCY DIAGNOSIS

BOSTON (AP)— Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray, returned with the diagnosis: "Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508
NOV 18 1966

WITH OUR COMPLIMENTS . . .

Although this clipping is beyond your order we thought it would interest you.

Please accept it with our compliments.

Sincerely, 047

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP AGENCY, INC.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN
Me.
Circ. 13,792
NOV 18 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 29,049
NOV 18 1966

Violin Bow X-Rayed; No Fracture Found

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times-Argus (e)
BARRE, Vermont
Circ. 11,593
NOV 18 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 94,357
NOV 18 1966

How to Keep in Tune

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray and returned the diagnosis:

"Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687
NOV 4 1966

ALL HAIL!

I can only applaud the Metropolitan Opera management for adopting, at its new home in New York's Lincoln Center, a rule barring latecomers until the first natural break, such as an intermission, once a performance has started. Some 30 who showed up late for an hour-and-40-minute one-act opera a few nights back had a real wait before they were seated — and how at least some of them must have fumed!

The Boston Symphony has a similar rule. I know because I got hung up by it once, through no fault of my own but because of a breakdown in the Boston subway system. Among my fellow latecomers cooling their heels in the lobby I saw, and chatted with, a college classmate who was, and still is, a member of the BSO board of directors. If he could take the wait gracefully — and he did — certainly none of the rest of us had a legitimate kick. So all hail the Met and its new rule!

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677
NOV 11 1966

Koussevitzky's widow at concert

Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed Boston Symphony conductor, will attend the Sunday afternoon concert at Newark's Symphony Hall to hear the All-State Orchestra and Chorus perform a work which was commissioned two decades ago by the Koussevitzky, Music Foundation.

Mme. Koussevitzky will be the guest of Kenneth Schermerhorn, director of the New Jersey Symphony, who will conduct this selective student orchestra and chorus. Schermerhorn once studied with her husband, Serge Koussevitzky, who was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc. Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838
NOV 17 1966

MUSICAL X-RAY?—Fearing that his 200-year-old French violin bow was cracked, Michael Sasson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought it to Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician at Beth Israel Hospital for X-rays. Fortunately the suspected crack turned out to be only a scratch.

ow Unbowed After X-Ray

WALPOLE, FRIDAY, NOV. 18, 1966

other day to ask an "emergency diagnosis" from Dr. Peter Lavender, neuro-radiologist and Louis Baizman chief radiology technician.

ing interest — no" as Hippocrates — and of course, they [illegible] if they could see the [illegible] of at least two centuries [illegible] age.

. Sasson was agreeable. So opened his violin case and [illegible] them the patient.

"Ah," said one of the young [illegible] to his colleague, "note the arched modeling of the belly and back and the nice shallow [illegible] the arching of the belly is both transversal and longitudinal."

"True, true," said the other young intern. "But do look there, Doctor, and note the artistic unity of the opposed curves. I'm sure you know, Doctor, that the tuning of the violoncello is one octave below the viola, while the normal double bass approximately covers the suboctave of the violoncello."

[illegible] to M. Sasson and asked [illegible] the patient a Stradivarius, an Amati or a Maggini?"

The artist was obviously pleased at such a cultured question, but at the same time he knew he had to set the young men straight.

"The patient is not my violin," he said softly. "It's the bow. I bought it in Paris two months ago, one of the rare ones made by the 18th century craftsman, Dominique Peccatte. Look there at the end; I'm afraid it's cracked."

"Ah, yes, the bow," said the young interns. "Perfected was it not in 18th century Paris by one Francois Tourte?"

"Vraiment," said M. Sasson.

All this time Dr. Lavender and Technician Baizman hadn't said a word. They weren't even there. They had gone out to [illegible] the most unusual assignments in Beth Israel X-ray history.

But perhaps the learned observations of the young interns had been the best of all possible therapies for the waiting M. Sasson.

Not that the violinist appeared at all unstrung. But it wasn't easy waiting and wondering if this fine old bow could still give him the maximum sonority he wants when he plays.

Dr. Lavender brought him the official diagnosis. "Only a scratch," he said, "no fracture."

A grateful violinist carried the old patient out past the two young interns, who looked very pleased, too.

VARIATIONS ON X-RAY THEME—Boston Symphony violinist Michel Sasson, left, with rare 18th-century violin bow which was X-rayed in "emergency diagnosis" at Beth Israel Hospital by Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician.

239

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Friday, November 18, 1966

No Fractures, X-Ray Says Of Violin Bow

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BINGHAMTON PRESS
Friday, November 18, 1966

My Diagnosis Is: Bow(ed), But Not Bent

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 20,016

NOV 1 9 1966

'Ailing' Violin Bow X-rayed

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 132,266

NOV 1 8 1966

Bow . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sentinel (e)
ANSONIA, Conn.
Circ. 15,929

NOV 1 8 1966

Only a Scratch, No Fracture

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200 - year - old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and ask- Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X - ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X - ray; returned with the diagnosis: "Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 12,703

NOV 2 1 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News-Times (e)
DANBURY, Conn.
Circ. 26,024

NOV 1 8 1966

Violin X-Ray, 'No Fracture'

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 9,367

NOV 1 8 1966

EMERGENCY DIAGNOSIS

BOSTON (AP)— Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray, returned with the diagnosis: "Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 159,508

NOV 1 8 1966

WITH OUR COMPLIMENTS . . .

Although this clipping is beyond your order we thought it would interest you.

Please accept it with our compliments.

Sincerely,

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP AGENCY, INC.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN
Me.
Circ. 13,792

NOV 1 8 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 29,049

NOV 1 8 1966

Violin Bow X-Rayed; No Fracture Found

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times-Argus (e)
BARRE, Vermont
Circ. 11,593

NOV 1 8 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 94,357

NOV 1 8 1966

How to Keep in Tune

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray and returned the diagnosis:

"Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687

NOV 4 1966

ALL HAIL!

I can only applaud the Metropolitan Opera management for adopting, at its new home in New York's Lincoln Center, a rule barring latecomers until the first natural break, such as an intermission, once a performance has started. Some 30 who showed up late for an hour-and-40-minute one-act opera a few nights back had a real wait before they were seated — and how at least some of them must have fumed!

The Boston Symphony has a similar rule. I know because I got hung up by it once, through no fault of my own but because of a breakdown in the Boston subway system. Among my fellow latecomers cooling their heels in the lobby I saw, and chatted with, a college classmate who was, and still is, a member of the BSO board of directors. If he could take the wait gracefully — and he did — certainly none of the rest of us had a legitimate kick. So all hail the Met and its new rule!

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677

NOV 1 1 1966

Koussevitzky's widow at concert

Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed Boston Symphony conductor, will attend the Sunday afternoon concert at Newark's Symphony Hall to hear the All-State Orchestra and Chorus perform a work which was commissioned two decades ago by the Koussevitzky, Music Foundation.

Mme. Koussevitzky will be the guest of Kenneth Schermerhorn, director of the New Jersey Symphony, who will conduct this selective student orchestra and chorus. Schermerhorn once studied with her husband, Serge Koussevitzky, who was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838

NOV 1 7 1966

MUSICAL X-RAY?—Fearing that his 200-year-old French violin bow was cracked, Michael Sasson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought it to Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician at Beth Israel Hospital for X-rays. Fortunately the suspected crack turned out to be only a scratch.

ERALD, FRIDAY, NOV. 18, 1966

ow Unbowed After X-Ray

ner day to ask an "emergency gnosis" from Dr. Peter Lav- r, neuro-radiologist and Baizman chief radiology ician.

Bows, Bows, were two interns — hot as Hip- and of course they could see this pa- least two centuries

M. Sasson was agreeable. So opened the violin case and showed them the patient.

"Aha," said one of the young interns to his colleague, "note the arched modeling of the belly and back and the nice shallow ribs. Note how the arching of the belly is both transversal and longitudinal."

"True, true," said the other young intern. "But do look there, Doctor, and note the artistic unity of the opposed curves. I'm sure you know, Doctor, that the tuning of the violoncello is one octave below the viola, while the normal double bass approximately covers the suboctave of the violoncello."

Then the two interns turned to M. Sasson and asked: "Is the patient a Stradivarius, an Amati or a Maggini?"

The artist was obviously pleased at such a cultured question, but at the same time he knew he had to set the young men straight.

"The patient is not my violin," he said softly. "It's the bow. I bought it in Paris two months ago, one of the rare ones made by the 18th century craftsman, Dominique Peccatte. Look there at the end; I'm afraid it's cracked."

"Ah, yes, the bow," said the young interns. "Perfected, was it not, in 18th century Paris by one Francois Tourte?"

"Vraiment," said M. Sasson.

All this time Dr. Lavender and Technician Baizman hadn't said a word. They weren't even there. They had gone out to X-ray the bow in one of the most unusual assignments in Beth Israel X-ray history.

But perhaps the learned observations of the young interns had been the best of all possible therapies for the waiting M. Sasson.

Not that the violinist appeared at all unstrung. But it wasn't easy waiting and wondering if this fine old bow could still give him the maximum sonority he wants when he plays.

Dr. Lavender brought him the official diagnosis. "Only a scratch," he said, "no fracture."

A grateful violinist carried the old patient out past the two young interns, who looked very pleased, too.

VARIATIONS ON X-RAY THEME—Boston Symphony violinist Michel Sasson, left, with rare 18th-century violin bow which was X-rayed in "emergency diagnosis" at Beth Israel Hospital by Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician.

239

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Friday, November 18, 1966

No Fractures, X-Ray Says Of Violin Bow

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BINGHAMTON PRESS
Friday, November 18, 1966

My Diagnosis Is: Bow(ed), But Not Bent

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sentinel (e)
FITCHBURG, Mass.
Circ. 20,016

NOV 19 1966

'Ailing' Violin Bow X-rayed

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 132,266

NOV 18 1966

Bow . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sentinel (e)
ANSONIA, Conn.
Circ. 15,929

NOV 18 1966

Only a Scratch, No Fracture

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200 - year - old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X - ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X - ray; returned with the diagnosis: "Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 12,703

NOV 21 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News-Times (e)
DANBURY, Conn.
Circ. 26,024

NOV 18 1966

Violin X-Ray, 'No Fracture'

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 9,367

NOV 18 1966

EMERGENCY DIAGNOSIS

BOSTON (AP)— Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray, returned with the diagnosis: "Only [illegible] no frac[illegible]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN Me.
Circ. 13,792

NOV 18 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 29,049

NOV 18 1966

Violin Bow X-Rayed; No Fracture Found

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times-Argus (e)
BARRE, Vermont
Circ. 11,593

NOV 18 1966

No Fracture

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 94,357

NOV 18 1966

How to Keep in Tune

BOSTON (AP) — Michel Sasson, a member of the Boston Symphony, took the valuable, 200-year-old bow for his violin to Beth Israel Hospital for what he called "an emergency diagnosis."

He feared a mark on it indicated a crack and asked Dr. Peter Lavender, neuroradiologist, to X-ray the bow.

Dr. Lavender read the X-ray and returned the diagnosis:

"Only a scratch, no fracture."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News (e)
SALEM, Mass.
Circ. 27,687

NOV 4 1966

ALL HAIL!

I can only applaud the Metropolitan Opera management for adopting, at its new home in New York's Lincoln Center, a rule barring latecomers until the first natural break, such as an intermission, once a performance has started. Some 30 who showed up late for an hour-and-40-minute one-act opera a few nights back had a real wait before they were seated — and how at least some of them must have fumed!

The Boston Symphony has a similar rule. I know because I got hung up by it once, through no fault of my own but because of a breakdown in the Boston subway system. Among my fellow latecomers cooling their heels in the lobby I saw, and chatted with, a college classmate who was, and still is, a member of the BSO board of directors. If he could take the wait gracefully — and he did — certainly none of the rest of us had a legitimate kick. So all hail the Met and its new rule!

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677

NOV 11 1966

Koussevitzky's widow at concert

Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed Boston Symphony conductor, will attend the Sunday afternoon concert at Newark's Symphony Hall to hear the All-State Orchestra and Chorus perform a work which was commissioned two decades ago by the Koussevitzky, Music Foundation.

Mme. Koussevitzky will be the guest of Kenneth Schermerhorn, director of the New Jersey Symphony, who will conduct this selective student orchestra and chorus. Schermerhorn once studied with her husband, Serge Koussevitzky, who was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 145,838

NOV 17 1966

MUSICAL X-RAY?—Fearing that his 200-year-old French violin bow was cracked, Michael Sasson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought it to Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician at Beth Israel Hospital for X-rays. Fortunately the suspected crack turned out to be only a scratch.

[illegible]ALD, FRIDAY, NOV. 18, 1966

Aged Bow Unbowed After X-Ray

By FRED BRADY

At Beth Israel Hospital even the men in white turned white when they heard the age of the patient.

"At least 200 years," said Michel Sasson.

M. Sasson is a violinist with the Boston Symphony and he brought in the "patient" the other day to ask an "emergency diagnosis" from Dr. Peter Lavender, neuro-radiologist and Louis Baizman chief radiology technician.

Of course, there were two young interns — hot as Hippocrates — and of course they asked if they could see this patient of at least two centuries in age.

M. Sasson was agreeable. So he opened his violin case and showed them the patient.

"Aha," said one of the young interns to his colleague, "note the arched modeling of the belly and back and the nice shallow ribs. Note how the arching of the belly is both transversal and longitudinal."

"True, true," said the other young intern. "But do look there, Doctor, and note the artistic unity of the opposed curves. I'm sure you know, Doctor, that the tuning of the violoncello is one octave below the viola, while the normal double bass approximately covers the suboctave of the violoncello."

Then the two interns turned to M. Sasson and asked: "Is the patient a Stradivarius, an Amati or a Maggini?"

The artist was obviously pleased at such a cultured question, but at the same time he knew he had to set the young men straight.

"The patient is not my violin," he said softly. "It's the bow. I bought it in Paris two months ago, one of the rare ones made by the 18th century craftsman, Dominique Peccatte. Look there at the end; I'm afraid it's cracked."

"Ah, yes, the bow," said the young interns. "Perfected, was it not, in 18th century Paris by one Francois Tourte?"

"Vraiment," said M. Sasson.

All this time Dr. Lavender and Technician Baizman hadn't said a word. They weren't even there. They had gone out to X-ray the bow, in one of the most unusual assignments in Beth Israel X-ray history.

But perhaps the learned observations of the young interns had been the best of all possible therapies for the waiting M. Sasson.

Not that the violinist appeared at all unstrung. But it wasn't easy waiting and wondering if this fine old bow could still give him the maximum sonority he wants when he plays.

Dr. Lavender brought him the official diagnosis. "Only a scratch," he said, "no fracture."

A grateful violinist carried the old patient out past the two young interns, who looked very pleased, too.

VARIATIONS ON X-RAY THEME—Boston Symphony violinist Michel Sasson, left, with rare 18th-century violin bow which was X-rayed in "emergency diagnosis" at Beth Israel Hospital by Louis Baizman, chief radiology technician.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
NOV 13 1966

What Boston Wears to Friday Afternoon at The Symphony

By SUSAN HAMILTON

Sunday Herald Photos by George Dixon

FRIDAY afternoon at the Symphony is a tradition for Boston women that is steeped in the city's history. Ever since 1881, women of Boston have set aside that one afternoon a week for music and lunching with friends at the Chilton Club or the Ritz and then on to Symphony Hall for a concert.

Until 1915, tickets for the afternoon were unreserved and for 25 cents and a wait in line, you could attend what was then called a "rehearsal"—for the Saturday night concert.

Boston women today no longer wait in line. They arrive in suits and coats of tweed and solid colors just minutes before the doors close.

Tailored outfits blend with the more casual look of the younger concert-goers who prefer combinations of bright colors in plaid or stripes.

Hats of velvet and fur have scattered popularity, but Boston women seem to prefer to attend their Symphony afternoons hat-less.

Mrs. David Bernstein of Chestnut Hill in a blue and red wool suit arrives at the Symphony with Mrs. Hy Eisenman of Brookline, who wears a fitted beige coat, and Mrs. Ralph Heifetz of Lowell in a green tweed wool suit.

Mrs. David Wilder of Needham, (left) wears a black and white wool suit. Mrs. Henry Hornblower II chooses a green and white plaid suit.

Mrs. David Bird in yellow tweed with a light brown hat discusses the afternoon program with Mrs. Edward Redstone of Newton, who wears a cream colored coat and mink hat.

241

Friday Afternoon at the Symphony

Johanna Fiedler, daughter of Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler, home for a week-end from Sarah Lawrence College, wears a green tweed fitted coat.

Mrs. Hans Estin of Manchester arrives at the Friday Symphony in a yellow, orange and black coat and dress combination.

Mrs. Howard Johnson of Cambridge, wife of the new MIT president, in a multi-colored light wool cape.

Mrs. Gerald Church of Chestnut Street . . . in a shocking pink coat with blue hair ribbon.

Mrs. Francis Keating of North Falmouth . . . in a dark mink jacket.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

OCT 1966

they shall have music

COMPETITIONS HERE AND ABROAD

BY HERBERT KUPFERBERG

The shortest line for an American seeking musical fame and fortune runs from here to Moscow and back again. This axiom, which might be called Cliburn's Law, has just been reaffirmed by an attractive young woman named Jane Marsh, who decided only three years ago that she wanted to be a singer, and who right now confronts as promising a future as any soprano in the business.

This sudden upsurge is due entirely to Miss Marsh's winning first prize last June in the vocal division of the Tchaikovsky International Music Competition in Moscow. In so doing she became the first American to win the top award in the Moscow competition since Van Cliburn in 1958. Cliburn's victory also made him a celebrity overnight, but he had considerably more of an advance reputation than Miss Marsh. She had sung a few important dates, such as the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's 1965–1966 season, for which Erich Leinsdorf invited her to appear in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but to the musical public at large she was a virtual unknown.

Now, in the few months since Moscow, she has signed a recording contract with RCA Victor, declined a contract with the Metropolitan Opera (which she regards as "premature"), accepted an invitation to return to Russia for a concert tour next season, and in general has been offered so many engagements to sing in the United States that her agent, Columbia Artists Management, Incorporated, can hardly keep track of them.

Miss Marsh is brown-haired, blue-eyed, pretty, and stands five feet eleven, although she is so neatly proportioned that she does not convey an impression of undue height. She is a San Franciscan by birth and an outdoor girl by inclination, competing in swimming meets and giving rodeo-riding and roping exhibitions on her own colt, Sandy, in Western horse shows. She is taking her musical eminence with cool self-assurance. She hesitated a bit when asked whether she thought that musical competitions, which, after all, have been going on in one form or another since the Greek Olympic Games, were a good way of uncovering talent.

"I don't know whether they are a good way, though they certainly are a way," she said as she sat in a Chinese restaurant on Sixth Avenue not far from her New York apartment and consumed a thoroughly American steak dinner. "The trouble is that they can't be completely fair. Sometimes those who place one, two, and three are very close together, and yet all the recognition goes to the number one winner. Another thing is that there are two kinds of people psychologically, the competitor and the performer. Very seldom are both combined in the same individual. Essentially I'm a performer, not a contestant. But I've trained myself to think of auditions and competitions as performances, and to imagine that I really am giving a performance up there."

The Moscow competition is split into four divisions, with separate contests for singers, pianists, violinists, and cellists. Whatever else it may disclose about a contestant, it certainly explores his stamina to the full. All the vocal entrants had to undergo three separate rounds of tests. In the first (in which seventy of the original one hundred starters were eliminated), each contestant was asked to sing (a) a folk song from his own country, (b) a Russian folk song, (c) a standard aria selected from a list of thirty, and (d) a seventeenth-century aria.

In the second round, the requirements were (a) a vocalise written expressly for the competition by a Soviet composer listed in the program as S. Oorbach, (b) two more Russian songs selected by the contestant, (c) an aria by a modern composer selected by the contestant, and (d) a Russian aria chosen from a list. The final audition was made up of (a) a repetition of the Russian aria, (b) a "grand scene" from an opera or a song cycle with orchestra, and (c) a modern aria.

Everything had to be sung in the language in which it was written, and the time intervals between the rounds, while they varied, were minimal (Miss Marsh's schedule worked out so that she had four days between rounds 1 and 2, but only one between rounds 2 and 3). A large public audience was always on hand, and applauded the contestants generously. The panel of twenty official judges was also friendly; Miss Marsh says that many of them phoned her to congratulate her on her twenty-fourth birthday, which she celebrated during the competition. Mr. S. Oorbach, the composer, also called her to say how well she had sung his vocalise. Although she had only three numbers in the final and de-those of Itzhak Perlman, all Israeli ca[illegible] importance, but because his [illegible] Votapek, who is especially adept in modern works, has amply proved his mettle as a competitor. But [illegible] after Fort Worth, [illegible] in the even tougher [illegible] concert world, where prodigious young pianists are plentiful, and where last year's award is not necessarily a shortcut to next year's booking lists.

Votapek's experiences so far, as well as those of countless other competition winners, raise such questions as whether the qualities which may impress a judge in a contest will necessarily register with the public, and even more important, whether such factors as growth, maturity, and the insight born of thought and experience can ever be checked off on a tally sheet. These are the matters which will really decide what place artists like the Ralph Votapeks, Itzhak Perlmans, and Jane Marshes are to hold, and on them the jury is still out.

242

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,995 SUN. 268,515

OCT 2 1966

Memphis Symphony Orchestra

Vincent de Frank, Music Director & Conductor

"Dynamic and devoted" are two adjectives that describe Vincent de Frank, conductor of the Memphis Symphony Orchestra, and some might add "debonair" as a tribute to his dashing good looks.

Vincent de Frank was born in Long Island City, New York, of Irish and Italian parentage. There at an early age he began the study of the violin, continuing for eleven years under the noted teacher, George Frenz. While in high school, due to the need for cellists in the orchestra, he was urged to adopt this instrument. Very soon the cello replaced the violin in his affections.

After high school, Mr. de Frank entered the Juilliard School of Music, also studying cello under Percy Such and conducting under Albert Stoessel. During this period he also played cello with the National Orchestral Society at Carnegie Hall under Leon Barzin.

Following a tour of South America with his own orchestra, Mr. de Frank joined the Detroit Symphony as cellist and at the same time studied cello with the renowned Georges Miquelle. He remained there until enlisting in the United States Army in October, 1940.

Mr. de Frank first attracted the attention of Memphis music lovers by his outstanding work as Director of the Second Army Headquarters Band. On his release from the Army in October, 1945, he was immediately engaged to conduct the Memphis Symphony Orchestra while Dr. Burnett C. Tuthill, the regular conductor, was on leave of absence. In April, 1946, on Dr. Tuthill's resignation, Mr. de Frank was appointed permanent conductor in which post he continued through the 1946-47 season, bringing the orchestra to its finest standard of performance. During the summer of 1947 he was privileged to study conducting under the eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony. In September, 1947 the Memphis Symphony Orchestra voted to discontinue concerts due to a serious financial [illegible], and Mr. de Frank accepted an appointment as cellist with the St. Louis Symphony for several seasons. In 1950 he undertook a teaching fellowship at Indiana University, as assistant to Fritz Magg, violoncellist of the resident Berkshire String Quartet.

Mr. de Frank returned to Memphis in 1952 to become conductor of a new orchestral group formed by himself and his former music associates here. Several concerts were given in the Mid-South area followed by an appearance at Memphis' Goodwyn Institute. This was received by standing ovation and resulted in the immediate formation of the Memphis Orchestral Society. The Memphis Symphony Orchestra, the outgrowth of that occasion, has now progressed and expanded into one of the leading young orchestras of the nation.

Vincent de Frank is a dynamic conductor and an excellent musician. Technically precise and at the same time artistically sensitive and expressive, Mr. de Frank has proved himself an inspiration to both artists and audiences alike. The excellence of his work is evident in the prospect of a "sell out" season for 1966-67.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly. Circ. 7,841

OCT 20 1966

60 Attend First Of Three Festival Films

Friends of the Wellesley Free Library played host to Wellesleyites and guests who attended the first movies of the Friend's Film Festival last Friday evening. Around 60 saw the Academy-Award-winning "Marc Chagall", a pictorial study of the Russian painter who worked on canvas and glass.

Another film was an unexpected surprise — a trilogy including motion pictures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, and Wellesley College — produced by a Wellesley resident, Peter Benjamin of Cliff road, head of Peter Benjamin Productions, Inc.

Two more evenings of art film enrichment remain to be given during the Film Festival:

Tomorrow evening's Film Festival takes the audience to France, offering warm provincialism in "Songs of the Auvergne", and a pictorial tour of the Louvre museum. The first will feature Phyllis Curtin and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, narrated by Charles Boyer is an Emmy Award winner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 2 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 16 1966

Jewish Music

The folk singer Martha Schlame will return to open the ninth annual series of the New England Jewish Music Forum Wednesday, Nov. 2, at 8:30 in Kehillath Israel Auditorium, Brookline. Noted for her program, "Songs of Many Lands," she also will sing music of Kurt Weill.

The other three events in the Forum series will include Heinrich Schalit's cantata, "Bonei Zion" for vocal quartet and narrator; cantorial masterpieces sung by outstanding New England cantors; a program of organ music for the temple with Lois Jungas, organist and Dr. Herbert Fromm, commentator; Richard Sher, 16-year-old cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will be accompanied by his brother Daniel Sher, pianist; a literary evening with music devoted to the works of Sholom Aleichem and I. L. Peretz.

Bowdoin Wins Music Award

BRUNSWICK, Me. — For the second consecutive year Bowdoin College has won an award in a nation-wide competition among educational institutions for the performance and promotion of American music.

The National Federation of Music Clubs and the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers presented the college with an honorable mention citation for its "distinguished service to music." The award was made in a category for privately endowed colleges and universities.

Among the outstanding musical events of the past year at Bowdoin was a Carl Ruggles Festival held in January, which gave the first major recognition in this country to one of America's most important composers. During the festival, many of Ruggles' works were performed, including the American premiere of his symphony, "Suntreader," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

OCT 1966

they shall have music

COMPETITIONS HERE AND ABROAD

BY HERBERT KUPFERBERG

The shortest line for an American seeking musical fame and fortune runs from here to Moscow and back again. This axiom, which might be called Cliburn's Law, has just been reaffirmed by an attractive young woman named Jane Marsh, who decided only three years ago that she wanted to be a singer, and who right now confronts as promising a future as any soprano in the business.

This sudden upsurge is due entirely to Miss Marsh's winning first prize last June in the vocal division of the Tchaikovsky International Music Competition in Moscow. In so doing she became the first American to win the top award in the Moscow competition since Van Cliburn in 1958. Cliburn's victory also made him a celebrity overnight, but he had considerably more of an advance reputation than Miss Marsh. She had sung a few important dates, such as the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's 1965–1966 season, for which Erich Leinsdorf invited her to appear in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but to the musical public at large she was a virtual unknown.

Now, in the few months since Moscow, she has signed a recording contract with RCA Victor, declined a contract with the Metropolitan Opera (which she regards as "premature"), accepted an invitation to return to Russia for a concert tour next season, and in general has been offered so many engagements to sing in the United States that her agent, Columbia Artists Management, Incorporated, can hardly keep track of them.

Miss Marsh is brown-haired, blue-eyed, pretty, and stands five feet eleven, although she is so neatly proportioned that she does not convey an impression of undue height. She is a San Franciscan by birth and an outdoor girl by inclination, competing in swimming meets and giving rodeo-riding and roping exhibitions on her own colt, Sandy, in Western horse shows. She is taking her musical eminence with cool self-assurance. She hesitated a bit when asked whether she thought that musical competitions, which, after all, have been going on in one form or another since the Greek Olympic Games, were a good way of uncovering talent.

"I don't know whether they are a good way, though they certainly are a way," she said as she sat in a Chinese restaurant on Sixth Avenue not far from her New York apartment and consumed a thoroughly American steak dinner. "The trouble is that they can't be completely fair. Sometimes those who place one, two, and three are very close together, and yet all the recognition goes to the number one winner. Another thing is that there are two kinds of people psychologically, the competitor and the performer. Very seldom are both combined in the same individual. Essentially I'm a performer, not a contestant. But I've trained myself to think of auditions and competitions as performances, and to imagine that I really am giving a performance up there."

The Moscow competition is split into four divisions, with separate contests for singers, pianists, violinists, and cellists. Whatever else it may disclose about a contestant, it certainly explores his stamina to the full. All the vocal entrants had to undergo three separate rounds of tests. In the first (in which seventy of the original one hundred starters were eliminated), each contestant was asked to sing (a) a folk song from his own country, (b) a Russian folk song, (c) a standard aria selected from a list of thirty, and (d) a seventeenth-century aria.

In the second round, the requirements were (a) a vocalise written expressly for the competition by a Soviet composer listed in the program as S. Oorbach, (b) two more Russian songs selected by the contestant, (c) an aria by a modern composer selected by the contestant, and (d) a Russian aria chosen from a list. The final audition was made up of (a) a repetition of the Russian aria, (b) a "grand scene" from an opera or a song cycle with orchestra, and (c) a modern aria.

Everything had to be sung in the language in which it was written, and the time intervals between the rounds, while they varied, were minimal (Miss Marsh's schedule worked out so that she had four days between rounds 1 and 2, but only one between rounds 2 and 3). A large public audience was always on hand, and applauded the contestants generously. The panel of twenty official judges was also friendly; Miss Marsh says that many of them phoned her to congratulate her on her twenty-fourth birthday, which she celebrated during the competition. Mr. S. Oorbach, the composer, also called her to say how well she had sung his vocalise. Although she had only three numbers in the final and de-those of Itzhak Perlman, an Israeli cal importance, but because his Votapek, who is especially adept in modern works, has amply proved his mettle as a competitor. But after Fort Worth,

(1965) in the even tougher ncert world, where pianists are plentiful, and where last year's award is not necessarily a shortcut to next year's booking lists.

Votapek's experiences so far, as well as those of countless other competition winners, raise such questions as whether the qualities which may impress a judge in a contest will necessarily register with the public, and even more important, whether such factors as growth, maturity, and the insight born of thought and experience can ever be checked off on a tally sheet. These are the matters which will really decide what place artists like the Ralph Votapeks, Itzhak Perlmans, and Jane Marshes are to hold, and on them the jury is still out.

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,995 SUN. 268,515

OCT 2 1966

Memphis Symphony Orchestra

Vincent de Frank, Music Director & Conductor

"Dynamic and devoted" are two adjectives that describe Vincent de Frank, conductor of the Memphis Symphony Orchestra, and some might add "debonair" as a tribute to his dashing good looks.

Vincent de Frank was born in Long Island City, New York, of Irish and Italian parentage. There at an early age he began the study of the violin, continuing for eleven years under the noted teacher, George Frenz. While in high school, due to the need for cellists in the orchestra, he was urged to adopt this instrument. Very soon the cello replaced the violin in his affections.

After high school, Mr. de Frank entered the Juilliard School of Music, also studying cello under Percy Such and conducting under Albert Stoessel. During this period he also played cello with the National Orchestral Society at Carnegie Hall under Leon Barzin.

Following a tour of South America with his own orchestra, Mr. de Frank joined the Detroit Symphony as cellist and at the same time studied cello with the renowned Georges Miquelle. He remained there until enlisting in the United States Army in October, 1940.

Mr. de Frank first attracted the attention of Memphis music lovers by his outstanding work as Director of the Second Army Headquarters Band. On his release from the Army in October, 1945, he was immediately engaged to conduct the Memphis Symphony Orchestra while Dr. Burnett C. Tuthill, the regular conductor, was on leave of absence. In April, 1946, on Dr. Tuthill's resignation, Mr. de Frank was appointed permanent conductor in which post he continued through the 1946-47 season, bringing the orchestra to its finest standard of performance. During the summer of 1947 he was privileged to study conducting under the eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony. In September, 1947 the Memphis Symphony Orchestra voted to discontinue concerts due to a serious financial deficit, and Mr. de Frank accepted an appointment as cellist with the St. Louis Symphony for several seasons. In 1950 he undertook a teaching fellowship at Indiana University, as assistant to Fritz Magg, violoncellist of the resident Berkshire String Quartet.

Mr. de Frank returned to Memphis in 1952 to become conductor of a new orchestral group formed by himself and his former music associates here. Several concerts were given in the Mid-South area followed by an appearance at Memphis' Goodwyn Institute. This was received by standing ovation and resulted in the immediate formation of the Memphis Orchestral Society. The Memphis Symphony Orchestra, the outgrowth of that occasion, has now progressed and expanded into one of the leading young orchestras of the nation.

Vincent de Frank is a dynamic conductor and an excellent musician. Technically precise and at the same time artistically sensitive and expressive, Mr. de Frank has proved himself an inspiration to both artists and audiences alike. The excellence of his work is evident in the prospect of a "sell out" season for 1966-67.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,841

OCT 20 1966

60 Attend First Of Three Festival Films

Friends of the Wellesley Free Library played host to Wellesleyites and guests who attended the first movies of the Friend's Film Festival last Friday evening. Around 60 saw the Academy-Award-winning "Marc Chagall", a pictorial study of the Russian painter who worked on canvas and glass.

Another film was an unexpected surprise — a trilogy including motion pictures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, and Wellesley College — produced by a Wellesley resident, Peter Benjamin of Cliff road, head of Peter Benjamin Productions, Inc.

Two more evenings of art film enrichment remain to be given during the Film Festival:

Tomorrow evening's Film Festival takes the audience to France, offering warm provincialism in "Songs of the Auvergne", and a pictorial tour of the Louvre museum. The first will feature Phyllis Curtin and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, narrated by Charles Boyer is an Emmy Award winner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 2 1966

Bowdoin Wins Music Award

BRUNSWICK, Me. — For the second consecutive year Bowdoin College has won an award in a nation-wide competition among educational institutions for the performance and promotion of American music.

The National Federation of Music Clubs and the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers presented the college with an honorable mention citation for its "distinguished service to music." The award was made in a category for privately endowed colleges and universities.

Among the outstanding musical events of the past year at Bowdoin was a Carl Ruggles Festival held in January, which gave the first major recognition in this country to one of America's most important composers. During the festival, many of Ruggles' works were performed, including the American premiere of his symphony, "Suntreader," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 16 1966

Jewish Music

The folk singer Martha Schlame will return to open the ninth annual series of the New England Jewish Music Forum Wednesday, Nov. 2, at 8:30 in Kehillath Israel Auditorium, Brookline. Noted for her program, "Songs of Many Lands," she also will sing music of Kurt Weill.

The other three events in the Forum series will include Heinrich Schalit's cantata. "Bonei Zion" for vocal quartet and narrator; cantorial masterpieces sung by outstanding New England cantors; a program of organ music for the temple with Lois Jungas, organist and Dr. Herbert Fromm, commentator; Richard Sher, 18-year-old cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will be accompanied by his brother Daniel Sher, pianist; a literary evening with music devoted to the works of Sholom Aleichem and I. L. Peretz.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

IDAD IS IN

t 500 years behind Columbus in discovering Trinidad is "in", things are happening much t all to discover that what you see and the real thing. It's not imported from ntry. Here is where Calypso was born.
ms first beat out their irresistible he torrid limbo was first performed dancers. Yes, song, music and e gay Trinidadians whose in year-round Carnival spirit.

GO
THIS WORLD

es away, seems to be on another planet.
led tropical Paradise—a Shangri-La for here. Palm-fringed, velvet-soft s miles, snorkeling is te. No high-rise buildings to ery, but comfortable
m the luxurious isk you to Trinidad
ervations now.
BLE

See Your Travel Agent
TRIST BOARD P.O. Box 1974, Dept. G, New York, New York 10017

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

OCT 1966

cisive round, Miss Marsh recalls that they made for some forty minutes of singing, consisting of Tatiana's lengthy letter scene from Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, Desdemona's Willow Song and Ave Maria from Verdi's Otello, and "Ain't It a Pretty Night" from Carlisle Floyd's Susannah — an American work totally unfamiliar to the Russians, but one which they appeared to enjoy.

After returning to this country, Miss Marsh went almost directly to the Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Massachusetts, along with two other American contestants from Moscow, Veronica Tyler, a soprano who took a second place, and Simon Estes, a bass who took a third. There she had a joyous reunion with Leinsdorf, one of the first major musicians to recognize her talent. "He said he was as thrilled as if I were a member of his own family," Miss Marsh said.

At Tanglewood, thousands of people, not to mention a goodly number of critics, had their first chance to hear Miss Marsh sing. Her voice is one of utter purity, with plenty of strength behind it, and she has a natural gift for languages, speaking fluent German and Italian, and picking up enough of a Russian accent in her Moscow stay to impress the judges there. At Tanglewood she gave every sign of a singer poised on the verge of a notable career.

Nevertheless, her situation is somewhat different from Van Cliburn's in 1958. When he returned in triumph he had only to tour the United States playing his two Moscow prizewinning pieces, the Tchaikovsky B-flat Major Concerto and the Rachmaninoff Third; indeed, there are those who complain he has played little else since. Miss Marsh obviously cannot go through life repeating the letter scene from Eugene Onegin and the Willow Song from Otello (both of which, incidentally, will be on her first record for Victor). She is an opera singer and belongs on the stage, which is where she intends to go. A great many people will be listening with curiosity when she gets there, for with Miss Marsh, as with most others, the big question is not what happens at competitions, but what happens afterward.

Two recent cases in point are those of Itzhak Perlman, an Israeli violinist, and Ralph Votapek, an American pianist. Perlman, who is only twenty years old, represents a reverse trend in musical competitions, for he found his prize by journeying to the United States rather than by leaving it. American musical competitions have been flourishing for a good many years, even though few except musicians have been aware of them. One of the most prestigious is the Leventritt Competition, held annually in New York since the early 1940s; its cash award is only $1000 (Moscow pays 2500 rubles, the equivalent of $2800), but it guarantees its winner appearances with five orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland, the Pittsburgh, the Denver, and the Buffalo. Fees for these concerts vary, but a Leventritt winner can expect enough additional engagements to give him about a year's work in the nation's concert halls. Cliburn won the Leventritt in 1954, four years before he went to Moscow.

The Leventritt limits itself to one instrument a year (usually the piano or the violin), and it attracts a somewhat smaller field than the Moscow Tchaikovsky, though often a very distinguished one. When Itzhak Perlman won the final round in 1964, he triumphed over eighteen highly skilled competitors.

Perlman, for all his youth, is an old hand at competitions. His original trip to America resulted from one, for he was a lad of thirteen in Israel when he participated in a talent contest whose winners were packed off to the United States for appearances on the Ed Sullivan television show. Perlman came over as part of a package that also included a folk-dance troupe, a soprano, a team of duo-pianists, and a hand-shadow artist. He has remained in America ever since, studying, working, concertizing. As a child, Perlman was afflicted with poliomyelitis and was bedridden for a year. The disease left him with braces on both legs, so that he walks with two canes and plays his concerts sitting in a chair.

The young man had the misfortune to make his first Carnegie Hall appearance during one of New York's recurrent newspaper strikes; consequently his debut went unreported. His Leventritt triumph, on the other hand, became page-one news — not as a tribute to its musical importance, but because his Guarnerius violin was stolen backstage when he put it down for a moment to accept congratulations (it was recovered the next day in a nearby pawnshop).

Perlman, a handsome, personable, curly-haired young man, is regarded by many authorities as one of the prospective great violinists of the generation ahead. Other violinists come to his concerts — always a sure sign — and he has a distinctively warm tone and formidable technique as well as youthful exuberance. He has signed a recording contract with RCA Victor and a managerial contract with S. Hurok; he has played in Europe and returned in triumph to Israel. Most significant of all, his American concert schedule is not only holding up but gradually expanding; in the third season after his competition victory he still is in demand.

Ralph Votapek's renown was established at the richest and most lavish musical competition ever staged in the United States, the Van Cliburn International Competition, held in 1962 at Fort Worth, Texas. Named in honor of Texas' most famous musician, the contest offered a first prize of $10,000, an unheard-of amount for such affairs. Money was put up by local sources, spearheaded by the National Guild of Piano Teachers. No fewer than forty-four contestants turned out, including pianists from France, Portugal, Japan, and four from the Soviet Union. The competitive quality was high and the excitement intense, with the top prize finally going to Votapek, a twenty-three-year-old American from Milwaukee. Along with the cash award to Votapek went the other almost inevitable cachets of success — the contracts with Victor and Hurok, a Carnegie Hall concert, an extensive recital schedule, and appearances with some of the country's greatest orchestras.

Before his victory at Fort Worth, Votapek had achieved a remarkable record in other competitions, starting with his student days at the Milwaukee Conservatory and carrying through three Midwestern contests as a youngster. Later on he was a finalist in the Leventritt and Mitropoulos competitions, and in 1959 the winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Award, entitling him to a debut at New York's Town Hall.

Votapek, who is especially adept in modern works, has amply proved his mettle as a competitor. But [illegible] after Fort Worth, [illegible] in the even tougher [illegible] concert world, where prodigious young pianists are plentiful, and where last year's award is not necessarily a shortcut to next year's booking lists.

Votapek's experiences so far, as well as those of countless other competition winners, raise such questions as whether the qualities which may impress a judge in a contest will necessarily register with the public, and even more important, whether such factors as growth, maturity, and the insight born of thought and experience can ever be checked off on a tally sheet. These are the matters which will really decide what place artists like the Ralph Votapeks, Itzhak Perlmans, and Jane Marshes are to hold, and on them the jury is still out.

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,995 SUN. 268,515

OCT 2 1966

Memphis Symphony Orchestra

Vincent de Frank, Music Director & Conductor

"Dynamic and devoted" are two adjectives that describe Vincent de Frank, conductor of the Memphis Symphony Orchestra, and some might add "debonair" as a tribute to his dashing good looks.

Vincent de Frank was born in Long Island City, New York, of Irish and Italian parentage. There at an early age he began the study of the violin, continuing for eleven years under the noted teacher, George Frenz. While in high school, due to the need for cellists in the orchestra, he was urged to adopt this instrument. Very soon the cello replaced the violin in his affections.

After high school, Mr. de Frank entered the Juilliard School of Music, also studying cello under Percy Such and conducting under Albert Stoessel. During this period he also played cello with the National Orchestral Society at Carnegie Hall under Leon Barzin.

Following a tour of South America with his own orchestra, Mr. de Frank joined the Detroit Symphony as cellist and at the same time studied cello with the renowned Georges Miquelle. He remained there until enlisting in the United States Army in October, 1940.

Mr. de Frank first attracted the attention of Memphis music lovers by his outstanding work as Director of the Second Army Headquarters Band. On his release from the Army in October, 1945, he was immediately engaged to conduct the Memphis Symphony Orchestra while Dr. Burnett C. Tuthill, the regular conductor, was on leave of absence. In April, 1946, on Dr. Tuthill's resignation, Mr. de Frank was appointed permanent conductor in which post he continued through the 1946-47 season, bringing the orchestra to its finest standard of performance. During the summer of 1947 he was privileged to study conducting under the eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony. In September, 1947 the Memphis Symphony Orchestra voted to discontinue concerts due to a serious financial deficit, and Mr. de Frank accepted an appointment as cellist with the St. Louis Symphony for several seasons. In 1950 he undertook a teaching fellowship at Indiana University, as assistant to Fritz Magg, violoncellist of the resident Berkshire String Quartet.

Mr. de Frank returned to Memphis in 1952 to become conductor of a new orchestral group formed by himself and his former music associates here. Several concerts were given in the Mid-South area followed by an appearance at Memphis' Goodwyn Institute. This was received by standing ovation and resulted in the immediate formation of the Memphis Orchestral Society. The Memphis Symphony Orchestra, the outgrowth of that occasion, has now progressed and expanded into one of the leading young orchestras of the nation.

Vincent de Frank is a dynamic conductor and an excellent musician. Technically precise and at the same time artistically sensitive and expressive, Mr. de Frank has proved himself an inspiration to both artists and audiences alike. The excellence of his work is evident in the prospect of a "sell out" season for 1966-67.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly. Circ. 7,841

OCT 20 1966

60 Attend First Of Three Festival Films

Friends of the Wellesley Free Library played host to Wellesleyites and guests who attended the first movies of the Friend's Film Festival last Friday evening. Around 60 saw the Academy-Award-winning "Marc Chagall", a pictorial study of the Russian painter who worked on canvas and glass.

Another film was an unexpected surprise — a trilogy including motion pictures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, and Wellesley College — produced by a Wellesley resident, Peter Benjamin of Cliff road, head of Peter Benjamin Productions, Inc .

Two more evenings of art film enrichment remain to be given during the Film Festival:

Tomorrow evening's Film Festival takes the audience to France, offering warm provincialism in "Songs of the Auvergne", and a pictorial tour of the Louvre museum. The first will feature Phyllis Curtin and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, narrated by Charles Boyer is an Emmy Award winner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 2 1966

Bowdoin Wins Music Award

BRUNSWICK, Me. — For the second consecutive year Bowdoin College has won an award in a nation-wide competition among educational institutions for the performance and promotion of American music.

The National Federation of Music Clubs and the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers presented the college with an honorable mention citation for its "distinguished service to music." The award was made in a category for privately endowed colleges and universities.

Among the outstanding musical events of the past year at Bowdoin was a Carl Ruggles Festival held in January, which gave the first major recognition in this country to one of America's most important composers. During the festival, many of Ruggles' works were performed, including the American premiere of his symphony, "Suntreader," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 16 1966

Jewish Music

The folk singer Martha Schlame will return to open the ninth annual series of the New England Jewish Music Forum Wednesday, Nov. 2, at 8:30 in Kehillath Israel Auditorium, Brookline. Noted for her program, "Songs of Many Lands," she also will sing music of Kurt Weill.

The other three events in the Forum series will include Heinrich Schalit's cantata. "Bonei Zion" for vocal quartet and narrator; cantorial masterpieces sung by outstanding New England cantors; a program of organ music for the temple with Lois Jungas, organist and Dr. Herbert Fromm, commentator; Richard Sher, 18-year-old cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will be accompanied by his brother Daniel Sher, pianist; a literary evening with music devoted to the works of Sholom Aleichem and I. L. Peretz.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

IDAD IS IN

st 500 years behind Columbus in discovering Trinidad is "in", things are happening much at all to discover that what you see and is the real thing. It's not imported from ntry. Here is where Calypso was born. ms first beat out their irresistible he torrid limbo was first performed dancers. Yes, song, music and e gay Trinidadians whose th year-round Carnival spirit.

GO THIS WORLD

tes away, seems to be on another planet. iled tropical Paradise—a Shangri-La for here. Palm-fringed, velvet-soft ss miles, snorkeling is ate. No high-rise buildings to ery, but comfortable om the luxurious nisk you to Trinidad ervations now.

See Your Travel Agent

RIST BOARD P.O. Box 1974, Dept. G, New York, New York 10017

ATLANTIC
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 279,,900

OCT 1966

cisive round, Miss Marsh recalls that they made for some forty minutes of singing, consisting of Tatiana's lengthy letter scene from Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, Desdemona's Willow Song and Ave Maria from Verdi's Otello, and "Ain't It a Pretty Night" from Carlisle Floyd's Susannah — an American work totally unfamiliar to the Russians, but one which they appeared to enjoy.

After returning to this country, Miss Marsh went almost directly to the Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Massachusetts, along with two other American contestants from Moscow, Veronica Tyler, a soprano who took a second place, and Simon Estes, a bass who took a third. There she had a joyous reunion with Leinsdorf, one of the first major musicians to recognize her talent. "He said he was as thrilled as if I were a member of his own family," Miss Marsh said.

At Tanglewood, thousands of people, not to mention a goodly number of critics, had their first chance to hear Miss Marsh sing. Her voice is one of utter purity, with plenty of strength behind it, and she has a natural gift for languages, speaking fluent German and Italian, and picking up enough of a Russian accent in her Moscow stay to impress the judges there. At Tanglewood she gave every sign of a singer poised on the verge of a notable career.

Nevertheless, her situation is somewhat different from Van Cliburn's in 1958. When he returned in triumph he had only to tour the United States playing his two Moscow prizewinning pieces, the Tchaikovsky B-flat Major Concerto and the Rachmaninoff Third; indeed, there are those who complain he has played little else since. Miss Marsh obviously cannot go through life repeating the letter scene from Eugene Onegin and the Willow Song from Otello (both of which, incidentally, will be on her first record for Victor). She is an opera singer and belongs on the stage, which is where she intends to go. A great many people will be listening with curiosity when she gets there, for with Miss Marsh, as with most others, the big question is not what happens at competitions, but what happens afterward.

Two recent cases in point are those of Itzhak Perlman, an Israeli violinist, and Ralph Votapek, an American pianist. Perlman, who is only twenty years old, represents a reverse trend in musical competitions, for he found his prize by journeying to the United States rather than by leaving it. American musical competitions have been flourishing for a good many years, even though few except musicians have been aware of them. One of the most prestigious is the Leventritt Competition, held annually in New York since the early 1940s; its cash award is only $1000 (Moscow pays 2500 rubles, the equivalent of $2800), but it guarantees its winner appearances with five orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Cleveland, the Pittsburgh, the Denver, and the Buffalo. Fees for these concerts vary, but a Leventritt winner can expect enough additional engagements to give him about a year's work in the nation's concert halls. Cliburn won the Leventritt in 1954, four years before he went to Moscow.

The Leventritt limits itself to one instrument a year (usually the piano or the violin), and it attracts a somewhat smaller field than the Moscow Tchaikovsky, though often a very distinguished one. When Itzhak Perlman won the final round in 1964, he triumphed over eighteen highly skilled competitors.

Perlman, for all his youth, is an old hand at competitions. His original trip to America resulted from one, for he was a lad of thirteen in Israel when he participated in a talent contest whose winners were packed off to the United States for appearances on the Ed Sullivan television show. Perlman came over as part of a package that also included a folk-dance troupe, a soprano, a team of duo-pianists, and a hand-shadow artist. He has remained in America ever since, studying, working, concertizing. As a child, Perlman was afflicted with poliomyelitis and was bedridden for a year. The disease left him with braces on both legs, so that he walks with two canes and plays his concerts sitting in a chair.

The young man had the misfortune to make his first Carnegie Hall appearance during one of New York's recurrent newspaper strikes; consequently his debut went unreported. His Leventritt triumph, on the other hand, became page-one news — not as a tribute to its musical importance, but because his Guarnerius violin was stolen backstage when he put it down for a moment to accept congratulations (it was recovered the next day in a nearby pawnshop).

Perlman, a handsome, personable, curly-haired young man, is regarded by many authorities as one of the prospective great violinists of the generation ahead. Other violinists come to his concerts — always a sure sign — and he has a distinctively warm tone and formidable technique as well as youthful exuberance. He has signed a recording contract with RCA Victor and a managerial contract with S. Hurok; he has played in Europe and returned in triumph to Israel. Most significant of all, his American concert schedule is not only holding up but gradually expanding; in the third season after his competition victory he still is in demand.

Ralph Votapek's renown was established at the richest and most lavish musical competition ever staged in the United States, the Van Cliburn International Competition, held in 1962 at Fort Worth, Texas. Named in honor of Texas' most famous musician, the contest offered a first prize of $10,000, an unheard-of amount for such affairs. Money was put up by local sources, spearheaded by the National Guild of Piano Teachers. No fewer than forty-four contestants turned out, including pianists from France, Portugal, Japan, and four from the Soviet Union. The competitive quality was high and the excitement intense, with the top prize finally going to Votapek, a twenty-three-year-old American from Milwaukee. Along with the cash award to Votapek went the other almost inevitable cachets of success — the contracts with Victor and Hurok, a Carnegie Hall concert, an extensive recital schedule, and appearances with some of the country's greatest orchestras.

Before his victory at Fort Worth, Votapek had achieved a remarkable record in other competitions, starting with his student days at the Milwaukee Conservatory and carrying through three Midwestern contests as a youngster. Later on he was a finalist in the Leventritt and Mitropoulos competitions, and in 1959 the winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Award, entitling him to a debut at New York's Town Hall.

Votapek, who is especially adept in modern works, has amply proved his mettle as a competitor. But [illegible] after Fort Worth, [illegible] in the even tougher [illegible] concert world, where prodigious young pianists are plentiful, and where last year's award is not necessarily a shortcut to next year's booking lists.

Votapek's experiences so far, as well as those of countless other competition winners, raise such questions as whether the qualities which may impress a judge in a contest will necessarily register with the public, and even more important, whether such factors as growth, maturity, and the insight born of thought and experience can ever be checked off on a tally sheet. These are the matters which will really decide what place artists like the Ralph Votapeks, Itzhak Perlmans, and Jane Marshes are to hold, and on them the jury is still out.

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,995 SUN. 268,515

OCT 2 1966

Memphis Symphony Orchestra

Vincent de Frank, Music Director & Conductor

"Dynamic and devoted" are two adjectives that describe Vincent de Frank, conductor of the Memphis Symphony Orchestra, and some might add "debonair" as a tribute to his dashing good looks.

Vincent de Frank was born in Long Island City, New York, of Irish and Italian parentage. There at an early age he began the study of the violin, continuing for eleven years under the noted teacher, George Frenz. While in high school, due to the need for cellists in the orchestra, he was urged to adopt this instrument. Very soon the cello replaced the violin in his affections.

After high school, Mr. de Frank entered the Juilliard School of Music, also studying cello under Percy Such and conducting under Albert Stoessel. During this period he also played cello with the National Orchestral Society at Carnegie Hall under Leon Barzin.

Following a tour of South America with his own orchestra, Mr. de Frank joined the Detroit Symphony as cellist and at the same time studied cello with the renowned Georges Miquelle. He remained there until enlisting in the United States Army in October, 1940.

Mr. de Frank first attracted the attention of Memphis music lovers by his outstanding work as Director of the Second Army Headquarters Band. On his release from the Army in October, 1945, he was immediately engaged to conduct the Memphis Symphony Orchestra while Dr. Burnett C. Tuthill, the regular conductor, was on leave of absence. In April, 1946, on Dr. Tuthill's resignation, Mr. de Frank was appointed permanent conductor in which post he continued through the 1946-47 season, bringing the orchestra to its finest standard of performance. During the summer of 1947 he was privileged to study conducting under the eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony. In September, 1947 the Memphis Symphony Orchestra voted to discontinue concerts due to a serious financial deficit, and Mr. de Frank accepted an appointment as cellist with the St. Louis Symphony for several seasons. In 1950 he undertook a teaching fellowship at Indiana University, as assistant to Fritz Magg, violoncellist of the resident Berkshire String Quartet.

Mr. de Frank returned to Memphis in 1952 to become conductor of a new orchestral group formed by himself and his former music associates here. Several concerts were given in the Mid-South area followed by an appearance at Memphis' Goodwyn Institute. This was received by standing ovation and resulted in the immediate formation of the Memphis Orchestral Society. The Memphis Symphony Orchestra, the outgrowth of that occasion, has now progressed and expanded into one of the leading young orchestras of the nation.

Vincent de Frank is a dynamic conductor and an excellent musician. Technically precise and at the same time artistically sensitive and expressive, Mr. de Frank has proved himself an inspiration to both artists and audiences alike. The excellence of his work is evident in the prospect of a "sell out" season for 1966-67.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,841

OCT 20 1966

60 Attend First Of Three Festival Films

Friends of the Wellesley Free Library played host to Wellesleyites and guests who attended the first movies of the Friend's Film Festival last Friday evening. Around 60 saw the Academy-Award-winning "Marc Chagall", a pictorial study of the Russian painter who worked on canvas and glass.

Another film was an unexpected surprise — a trilogy including motion pictures of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, and Wellesley College — produced by a Wellesley resident, Peter Benjamin of Cliff road, head of Peter Benjamin Productions, Inc.

Two more evenings of art film enrichment remain to be given during the Film Festival:

Tomorrow evening's Film Festival takes the audience to France, offering warm provincialism in "Songs of the Auvergne", and a pictorial tour of the Louvre museum. The first will feature Phyllis Curtin and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the second, narrated by Charles Boyer is an Emmy Award winner.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 2 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

OCT 16 1966

Jewish Music

The folk singer Martha Schlame will return to open the ninth annual series of the New England Jewish Music Forum Wednesday, Nov. 2, at 8:30 in Kehillath Israel Auditorium, Brookline. Noted for her program, "Songs of Many Lands," she also will sing music of Kurt Weill.

The other three events in the Forum series will include Heinrich Schalit's cantata. "Bonei Zion" for vocal quartet and narrator; cantorial masterpieces sung by outstanding New England cantors; a program of organ music for the temple with Lois Jungas, organist and Dr. Herbert Fromm, commentator; Richard Sher, 18-year-old cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who will be accompanied by his brother Daniel Sher, pianist; a literary evening with music devoted to the works of Sholom Aleichem and I. L. Peretz.

Bowdoin Wins Music Award

BRUNSWICK, Me. — For the second consecutive year Bowdoin College has won an award in a nation-wide competition among educational institutions for the performance and promotion of American music.

The National Federation of Music Clubs and the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers presented the college with an honorable mention citation for its "distinguished service to music." The award was made in a category for privately endowed colleges and universities.

Among the outstanding musical events of the past year at Bowdoin was a Carl Ruggles Festival held in January, which gave the first major recognition in this country to one of America's most important composers. During the festival, many of Ruggles' works were performed, including the American premiere of his symphony, "Suntreader," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Cape Cod
Standard Times (e)
HYANNIS, Mass.
Circ. 22,802

OCT 10 1966

Mezzo-soprano Helen Vanni Will Star In Initial Association Concert at Hyannis

HYANNIS, Oct. 10—Helen Vanni, who has starred as mezzo-soprano at the Metropolitan Opera and sung with nearly every leading symphony orchestra, will be featured at Barnstable High School auditorium in Hyannis next Monday.

This is the first of a series of concerts being presented by the Cape Cod Community Concert Association for the 1966-67 season.

Miss Vanni is a beautiful American woman who has reached stardom while still young. She grew up in Iowa in a family of music lovers. At an early age she was found to have a naturally beautiful voice and was sought for recitals even during her college days.

She got her first big break in opera at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. A contract with the Metropolitan Opera followed.

Miss Vanni has proved to be equally at home on the recital stage. Her concerts have delighted audiences across the country and she has been a great favorite at Summer festivals. She combines a rich mezzo voice with flawless musicianship.

This gifted singer with her gracious personality and attractive presence is now much in demand as opera star and also is a busy concert and recital artist.

Admission to the concert is by membership card only. The concert will begin promptly at 8:15 p.m. and late comers will be seated only when the artist is not performing.

HELEN VANNI

CAPITAL BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, November 1, 1966

Cellist Parisot to Perform At Albany Institute Nov. 9

Aldo Parisot, renowned cellist, and pianist Elizabeth Sawyer will perform in a program of music for cello and piano Nov. 9 at the Albany Institute of History and Art as the second in this season's series of concerts sponsored by the Albany Chamber Music Society.

Mr. Parisot has just recently completed a much acclaimed series in New York, "Cello Through the Centuries," a survey of the history of his instrument and the development of its repertoire.

One of the high points of the recent Tanglewood season in Lenox, Mass., was his performance of "Parisonatina Al' Dodecafonia" by Donald Martino. It was especially written for Mr. Parisot.

★ ★ ★

THIS WORK will be on the Albany program as will be Breval's sonata in G Major, Beethovens' Sonata in A Major, Opus 69, the D Minor Sonata by Debussy and Suite Populaire Espagnole by de Falla.

The appearance of Mr. Parisot and Miss Sawyer will fill the cancelation of the Vienna Trio.

The cancellation came about when one of the trio members became ill in Europe and because of it the trio will not appear at all inthe United States this year.

The concert is open only to members of the Albany Chamber Music Society. There are still some memberships left for the remainder of the season. No single tickets are sold.

ALDO PARISOT — The renowned cellist, Aldo Parisot, is scheduled to appear Nov. 9 at Albany Institute of History and Art as the second in the Albany Music Society's programs.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 370,499, SUN. 522,391

OCT 15 1966

FUTUR EPLANS—Edward Flynn, left, of Schafer, Flynn and van Dijk makes a point about the design of Blossom Music Center to George Szell, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Christopher Jaffe, right, an acoustician.

Blossom Music Center Plans OK'd

Seating capacity of the proposed music pavilion for the Cleveland Orchestra's Blossom Music Center will be slightly smaller than that of the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood and that Philadelphia Orchestra's new summer facility at Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

However, the 4,500-seat pavilion will be much larger than the Detroit Symphony Orchestra's three-year-old Meadow Brook amphitheater. Preliminary plans and sketches have been approved by trustees of the Musical Arts Association.

A MODEL of the structure, to be built at the orchestra's summer site near Peninsula, will be on display in the Severance Hall lobby after the annual meeting of the Musical Arts Association Oct. 23. The model will not, however, be set up in time for viewing by those attending an orchestra concert earlier that afternoon.

In addition to a fan-shaped 4,500-seat enclosure, the plans drawn by the Cleveland firm of Schafer, Flynn & van Dijik call for space on surrounding lawns for an additional 7,500 persons.

Tanglewood seats 6,000, with lawn space for 5,000 more. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center seats 5,103 with room for another 5,000 on its lawn. Meadow Brook seats about 2,180, with lawn space for 3,000.

Roof design for the structure has not yet been determined. This is to be settled later between the architects and acoustician Christopher Jaffe.

THE CENTER will be located on the east bank of the Cuyahoga River, midway between Peninsula and the northern edge of Akron and south of the YMCA's Camp Mueller. The pavilion will be near the bottom of a natural bowl. Orchestra management is working toward an opening date in July, 1968.

Sides of the pavilion will be open for acoustical and visual purposes, but sufficient roof overhang is planned to protect audiences from wind and rain. Ground will be broken next spring.

Meanwhile, the orchestra will be busy raising $4 million to match a $2-million grant from the Ford Foundation which will go toward financing the summer project.

Pietro Belluschi, retired dean of the department of architecture at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been appointed advisory architect. Belluschi has been involved in the planning of a new home for the Juilliard School of Music in New York City and the new Akron City Library.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,433

OCT 28 1966

Announce Production Of Rare Musical Drama

HAMILTON — Sunday, December 11, should be reserved for an exceptional production of "The Nativity According to St. Luke" at Christ Church.

A rare musical drama in seven scenes, it was written by Randall Thompson five years ago to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the founding of Christ Church of Cambridge. It has also been presented at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The lead singers that made Benjamin Britten's "Noyes Fludde" a memorable occasion in the spring at Christ church will again head the cast. Francis Hester, well - known bass-baritone of Boston; Louise Loud, contralto of Hamilton, and Lily White, soprano of Wenham, will be supported by orchestra and chorus.

James Cunningham, organist and choir director of Christ church, will serve as musical director. John Garrels of Wenham will handle stage direction. Set design is in the able hands of Thomas Cooke of Manchester and Mrs. Henry Clay of Hamilton will supply costumes.

Two performances are scheduled — a matinee at 4 p.m., and an evening performance at 8 p.m. Tickets will be available soon.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 635,619 SUN. 1,337,277

OCT 29 1966

Arts in Albuquerque

Problems in Raising Cultural Level There Are Typical of Much of U.S.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN
Special to The New York Times

ALBUQUERQUE, Oct. 28 — The problems of a city like Albuquerque in raising the level of its cultural activities are manifold, but they differ only in degree, not kind, from those of other communities in the United States. There is a desire in many quarters for lifting standards and for establishing new institutions, but there is also a good deal of inertia and hostility. Thus, a proposal for a bond issue to build a city museum has been voted down twice; yet there is an awareness of the value of a place where the visual arts can be displayed with energy and taste, as is evidenced by the respect for what the gallery at the University of New Mexico's Fine Arts Center is doing. The community, in short, senses a need to broaden its vision but seems to be unsure about the direction it should take to do it.

Critic at Large

Consider the case of the local orchestra. The Albuquerque Symphony has just observed its 35th anniversary with a gala concert whose highlight was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The only trouble was that the performance was a good deal less than memorable. A further difficulty appeared to be the failure of many in the audience to realize the shortcomings of what they heard.

This leads to the question: Is there any validity in a community orchestra that offers a limited version of a masterpiece? This question was being pondered today not only by a detached visitor but by citizens of Albuquerque who care about the quality of the community's life.

Why Live Performances?

If there were a better solution than a determination to remain faithful to an orchestra of moderate pretensions and abilities, the struggle to keep an ensemble like the Albuquerque Symphony in existence might well be abandoned. Although recordings are a useful substitute, they cannot replace the excitement of a live performance heard in the company of friends and neighbors.

What about regional orchestras of high caliber, supported by an entire state or several states? They are a possibility. In Utah, for example, there is such an ensemble, and it serves many towns in the state.

Albuquerque has worked hard to build an orchestra with an identity and to broaden its range and capacities. The city takes pride in what has been accomplished. It may overestimate the scope of these achievements, but it should not be discouraged from trying to establish its own place in the artistic sun.

But the hard question cannot be blinked: Is a mediocre Ninth worse than no local Ninth at all? If you are a perfectionist, you will answer yes. My own feeling, after sitting through such a performance and observing the audience's reaction, is that even in a less than satisfactory performance, some measure of the work's immensity came through.

But this would be only small comfort unless there were hope of improvement in future performances. The experienced and knowledgeable members of the community must therefore have the courage to point out the defects in what they hear and to fight for better things the next time. This means, in practical terms, a campaign to provide more money and superior manpower for the orchestra.

Albuquerque's prospect for eventual amelioration of its orchestral situation may be better than that for comparable towns. The manager of its orchestra is an intelligent and sensitive musician named Ralph Berkowitz, a pianist who has accompanied virtuosos like Gregor Piatigorsky and who was dean of the Music School at Tanglewood for many years. Mr. Berkowitz has begun to bring orchestras like the Boston and Philadelphia to Albuquerque for guest appearances, providing models by which local patrons may judge their own ensemble.

Helping to Form Values

Mr. Berkowitz also takes part in an annual June chamber music festival. While these programs are not a criterion for orchestral competence, they help to fix values and standards in musical taste.

In the same way, the exhibitions arranged by the University of New Mexico under the guidance of Clinton Adams, dean of the School of Fine Arts, are pace setters in the visual arts. With the limited means at their disposal, Mr. Adams and his staff prefer acquiring prints of the first order to oils of inferior quality. It is Mr. Adams's sound notion that a first-rate work by a member of a master's school can at times be worthier than a lackluster effort by the master himself.

Some day, of course, Albuquerque will decide to have a city museum. But if it cannot hope to build a collection based upon the masters, what should its purpose be? Should it concentrate on history or Indian art, as some think? Or should it adopt an alternate proposal for a collection devoted to the artists—and there have been many of talent—who have lived and worked in New Mexico.

University Is Leader

No matter where you look in the arts here, you notice the central role of the University of New Mexico. It offers the best facilities in town. The new concert hall, the spaces for art exhibitions, the pleasant and versatile recital hall are all indispensable to enlarging the community's activities. Now, there is talk of a 400-seat theater to be built within two or three years next to the new concert hall. This addition would primarily be for the use of the university's drama department, but, like the concert hall, it would be at the disposal of touring or local professional companies.

But the university, no matter how influential its role, cannot provide all the solutions to the economic and artistic problems that confront the cultural life of a city like Albuquerque. The citizens must show their goodwill, not merely by rallying round for glamorous social occasions, but for the unrelenting battle to raise standards and improve tastes as well. That means money in addition to imagination and dedication, which are the very things other communities across the land will require in the months and years to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
OCT 2 7 1966

Dichter Impresses

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

Misha Dichter is the 20-year old Californian pianist who took a second prize at last Summer's Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow. Shortly afterwards he played the Tchaikovsky B flat minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, well, but not especially impressively. On Wednesday morning, he played the opening concert of this season of Boston Morning Musicales at the Statler-Hilton Ballroom, and now he turned out to be very impressive indeed.

It turns out that he has more interesting skills, and rarer, than doing the Tchaikovsky. He can perform Haydn, and that is a claim one would make with confidence for only a very few musicians. He played the big E flat Sonata, No. 52 in most edition, and he was admirably and delightfully sensitive to the surprises, the lyricism, the fun, of this moving and subtle piece.

It was big, and the performance had a sense of drama that makes one want to hear Dichter in a Bach toccata or in one of Mozart's most operatic concertos. Pianistically the playing was usually good in that it gave a sense of filling out the entire instrument as opposed to the feeble holding back in which pianists are apt to get involved when they tackle the 18th century classics. Actually, the opening chord of Brahms's E flat Rhapsody was much louder than the one that started Haydn's Sonata, but the chords in the Haydn were so sensitively voiced and balanced that they seemed immense, and without that the piece cannot possibly be made to go.

Other than in the Haydn, Dichter made his strongest impression in two quiet Brahms Intermezzos, Op. 116, 4 in E, and Op. 118, 2 in A. The playing was reticent and intimate, beautifully managed at sound, and the pieces were understood and revealed in all their subtlety of line and texture.

The Brahms E flat Rhapsody went well, too, with less banging and more shape than usual.

The recital started with a Prelude and Fugus in A flat by Shostakovitch, playful, pretty, and unpretending until the classroom augmentation near the end of the fugue, and for Dichter mainly something to warm up on. He finished with Stravinsky's transcription from "Petrouchka," played well enough to show what dazzlingly imaginative piano writing it is, and with a striking sense for the balletic gesture.

DAILY SUN
MIAMI BEACH FLA.
D. 20,216 SUN. 20,216
OCT 1 0 1966

Casals Out, Dichter Moves In

Misha Dichter, prize-winning pianist at the 1966 Tchaikovsky International competition, is cheduled to appear with the Greater Miami Philharmonic during its coming winter season, opening with a pair of concerts in November.

The 21-year-old pianist performs the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 at the orchestra's eighth pair of concerts, March 19 and 20. Emerson Buckley, music director of the Opera Guild of Greater Miami and the Fort Lauderdale Symphony, will be guest conductor.

Dichter and Buckley appear at Miami Beach and Dade County auditoriums on the dates Pablo Casals had tentatively been scheduled to conduct his oratorio "El Pesebre."

Plans were abandoned to bring Casals here when it was discovered two artists who were to sing principal roles, Lili Chookasian and William Warfield, were unable to appear on the scheduled dates.

Warfield will be in later this season, however, singing a one-nighter for guests of the Cavalcade of Stars hotels.

Dichter, born in Shanghai, is currently a resident of Los Angeles. In capturing second prize at the Tchaikowsky competition, Dichter reportedly received the greatest ovation since Van Cliburn won the first contest in Moscow in 1958.

Dichter was the popular favorite of the Russian audience and in his concert appearances in Moscow following the competition, he was accorded some wild ovations.

After the Moscow triumph, his services were sought by a number of orchestras, but he decided to limit himself to eight appearances in order to continue his studies with Rosina Lhevinne at the Juilliard School of Music.

Dichter's first appearance in the U.S. following Moscow as with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood, Mass. in August, a program broadcast nationally by NBC-TV.

Buckley will be making his first appearance with the fledgling philharmonic, one of eight guest conductors who'll appear this season. He's entering his 17th year as director and conductor of the Opera Guild orchestra and took over the baton of the Fort Lauderdale Symphony in 1963.

He conducts regularly for the New York City Opera, the Central City, Colo., Opera House and the Empire State Music Festival

Misha Dichter

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
OCT 2 3 1966

Piano Recital

The young American pianist Misha Dichter, who won second prize in the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow in June, will give his first Boston recital Wednesday at 11 in the Statler Hilton Ballroom for the Boston Morning Musicales. His program will be announced. The 20-year-old pianist was soloist this Summer with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

RUSTON, LA.
DAILY LEADER
D. 3,500
NOV. 1 1966

New Orleans Philharmonic Appears Here

The New Orleans Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, Werner Torkanorosky, conductor, will appear November 10 in Ruston, its future secured for a number of years thanks to a grant totaling $3,000,000,000 from The Ford Foundation and local matching contributions With much talk centered on the imminent expansion of the National Pro. Football League into New Orleans, the patrons of the arts - often patrons of sports as well - have not overlooked the Symphony which is the musical keystone of the city.

Favored with the annual Sugar Bowl game, New Orleans has never had pro football but has had had the Symphony for thirty-one years. Its 85 musicians, drawn from all quarters of the globe including Korea, Japan, Russia, and Czechoslovakia (only one native New Orleanian in the New Orleans Symphony), the New Orleans ensemble has made a name for good music rivaling in depth if not popularity the city's good name for jazz. Last years' Carnegie Hall concert won the plaudits of New York critics and an earlier South American concert tour established the top quality of the Orchestra.

Van Cliburn, the Boston Symphony, and Gian-Carlo Menotti were the subjects of the well known Telephone Hour on television recently and the program's producers, just before the Orchestra leaves for Ruston will be in the Crescent City filming a coming feature: The New Orleans Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,841
NOV 3 1966

Wellesley Library Friends' Film Festival Winds Up

The Film Festival ended in a roar of applause Friday evening at Wellesley's Main Library Some 75 people viewed the final showing of the prize-winning motion pictures, most of them television documentaries, which have been sponsored by the Friends of the Wellesley Free Library for the past three weeks.

Subjects, while all of an artistic nature, covered a diversity of interests and areas — the painter Marc Chagall, New York, the Louvre in Paris, the French countryside, the Boston Symphony, Wellesley College. One of Friday evening's topics was "The Art of Collecting," in which the audience was introduced to five private American art collections by Aline B. Saarinen, former art critic of the New York Times and widow of the architect Eero Saarinen. Mrs. Saarinen pointed out that beyond being merely acquisitions these art collections reflected the distinctive taste and discrimination of their owners. Gov. Nelson Rockefeller was interviewed with regard to his modern painting collection; architect Alexander Girard's finds a folk culture caused him to build his home for the purpose of housing and displaying them. An airlines pilot, an industrialist and a businessman also discussed their highly individual collections and their own attitudes toward original art in the home.

Quebec's quixotic Lievre River was the subject of a second film. Benjamin Lampman, Canadian poet, narrated its majestic, mysterious and sometimes boisterous passage in his "Morning on the Lievre." This film, produced by the imaginative National Film Board of Canada, is a six-time award winner. The third film, an Academy-Award winner, "Clay" was of an experimental nature, a Harvard student production handled by Eliot Noyes, Jr.

These films are all a part of the Boston Public Library's film collection and are loaned, free-of-charge, to responsible interested club and school groups. Euclid J. Peltier of Wellesley, Chief of their Audio-Visual Department, and Treasurer of the Wellesley Friends, arranged for their showings here and introduced them to the audiences. Peter Benjamin of Cliff road, Wellesley, himself a film producer, served as projectionist.

THE BOSTON HERALD
D. 167,765 SUN. 280,099
NOV 6 1966
McLAREN HARRIS, Music Critic

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
NOV 6 1966

Professor Burgin Chats on Music

"Ask him what he's doing at Florida State and how he likes Tallahassee," someone said as we joined Richard Burgin for a box-lunch buffet at Symphony Hall recently.

Mr. Burgin, having retired as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, is now Eminent Professor of Music at Florida State University; he plays violin in the quartet-in-residence and heads the university's conducting symposium. He was in Boston to conduct the symphony in a week-long series of concerts.

We meant to ask him about Tallahassee and Florida State, but when one talks with a conductor and former concert-master of the Symphony who has reached a vintage 74 and whose musical background is among the richest found anywhere, the temptation to reminisce is quite irresistible. So we began with the present and progressed—backward.

Mr. Burgin was to be soloist-conductor in Bach's A minor Violin Concerto the following day. How did he look upon the combined roles?

"WELL, SOME people like it," the conductor replied. "It is nice to do everything, you know, but I find it a little bit cumbersome. I'm quite busy enough as a soloist.

"It will be rather an informal affair," Mr. Burgin hinted referring to the coming performance. "I give a couple of beats to get things started and the orchestra takes it from there." As we witnessed the next day, "informal" may have been the right word but the performance was anything but casual.

Mr. Burgin has had a long career on both sides of the podium, having begun violin at age 5—"I started late," he joked, "but Ruth (Mrs. Burgin), you know, began at 3½" — and has played under virtually all the great conductors. We asked him about another combination role, that of composer-conductor.

"One finds a certain timidity there," he said. "Many composers feel awkward on the podium. They can be very objective during rehearsals and know exactly what they want, but in concert they become too personally involved. Ravel was a classic example. He once managed to conduct 'La Valse' in four—all the way through."

Then he singled out some others.

"RICHARD STRAUSS was really first-rate—when he was interested," said Mr. Burgin. "He did some Mozart and Wagner, but mostly he did his own works. He loved 'Till Eulenspiegel' and the 'Sinfonia Domestica' but other than these he just beat time."

SCHOENBERG: "He used to bother the players in his orchestra a great deal, but he was an extremely interesting conductor; each gesture had a point to it."

PROKOFIEV: "Quite good, particularly with his own works."

AND STRAVINSKY: "He was wonderful in rehearsal; he could tell you precisely what he wanted, but in a concert anything could happen."

Mr. Burgin added an anecdote about Debussy. "When conducting 'L'Apres- Midi d'un Faune,' he would pause when he came to a certain phrase and murmur, 'Ah, c'est si beau!" and then the music would go on."

THE SYMPHONIES of Mahler owe at least a portion of their renown to this conductor; he introduced the Fourth to Boston during the early 1940's when the artistic hierarchy was against it. "I wanted to do the complete Fourth, but the trustees said no. Mahler was taboo—people considered him long, tedious and everything else wrong. I always liked Mahler very much; so I compromised and asked to do the last two movements of the Fourth. They agreed.

"Then, after the performance, we got letters asking, why don't we do the whole symphony? So I was allowed to do it later that season."

As he likes to devote his whole attention to being a soloist when that is his job, so he is meticulous about his conducting chores, and always uses a score. Someone brought up the question of conductors' memories.

"SOME HAVE very good memories, and your present conductor, Mr. Leinsdorf, is one of them," Mr. Burgin said earnestly. "The most remarkable memory I ever encountered was that of Guido Cantelli. He knew literally every part. But even these people are not entirely infallible. Toscanini, you know, once had a slip and had to stop and go back to the beginning.

"Igor Markevitch, who also had an excellent memory, said once that he believed that it would be impossible to write one page exactly as it appears in the score. And furthermore, the same would probably be true for the composer, if he were asked to do it a few weeks after it was written.

"I prefer to have the score in front of me," he concluded wisely.

RICHARD BURGIN

245
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600
NOV 6 1966

Consular Wives Aid Boston Causes

Standing beside a painting by her talented husband, Canada's Consul General Stuart Hemsley, one of Boston's most delightful hostesses welcomes the consular corps.

Boston's decorative Mrs. Edward Sherman, wife of the honorary consul for Haiti.

Spain's Consul General and Senora Victor Sanchez-Mesas greet the Hemsleys.

New and nice, the wife (center) of British Consul General Ralph Selby.

Wife of German Consul Paul Kurbjuhn, also new in Boston this year.

It's a Giant Step Along Road to Peace

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN
Society Editor

One of them gives hospital time five days a week.

Another is a full-time scientist.

A young, pretty mother is teaching in a university here.

They all speak at least three languages, often as many as seven, are intelligent and imaginative hostesses constantly, and still manage to devote more time and talent to Boston's good causes than most of their Boston neighbors.

They're the consular wives—and they bring with them a world's-eye point of view from the many fascinating countries where their husbands have served.

Together with their husbands, they lend an international luster to the familiar Boston scene and help to bring here the representative people of their countries—ambassadors, educators, musicians, students.

Though they're part-time Bostonians—two to four years at the most usually—Consular husbands and wives give full time attendance at the city's civic and social occasions.

And honors in the name of their nation's have gone generously to distinguished Bostonians like Richard Cardinal Cushing, naval historian Samuel Eliot Morison, Julius Stratton of M.I.T. and the Ford Foundation, William Morris Hunt, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, the Boston Symphony's Harry Ellis Dickson, the late Merrill Griswold, Mrs. George F. Bemis, and many more.

At the party the Consular Dean, Canada's talented Stuart Hemsley, gave with his attractive and friendly wife, subjects, languages and guests ranged the far corners of the earth, from Montreal's Expo 67 to Istanbul's Institut-Munich, from a new book about Khartoum to a new festival in Greece.

Their friendship is one of the giant steps on the road to peace.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Eagle (e)
CLAREMONT, N. H.
Circ. 7,036
NOV 9 1966

Greenberg Tells Of Music Series Sharps, Flats

CLAREMONT, N. H. -- Rotarian Max Greenberg, past president of the Twin State Valley Music Assn., touched on highlights of the association's decade of existence here in his talk to club members at their Tuesday luncheon.

His talk contained references to artists who had appeared here during the past ten years, to the zooming prices which successful performers can command, and to the problem of underwriting the yearly series of concerts and obtaining satisfactory quality.

Greenberg's talk ranged over various fields of music, including the new "Met," its artists, its price scale, its opera schedules and the "standby" understudies vital to the continuity of its productions.

Included also were musical previews of brief portions of the programs to be given by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra have next Monday, and of Verdi's "La Traviata," scheduled here in April.

The orchestra recording was by the Boston Symphony group, and the vocal excerpts were from an old-time record by the NBC Orchestra with Toscanini as director, made some 20 years ago.

Pres. James Dow announced two upcoming meetings, a Rotary information night on Nov. 16 and a club assembly Nov. 22.

Visiting Rotarians were Roger W. Brown, A. M. Stoddard and John Burleigh of Windsor, Vt., Emerson Lewis of Newport, N.H., and Guy Wilson, ex-Claremonter, from Concord, N.H.

The Saginaw News
SAGINAW, MICH.
D. 57,273 SUN. 57,361
NOV 8 1966

English, Speech Credit Offered In CMU Travel-Study Courses

MOUNT PLEASANT — The deadline for reservations for the Central Michigan University New York travel-study courses is Nov. 18, according to Miss Sharon Haupt, Field Services. Two courses are available, each offering university credit and scheduled for Jan. 27 through Feb. 5.

The New York theater travel-study course offers credit in English Speech 225, or students may audit the course. The trip will include tickets to five well-known theater productions, trips to the United Nations, Radio City Music Hall, Rockefeller Center, Lincoln Center and a tour of Manhattan Island. In addition, the group will visit the salon of a New York fashion stylist.

The cost is $198 and covers all university fees, transportation by CMU bus, hotel accommodations as well as tips in connection with hotel rooms. Meals and spending money are not included. A deposit of $58 is necessary by Nov. 18 in order to secure reservations for the trip. Dr. J. Alan Hammack, CMU drama professor, is instructor for the course.

Offering credit in Music 206 is the New York musical arts travel-study course with Norman Dietz as instructor. This course also may be audited. The trip will be highlighted by attending a performance of the New York City Ballet and concerts by the Philharmonic, Philadephia and Boston Symphony orchestras. Also included is a trip to Birdland dance hall and a visit to a live television show. Two musical productions and tours of the United Nations, Metropolitan Museum of Art also are scheduled.

The cost of this travel-study course also is $198 and covers all tour expenses, college fees and transportation except meals and personal spending money.

Information concerning either course may be obtained from Miss Haupt, Field Services, Central Michigan University, Mount Pleasant.

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT
D. 45,500
NOV. 11 1966

Chicago Orchestra to Play In Bucknell's Artist Series

LEWISBURG — The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, directed by Jean Martinon, will play at Bucknell University Thursday night, one of the principal stops on the orchestra's current tour.

The French-born conductor who succeeded the late Fritz Reiner as music director of the orchestra in 1963, will direct the performance in Bucknell's Davis Gymnasium at 8:15 p.m. The concert is one of the university's 1966-67 Artist Series programs.

Celebrating its diamond jubilee this year, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra is the third oldest symphony in America. It was founded in 1891 by Theodore Thomas and is preceded in time only by the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Chicago's was the first orchestra in this country to own a permanent home and is the only symphony maintaining its own training body, The Civic Orchestra of Chicago.

American audiences first heard Martinon when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1957. A conductor, composer and violinist, he has continued to work in all three areas and recently completed symphony "Altitudes," commissioned for the 75th anniversary of the Chicago Symphony. He attended the Paris Conservatory, studying composition with Albert Roussel and conducting with Charles Munch. His conducting career has been worldwide.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 103,937 SUN. 214,409
NOV 19 1966

ARLINGTON STATE

Library to Get Professor's Work

By MARTHA HAND
Star-Telegram Mid-Cities Bureau

Arlington State College's veteran English professor and novelist, Dr. Cothburn M. O'Neal, will be present Sunday and Monday for the dedication of the Mugar Memorial Library at Boston University.

The new structure will house his life works.

His eight novels and personal letters and papers will be included in the collection of modern American authors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the dedication.

Dr. O'Neal, an ASC faculty member 28 years, wrote "The Gods of Our Time," about the beatnik crowd with whom he was associated in an early career as a musician.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
REPORTER
W-CIRC N.AVAIL.
NOV 10 1966

To the Greater Miami Philharmonic Orchestra:

On the occasion of the launching of your second season, I would like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the Board of Trustees, the management, the conductor and the orchestra.

I think Greater Miami can be very proud of having such a fine group and supported by the community.

It was indeed a pleasure for me to conduct one of the Twilight Concerts at the Marine Stadium last summer.

Though officially one year old, I wish you a long life, success and prosperity.

Very sincerely,

Arthur Fiedler
Conductor

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director
THOMAS D. PERRY, JR., Manager
SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02115
Telephone: (617) COmmonwealth 6-1492

To the Miami Philharmonic Orchestra:

We of the Boston Symphony Orchestra join the many other friends of the Miami Philharmonic Orchestra in saluting you on your first anniversary and in wishing you continued success for many years to come. Miami is indeed fortunate to have an orchestra such as the Miami Philharmonic contributing to its cultural life.

Erich Leinsdorf

WATERLOO, IOWA
COURIER
D. 52,000 S. 53,000
NOV 20 1966

YOUNG ARTIST—Tom Krause, 32, prominent Finnish baritone, is shown here in costume as Guglielmo in "Cosi Fan Tutte." Krause will be the featured performer at the second performance of the 1966 Waterloo Teachers Community Concert, Tuesday at 8:15 p.m. in the West High Auditorium. He has been ranked as the leading singer of Sibelius and is an established star in Europe, and is under contract to the Hamburg State Opera in Hamburg, Germany.

Krause, Finnish Baritone, In Concert Here Tuesday

The second concert in the 1966 Waterloo Teachers Community Concert will feature the prominent young Finnish baritone, Tom Krause. The concert is set for West High Auditorium Tuesday at 8:15 p.m. with admission by membership card.

Krause made his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on July 27, 1963. His performance was well received here and he is an established star in Europe. He is considered the leading singer of Sibelius.

Krause is 32 years old. He studied medicine at one time but became so adept at singing he changed his plans and studied both singing and acting at the Academy of Music in Vienna from 1956 to 1959.

He won a two-year contract with the Stadttischhe Opera of Berlin in 1958 and was soon in great demand. He now lives in Germany and is under contract to the Hamburg State Opera.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Wednesday, November 23, 1966

Israel Frontier Town Unfazed by Arab Guns

By HAL McCLURE

EIN GEV, Israel (AP) — Life — and business — go on as usual at this little Sea of Galilee kibbutz lying in the shadow of Syrian guns.

"We may look blase to visitors," says Ya'Acov Steinberg, a kibbutz official, "but we never really get used to it."

The Ein Gev kibbutz, a farm and commercial cooperative settlement, lies on the Syrian frontier on the eastern shore of Galilee, the heart of New Testament country.

To the north Christ preached the Sermon on the Mount and performed the miracle of the loaves and fishes. To the west are Mt. Tabor and Nazareth.

But more important for Ein Gev are the steep Syrian hills rising to the east. Arab gun posts on the heights can easily zero in on the little settlement of 400 men, woman, and children.

* * *

TROUBLE is no stranger to Ein Gev, the first Jewish settlement founded, in 1937, on the eastern Galilee shore.

During Israel's war of independence it was besieged by Syrian troops for 11 months and at one time completely isolated. It has been attacked a number of times since. Kibbutz field workers often are the target of Syrian guns.

Kibbutz residents had a lakeside view recently of a battle that included firing between Israeli patrol boats and Syrian planes and shore batteries, plus a spectacular dogfight. Two Syrian jets were shot down, one splashing into Galilee nearby.

"Our children remained in the kibbutz bomb shelters for several days then," Steinberg recalls. "We really didn't know what would happen."

* * *

THESE cement bunkers contain rows of small beds, and even cribs, running water, electricity, tinned food and first aid supplies.

All bunkers and buildings are connected by a maze of reinforced slit trenches that provide the residents free movement out of sight from Syrian positions.

The buildings are concrete block, unattractive but sturdy.

Two bullet-and-bomb damaged wooden houses on the outskirts of the kibbutz are shown to visitors as the reason for the changeover to concrete construction.

Ein Gev is one of the few Israeli kibbutzim with an international reputation — for its music and fish. The music-loving kibbutz members sponsor annual concerts that have had such performers as Yehudi Menuhin and the late Serge Koussevitsky. Its 2,500-seat ampitheater is patterned after the open-air "shed" at Tanglewood, in Massachusetts.

The kibbutz' lakeside restaurant is one of Israel's favorite, renowned for its tasty St. Peter's fish from the Sea of Galilee.

* * *

MAIN income is from bananas and other crops grown in the 800-acre kibbutz fields. Ein Gev also produces 2 million tins of sardines annually from the Sea of Galilee.

DEERFIELD, ILL.
REVIEW AND
VERNON REVIEW
W. 4,161
NOV 16 1966

CONCERT PIANIST — Grant Johannesen, who has harvested acclaim on five continents, will play in the Community Concerts Assn. concert Friday night in the Highland Park High School auditorium.

Johannesen To Play Here Friday

Directors of the Community Concerts Assn. announced this week that Grant Johannesen will play Friday's concert at Highland Park High School instead of Leon Fleischer, who cancelled because of illness.

Johannesen appeared in Moscow in 1965 with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra and was awarded six curtain calls. He received critical acclaim during his 1965 spring tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the East.

Johannesen will perform selections by Rameau, Beethoven, Cesar, Franck, Schumann, Debussy and Charbrier at the 8:15 p.m. concert

247

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,404

NOV 12 1966

Crystal Ball

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

Leonard Bernstein outside the Staatsoper in March 1965.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT last week that Leonard Bernstein would not sign on again in the spring of 1969 when his contract with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra expired was as great a surprise as the abdication of Edward VIII and as great a reversal, as Red Smith once said, as Serutan.

Immediately millions of busy brains went into high gear. Individuals wondered; soda counters, cocktail bars, back fences and front pralors, all were the scenes of gossip and queries: "What's the Philharmonic going to do?" "What's Lenny going to do?"

One of the greatest small gratifications of life is the discussion and solution of the other fellow's problems. We imagine or guess or we are sure this or that is going to happen. We know who is going to present himself as a candidate and, at election time, who is going to win. This isn't the same kind of prescience exhibited at a race track, for there another race is started in a minute and the issue is not so important. We do have one morsel of information which we divulge with some misgiving and reluctance, but if you will notice the date of Lenny's projected retirement and the bruited dates of Bobby's intention of tossing his hat in the ring, don't you see the significance of it? Can you dream of a better ticket than Bobby and Lenny?

* * *

BERNSTEIN is quoted as saying that he wants to devote more time to composition. He surely would be warranted in following that decision as his compositions, up to now, in most cases have been great successes. It would be a pity if he were to continue swinging a baton all the rest of his life and thereby deprive the public of endless pleasure and satisfaction his compositions might afford us, to say nothing of the added renown and deeper gratification personally.

Lenny is the unhappy victim of an excess of talents. To think of the loss the Philharmonic will suffer if deprived of his dynamic leadership, his eager musical curiosity and bold pioneering suggests the difficulty they will have to replace him. But conductors move around. Their union, if they have one, has members everywhere on earth. But where a man from the Philharmonic would go, of his own volition, is a unique problem. After all, how far is up?

IN MARCH of this year, Bernstein went off on a short vacation and showed up as guest conductor of the Vienna Hof Opera. On March 17, the Vienna Express stated that "the Vienna Philharmonic is trying to make a contract with Leonard Bernstein." One must wish them luck, in the interest of the orchestra as well as of the public, for Bernstein, without any doubt, belongs to the category of peak directors of world rank. The Eagle printed a translation of the story a few days later and even went so far as to do a little discreet pussyfooting around certain quarters where knowledge of such events might be denied or corroborated, but we ran into ignorism. (Ignorance is not to know; ignorism is not to want to know.)

The whole musical world began playing orchestral checkers, moving conductors around with great delight. We in the Berkshires have had a longer acquaintance with Bernstein's career than any other terrain on which he has jousted. If was here, at Tanglewood, under the aegis of Koussevitzky that he first came to notice and was given his first chance. Koussevitzky recognized his potentialities, and it was here that Bernstein started for [illegible] that [illegible] to [illegible] he got there. He got a break or two; but the man's gifts were irrepressible.

Lenny started to compose while still at Tanglewood. During the war his song cycle "I Hate Music" was first sung by Jenny Tourel with the composer at the piano in the Lenox Library hall. His one-act operetta "Trouble in Tahiti," a sort of sophisticated "Our Town"-type story, was sung by the Berkshire Music Center students in the theatre-concert hall.

* * *

BERNSTEIN cannot have been an easy star for the Philharmonic trustees to manage or live with. He was always off in five directions and so the orchestra had a longer list and greater diversification of guest conductors than most orchestras, and boards of trustees, have to contend with. There were many who contended that this polyandrous situation was not of benefit to the organization and, indeed, the orchestra was in danger of being relegated in public opinion to a lower rank and status. Such is no longer the case. The New York Philharmonic under Bernstein needs give way to no other.

I have often wondered as, I'm sure, have many others, too, why a man like Herbert von Karajan has not accepted a post in the United States. It would seem almost a certainty that he would have been offered one. He has commanded Europe in his way not too much unlike Hitler in his heyday or Napoleon. The comparison, of course, is a nasty one, for Karajan goes only where invited. But he has not hesitated to extend his hegemony until he has become the master of most of best opera houses and orchestral halls of Europe.

It's going to be difficult to follow Lenny in New York. When Toscanini held the post, he was not only conceded dominance from every angle but no one wanted to displace him, much as no one wanted to take Mickey Mantle out of the lineup, disabilities or no. When Toscanini finally stepped down, no man of substantive rank wanted to attempt to step into his shoes. Finally Barbirolli was brought from England, a man half the age of his predecessor. He was a man of small physical stature as was Toscanini, but the public noticed it in Barbirolli.

* * *

DISCIPLINE became a serious problem. The young Englishman asked the orchestra to do this or that and they insolently reminded the new man how Toscanini had done it. Indeed, one of the first-chair men left. He would not allow a young whippersnapper to tell him, a man who had played to Toscanini's satisfaction, how to bow or phrase. Steinbergh in the immediate past has been the man most frequently called from the bench. Szell in Cleveland has given his orchestra a polish not outshone in the world. The young American Lorin Maazel has won many laurels in Europe. There is a small platoon of younger eligibles in the stag line, although if there is one place on earth where age is not a limitation, it is on the conductor's podium. Think of the late Toscanini and Monteux, and still of Stokowski and Ansermet. Mental agility suffices long after muscular gestures.

There is no important conductor today who also composes unless one counts Boulez in Paris. Richard Strauss was a conductor although he concentrated mainly on his own music. Gustave Mahler was another. Bernstein obviously does not consider composing a moonlighting job. As much as he will be missed in Philharmonic Hall, his decision may be the means of bringing greater and more lasting joy to more people. Here's wishing him well.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

World Journal Tribune (e)
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 3 1966

Bernstein . . . Philharmonic's Replacement Problem

By ALAN RICH

When Leonard Bernstein's first musical comedy, "On the Town," began its Boston run the young composer-conductor was taken aside by his teacher, Serge Koussevitzky, and given a long and stern lecture. "You must choose," the conductor of the Boston Symphony said in efect. "You cannot be everything."

It is now 22 years later. The Olympian Koussevitzky is long since dead, and his former protege, who yesterday announced that he would no longer be the conductor of the New York Philharmonic after his present contract expires, has become the everything that his teacher had thought impossible.

When the two men talked that night, an old and a new order were in touch. Leonard Bernstein has been the prime shaping force in that new order. For better or for worse, he has made the symphonic conductor a public figure, along with movie stars and nightclub singers. He escorts Jacqueline Kennedy, he is seen at Beatles movies with his children (singing along, an observer breathlessly reports), his gyrations on the podium are as familiar to the multitude as Mickey Mantle's stance in the batter's box.

★ ★ ★

Call him Lenny. The men in the orchestra do, and so do people who have never met him. That's part of the new order.

Leonard Bernstein became Lenny by becoming that impossible everything. There were other shows after "On the Town." There has also been a sizable output of music for the concert hall, a ballet and a short opera. There have been radio and television shows, a book or two. And all this forms an aura that hangs close around his shoulders when he steps onto the podium to lead the New York Philharmonic.

All this has established a new order, as well, in concert-going. You can't buy tickets very easily to a Leonard Bernstein concert, because he is a celebrity. Naturally, everyone who leads a major symphony is a celebrity ex officio, but this isn't always enough to sell out a concert.

Under the Bernstein leadership the New York Philharmonic has become an adjunct of show business. Its conductor has done nothing to weaken that connection. On the podium—or, often as not, several inches above it—he is a sight that would come across to a deaf man. He has turned around from time to time, not so much to talk to the audience as to chat with it. By so doing, he has gone a step further to cleanse symphony-going of its old Olympian mystery.

One could throw up his hands in despair at all this, except for one thing. Mr. Bernstein also happens to possess the goods. He is a dazzlingly talented conductor.

★ ★ ★

The kind of music that suits his personality—a wide choice embracing Haydn, Liszt, Mahler, Stravinsky and certain moderns—gets from him performances of stunning impact. When he is up against something outside his range of sympathy, a fairly common occurrence, he makes mistakes that are interesting and stimulating. He is electrifying on the podium, along with uplifting, irritating, infuriating, arbitrary and stupendous. He is never dull.

The public image he has created for himself is many-sided, but it is completely consistent. It isn't a matter of Dr. Jekyl conducting the Philharmonic and Mr. Hyde composing "West Side Story;" it is all part of the same man.

His effect on music has been tremendous, and most of it has been to the good. There were long faces a decade ago about the impending death of the symphony orchestra as an institution. Mr. Bernstein may have saved the patient, and he has certainly given it a reprieve. By his own enchantment of the Philharmonic concerts, he has made the American public excited about all orchestras.

★ ★ ★

His methods are occasionally open to question, of course. His television shows are slick, and he is not above evading a point of information when it interferes with smoothness. His attempts to put Philharmonic audiences on easy terms with the musical avant garde a few seasons ago were disastrous, because his presentations were glib and patronizing and his performances were atrocious.

Another conductor might have done this particular series better, and not carried through some other idea as well. Any major leader in the cultural world has got to make mistakes now and then.

Leonard Bernstein created a new order, that of the public musician-of-the-world, versatile, and with great facility in stating his case in a variety of media.

The precedent he has set is a dangerous one. It would be sheer madness for the Philharmonic, in looking for a successor to Mr. Bernstein, to try to find another Lenny. It would be just as foolhardy, of course, for the orchestra to bend over backwards to avoid a successor in the Bernstein image.

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 252,084 SUN. 339,533

NOV 27 1966

Russian Violinist To Play in Denvver

LEONID KOGAN
In Denver concert debut.

Leonid Kogan, Russian violinist, will make his Denver debut at 7:30 p.m. Monday and 8:30 p.m. Tuesday with the Denver Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Vladimir Golschmann. The identical concerts will be in the Auditorium Theatre.

Kogan will perform Brahms' Concerto in D Major for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77. He made his U.S. debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1958 and is making his fourth American tour under a U.S.-Soviet cultural exchange agreement.

Kogan, 42, was born in Denproprestrovsk, Russia, and began to study the violin at age 7. He entered the Moscow Conservatory three years later and made his Moscow debut at 16. He won the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Prize in 1951.

Kogan combines concert appearances with teaching master classes at the Moscow Conservatory. He is married to Elizabeth Gilels, sister of pianist Emil Gilels.

The Denver Symphony Orchestra will perform three contemporary works. Francis Thorne's "Elegy" was composed in 1962 in memory of his parents and had its first U.S. performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1964. Erik Satie's "Deux Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, was written for the piano and was inspired by the victory of Sparta over the Argives and the festival marking it.

The concert also will include the Symphony No. 3 in G Minor by Albert Roussel, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930.

Tickets for both Monday and Tuesday programs are available at the May-D&F box office, 825-3644.

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 191,124 SUN. 202,000

NOV 27 1966

Violinist Leonid Kogan To Play With Symphony

Three 20th century composers will be represented at the next pair of Denver Symphony Orchestra subscription concerts Monday and Tuesday, Nov. 28 and 29, in the Auditorium Theater.

They are Francis Thorne, Erik Satie and Albert Roussel. The fourth composer represented in Johannes Brahms.

Playing Brahms' Concerto in D Major for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77, which is the only violin concerto the composer wrote, will be the famous Russian violinist, Leonid Kogan. Kogan, who is making his first Denver appearance, is considered by many to be the greatest Russian violinist today.

The concert will open with Elegy by New York-born Francis Thorne. The composition was written in 1962 in memory of the composer's parents and had its first American performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in November 1964.

The second work, Deux Gymnopedies, by Erik Satie, was orchestrated by Claude Debussy.

Originally written for the piano, the piece was inspired by the ancient Spartan festival — "Gymnopaedia" — which commemorated the Spartan victory over the Argives at Thyrea.

The final piece on the first half of the program will be Symphony No. 3 in G Minor by Albert Roussel, which was written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930.

The final half of the program will be devoted to the Brahm's Violin Concerto.

Tickets for both performances (Monday concerts begin at 7:30 p.m. and Tuesdays at 8:30 p.m.) are on sale at the Symphony box office at the May-D&F, 825-3644, and range in price from $4.90 to $1.25.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

OGDENSBURG ADVANCE NEWS
Sunday, November 27, 1966

Noted Pianist Appearing With Syracuse Symphony Has A Dramatic Background

Syracuse — Many will find rewarding pleasure in the musical virtuosity of Claude Frank as he preforms Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 25, in C, with the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra in Lincoln Auditorium, Dec. 16 and 17. However, few will be aware of the story behind the artist's career than began when he was a child of seven and led to a course of events as dramatic as any writer could hope to create.

Born in Germany, Claude Frank was surrounded by music as a child. By the time he was seven he already was deeply involved with the piano, so much so that the most effective form of punishment his parents could devise was to forbid him his regular practicing time. If the young artist's rapid progress was any indication, this discipline must have been used sparingly.

AT 11, AUDIENCE WITH SCHNABEL

When he was eleven, Claude had a chance to play for the great pianist Artur Schnabel, then living and teaching in Italy. Although Schnabel confirmed the young man's talent, he considered Frank too young to study directly with him. However, Claude under his guidance, he arranged for him to study with a former pupil, who was then living in Paris.

By this time the clouds of World War II were gathering, and in 1933 the Franks left Germany for Pairs where Claude was able to study until the advancing tide of the German army made it necessary for them to move on.

For several months they lived with a French family in a small Pyrenees village until it also became unsafe. After that their biggest problem was simply getting out of France. Since they were not "legally in France, there was no way for them to get papers to "legally" leave. The time-honored refugee solution to this seemingly unresolvable dilemma was, simply, bribery. This made it possible for them to reach Madrid. However, they were unable to get to Portugal, their ultimate goal, before their Spanish visa ran out. By the time Claude Frank was fourteen, he and his family were literally without a country.

No matter where he found himself, Claude also found a piano. One such place was Madrid's Mozart Hall, where he soon attracted much attention and people began to come to the Hall just to listen. Word of his pianistic abilities began to spread.

VISAS TO BRAZIL AND U.S.

Taking an interest in him after Claude had performed at an Embassy party on short notice, the Brazilian ambassador arranged for a visa to his country. However, another guest at the ambassador's party was a member of the American consulate and before long he got an American visa for the Franks. By this, they were in effect, refugees no longer. Their flight was over.

The Franks arrived in New York in 1941, and Claude was soon knocking on Artur Schnabel's door. This time, young or not, Claude was accepted as a Schnabel student and spent the next several years studying with that great artist.

In 1944, when he was eighteen, the impact of war once again touched Frank. He was drafted into the American Infantry. When he became a civilian again, in 1946, he resumed studies with Schnabel and the same year, became an [illegible] citizen.

RUDOLF SERKIN IMPRESSED

However, one of the most important turns in his career, an event that led him in the direction of becoming a concert pianist, was a call in 1953 from Rudolf Serkin, who asked him to help at Marlboro.

So impressed was Serkin with Frank's performance ability that he advised the young pianist to give up teaching and all other musical activities to devote himself strictly to playing. Serkin said to him, "If the playing is really your life and you are really prepared, the concerts will simply come."

This is what has really happened. Frank by this time, has appeared as a soloist with nearly every major symphony in the United States and Canada, as well as Europe. He has appeared with Boston Symphony under Munch and Leinsdorf, and the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein; now records under the RCA Victor label and appeared last year with the Boston Symphony in a recent NBC-TV biography of Beethoven.

PALM SPRINGS, CALIF.
DESERT SUN
D. 9,000

NOV 27 1966

Greater Miami Philharmonic Will Present An All-French Program

An all-French program will be presented at the third pair of concerts of the Greater Miami Philharmonic on Sunday, December 4th at Miami Beach Auditorium and Monday, December 5th at Dade County Auditorium.

The two guest artists, conductor Alain Lombard and pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre, are natives of France. They will perform works by their fellow countrymen Hector Berlioz and Camille Saint--Saens.

Jeanne-Marie Darre, considered "France's First Lady of the Keyboard," will be making one of her rare orchestral appearances in this country. Although well-known in Europe for more than 30 years, she did not make her American orchestral debut until 1962 when she appeared with the Boston Symphony.

Guest conductor Alain Lombard is a winner of the 1966 Mitropoulos International Competition for conductors. The 26-year-old Frenchman is now assistant to Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic.

For his Miami appearance Lombard will lead the Greater Miami Philharmonic in Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique, a programmatic symphony in five movements. The work, subtitled by the composer "An Episode in the Life of an Artist," is actually a passionate, autobiographical testament in which Berlioz expresses his unrequited love for the actress Henrietta Smithson. The work was first performed in Paris on December 5th in 1836. Thus, Monday night's concert will mark the 136th anniversary of the premiere of Symphonie Fantastique.

Jeann-Marie Darre will play Saint Saens' Piano Concerto No. 2.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

NOV 6 1966

Boston Schools Today

By BERTRAM G. WATERS

Robert L. Murray is a talented young mathematics teacher who has won the right to design Boston's most controversial experiment in education — the Central High School.

After 12 years at Technical High, he served two years as head of the math department at English High School before joining the Subsystem last March.

He was transferred two weeks ago to the Title III design project for work on the campus high school and, when time permits, three "fringe area" elementary schools.

Murray is a little awed by the task and well might be. Preliminary specifications for the school—still called "English High" by some—include provisions for a swimming pool and two gymnasiums, language laboratories and eating facilities in all six student "houses," and ungraded classes allowing movement both vertically and horizontally for each student.

The "dream school" for Boston "will be tailored to meet the individual needs and talents of all its students through broad and flexible programming," according to the outline approved by the school committee.

Murray brings to the task at hand a perspective that will encourage such ideals.

"My background is in a large high school where boys can remain annonymous for four years," he says. "At English, we might see a boy in one class as a junior and then never again."

As head of math at English High, Murray was responsible for some of the guidance function for boys in his speciality who were heading for college, or a business school. He found it difficult to advise intelligently on the basis of a brief professional acquaintance.

The Central High plan should solve that. Three thousand boys and girls will be split into "houses" of 500 each where they will study, eat and exercise for four years. All programs will be available in each house — college, vocational, cultural, recreational and community.

Murray suffers innovator's fear of traditional "tracks" at the high school level, believing them to be responsible for a rigid approach to variable human beings. He hopes for a flexible approach in a series of buildings that are also flexible.

At work on the project only two weeks, he is already facing a Jan. 1 deadline for presenting some space requirements to the Redevelopment Authority and architect Paul Rudolph. It is not an ideal task.

"We're doing it the wrong way," explains Evans Clincy, director of Program Development. "We should have two or three years to design the curriculum and then figure out what sort of buildings would serve it best."

ROBERT MURRAY

Innovators are always idealists at heart. Clincy and Murray realize, however, that the architect has to start somewhere. The school is already years behind, and is not expected to open before 1971.

There are certain ground rules that give Murray a starting point. Class ratios have definitely been set at 1-25 maximum, and central facilities must be able to handle an eventual 5000 students.

All the buildings on the campus must include facilities useful to the community as well as students—theatres, lecture halls, kitchens, an auditorium and club rooms. The school will be open day and night, year-round.

To design the various courses, Murray and Herbert G. Forsell, Title III coordinator for Boston, will call on members of the Advisory Committee set up for this purpose. The committee includes representatives of local universities, civic and social agencies, and cultural forces such as the Boston Symphony and Museum of Fine Arts.

Education specialists now at work in the Subsystem will also draw on these many talents.

"No one really knows what an urban school should be," notes Clincy. "For the first time, local expertise will be involved in what a 'city school' means. We want to pull everyone into the act."

Clincy, Murray and Forsell are visiting large high schools across the country to pick up ideas and profit from others' mistakes. One such trip to New Haven may lead to a request for carpeting in all parts of the central High school as a noise and traction dampener.

But Murray has no illusions about his role, despite armies of available help.

"As I see it," he says, "the burden of proof is on us. When we know what we want, I hope we will have enough reasons to justify what we're doing and convince the school committee we're right."

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

NOV 18 1966

Buddy, the Drum Wonder

At 18 months, Bernard Rich was carried onstage on the seat of his pants to play drums in his parents' vaudeville act. At six, sporting a sailor suit and Lord Fauntleroy curls, he played the Tivoli theater circuit as "Traps, the Drum Wonder." At seven, he toured Australia for $1,000 a week, and at eleven conducted his own band. Now a greying 49, Buddy Rich is still the Drum Wonder, still hanging on by the seat of his pants.

Only this time around he may have a real grip on something. When he announced six months ago that he was forming the new Buddy Rich Band, the boys in the business merely yawned. Cocky, flip, belligerent, Rich had drummed his way in and out of more orchestras, mismanaged more money than any ten musicians. The new Buddy Rich Band? Another one of his fancies for the moment, shrugged Bandleader Stan Kenton. But then, to everyone's surprise, the band not only materialized but drew enthusiastic, sellout crowds in Las Vegas and Los Angeles. Marveled Kenton: "Rich is serious!"

Whirring Propellers. Last week musicians of all stripes gathered at Manhattan's Basin Street East to hear for themselves. Perched on a pyramid of risers, Rich set a blistering pace, insistently coaxing but never intruding. And when it came time for his solo, all 16 of his sidemen, like disciples at the feet of the master, craned in their chairs to watch and listen. Feet dancing, hands whirring like propellers, he sparked a kind of static electricity between cymbals and drums, tossing in an extra riff here, a random bass line there. His rolls were incredibly fast, his technique and rhythmic continuity flawless.

"He's a freak," said one bass player afterward. It was an expression of respect, for Rich has always been ranked by musicians as a drummer's drummer. They marvel at the fact that he never practices, has none of the calluses and bumps on his hands that other drummers have. Among rival stickmen, the admiration extends from old guardists such as Gene Krupa ("Buddy is the Maury Wills of the drums") to such new guardists as Elvin Jones ("His artistry is almost beyond belief"). But perhaps his most avid fans are symphony percussionists. "He's the world's greatest living natural jazz drummer," says the Boston Symphony's Howard Thompson. "He plays faster with one hand than most of us do with two. He is rhythmically original. He has no cliches."

Everything '67. That Rich is playing at all is remarkable. Seven years ago, he suffered a heart attack and was told by doctors that he would never play again. Though he has had three seizures since, he still keeps pounding away. "I've got to," he exclaims. "What am I going to do? Sit around the house and bite my nails?" Not content to be just the highest-paid ($1,500 a week) sideman in music, he left Harry James's band in March "to put music back in its perspective, to offer something else than just twang, twang, twang." His new band, he says, has nothing to do with nostalgia. "Who the hell wants to hear the Glenn Miller sound? I dress '67, I drive '67, I think '67, I play '67. There is no such thing as the good old days."

Rich's good old days were often bad: one long round of gigs. Buddy, run from bill collectors and tyrant bandleaders. On and off, through romances and rifts, he played with Artie Shaw, Les Brown, Tommy Dorsey (four times) and Harry James (three times), once even took a fling at being a nightclub crooner. Trouble was, Rich had and still has a low regard for bandleaders. "The drummer is the real quarterback of a band," he says. "Hell, Guy Lombardo might just as well be hailing a cab on the bandstand. None of the musicians look at him." The compulsion to say what he thinks has led the stick-thin drummer (5 ft. 8 in., 125 lbs.) into a lot of free-swinging battles. He has thrown punches at his sergeant in the Marine Corps, where he had been a judo instructor, and at Frank Sinatra, who is now one of his closest friends. Today, his heart condition keeps him limited to an occasional "one-or-two-punch thing in the parking lot."

Yet, in his own toy-bulldog way, Rich is engaging, and fellow musicians are hoping that the band will make it big. If so, it will be another boost for the big-band business, which is enjoying a mild resurgence. If not, says Harry James, "I'm keeping his chair warm."

TIME, NOVEMBER 18, 1966

RICH AT BASIN STREET EAST
When "freak" means respect

TIME, NOVEMBER 18, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

OGDENSBURG ADVANCE NEWS
Sunday, November 27, 1966

Noted Pianist Appearing With Syracuse Symphony Has A Dramatic Background

Syracuse — Many will find rewarding pleasure in the musical virtuosity of Claude Frank as he preforms Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 25, in C, with the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra in Lincoln Auditorium, Dec. 16 and 17. However, few will be aware of the story behind the artist's career than began when he was a child of seven and led to a course of events as dramatic as any writer could hope to create.

Born in Germany, Claude Frank was surrounded by music as a child. By the time he was seven he already was deeply involved with the piane, so much so that the most effective form of punishment his parents could devise was to forbid him his regular practicing time. If the young artist's rapid progress was any indication, this discipline must have been used sparingly.

AT 11, AUDIENCE WITH SCHNABEL

When he was eleven, Claude had a chance to play for the great pianist Artur Schnabel, then living and teaching in Italy. Although Schnabel confirmed the young man's talent, he considered Frank too young to study directly with him. However, the master wanted to keep Claude under his guidance so he arranged for him to study with a former pupil, who was then living in Paris.

By this time the clouds of World War II were gathering, and in 1933 the Franks left Germany for Pairs where Claude was able to study until the advancing tide of the German army made it necessary for them to move on.

For several months they lived with a French family in a small Pyrenees village until it too became unsafe. After that their biggest problem was simply getting out of France. Since they were not "legally in France, there was no way for them to get papers to "legally" leave. The time-honored refugee solution to this seemingly unresolvable dilemma was, simply, bribery. This made it possible for them to reach Madrid. However, they were unable to get to Portugal, their ultimate goal, before their Spanish visa ran out. By the time Claude Frank was fourteen, he and his family were literally without a country.

No matter where he found himself, Claude also found a piano. One such place was Madrid's Aeolian Hall, where he soon attracted much attention and people began to come to the Hall just to listen. Word of his pianistic abilities began to spread.

VISAS TO BRAZIL AND U.S.

Taking an interest in him after Claude had performed at an Embassy party on short notice, the Brazillian ambassador arranged for a visa to his country. However, another guest at the ambassador's party was a member of the American consulate and before long he got an American visa for the Franks. By this, they were in effect, refugees no longer. Their flight was over.

The Franks arrived in New York in 1941, and Claude was soon knocking on Artur Schnabel's door. This time, young or not, Claude was accepted as a Schnabel student and spent the next several years studying with that great artist.

In 1944, when he was eighteen, the impact of war once again touched Frank. He was drafted into the American Infantry. When he became a civilian again, in 1946, he resumed studies with Schnabel and the same year, became an active conducting student at Tanglewood under Koussevitsky.

RUDOLF SERKIN IMPRESSED

However, one of the most important turns in his career, an event that led him in the direction of becoming a concert pianist, was a call in 1953 from Rudolf Serkin, who asked him to help at Marlboro.

So impressed was Serkin with Frank's performance ability that he advised the young pianist to give up teaching and all other musical activities to devote himself strictly to playing. Serkin said to him, "If the playing is really your life and you are really prepared, the concerts will simply come."

This is what has really happened. Frank by this time, has appeared as a soloist with nearly every major symphony in the United States and Canada, as well as Europe. He has appeared with Boston Symphony under Munch and Leinsdorf, and the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein; now records under the RCA Victor label and appeared last year with the Boston Symphony in a recent NBC-TV biography of Beethoven.

PALM SPRINGS, CALIF.
DESERT SUN
D. 9,000

NOV 27 1966

Greater Miami Philharmonic Will Present An All-French Program

An all-French program will be presented at the third pair of concerts of the Greater Miami Philharmonic on Sunday, December 4th at Miami Beach Auditorium and Monday, December 5th at Dade County Auditorium.

The two guest artists, conductor Alain Lombard and pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre, are natives of France. They will perform works by their fellow countrymen Hector Berlioz and Camille Saint-Saens.

Jeanne-Marie Darre, considered "France's First Lady of the Keyboard," will be making one of her rare orchestral appearances in this country. Although well-known in Europe for more than 30 years, she did not make her American orchestral debut until 1962 when she appeared with the Boston Symphony.

Guest conductor Alain Lombard is a winner of the 1966 Mitropoulos International Competition for conductors. The 26-year-old Frenchman is now assistant to Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic.

For his Miami appearance Lombard will lead the Greater Miami Philharmonic in Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique, a programmatic symphony in five movements. The work, subtitled by the composer "An Episode in the Life of an Artist," is actually a passionate, autobiographical testament in which Berlioz expresses his unrequited love for the actress Henrietta Smithson. The work was first performed in Paris on December 5th in 1836. Thus, Monday night's concert will mark the 136th anniversary of the premiere of Symphonie Fantastique.

Jeann-Marie Darre will play Saint Saens' Piano Concerto No. 2.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 532,600

NOV 6 1966

Boston Schools Today

By BERTRAM G. WATERS

Robert L. Murray is a talented young mathematics teacher who has won the right to design Boston's most controversial experiment in education — the Central High School.

After 12 years at Technical High, he served two years as head of the math department at English High School before joining the Subsystem last March.

He was transferred two weeks ago to the Title III design project for work on the campus high school and, when time permits, three "fringe area" elementary schools.

Murray is a little awed by the task and well might be. Preliminary specifications for the school—still called "English High" by some—include provisions for a swimming pool and two gymnasiums, language laboratories and eating facilities in all six student "houses," and ungraded classes allowing movement both vertically and horizontally for each student.

The "dream school" for Boston "will be tailored to meet the individual needs and talents of all its students through broad and flexible programming," according to the outline approved by the school committee.

Murray brings to the task at hand a perspective that will encourage such ideals.

"My background is in a large high school where boys can remain annonymous for four years," he says. "At English, we might see a boy in one class as a junior and then never again."

As head of math at English High, Murray was responsible for some of the guidance function for boys in his speciality who were heading for college, or a business school. He found it difficult to advise intelligently on the basis of a brief professional acquaintance.

The Central High plan should solve that. Three thousand boys and girls will be split into "houses" of 500 each where they will study, eat and exercise for four years. All programs will be available in each house — college, vocational, cultural, recreational and community.

Murray suffers innovator's fear of traditional "tracks" at the high school level, believing them to be responsible for a rigid approach to variable human beings. He hopes for a flexible approach in a series of buildings that are also flexible.

At work on the project only two weeks, he is already facing a Jan. 1 deadline for presenting some space requirements to the Redevelopment Authority and architect Paul Rudolph. It is not an ideal task.

"We're doing it the wrong way," explains Evans Clincy, director of Program Development. "We should have two or three years to design the curriculum and then figure out what sort of buildings would serve it best."

ROBERT MURRAY

Innovators are always idealists at heart. Clincy and Murray realize, however, that the architect has to start somewhere. The school is already years behind, and is not expected to open before 1971.

There are certain ground rules that give Murray a starting point. Class ratios have definitely been set at 1-25 maximum, and central facilities must be able to handle an eventual 5000 students.

All the buildings on the campus must include facilities useful to the community as well as students—theatres, lecture halls, kitchens, an auditorium and club rooms. The school will be open day and night, year-round.

To design the various courses, Murray and Herbert G. Forsell, Title III coordinator for Boston, will call on members of the Advisory Committee set up for this purpose. The committee includes representatives of local universities, civic and social agencies, and cultural forces such as the Boston Symphony and Museum of Fine Arts.

Education specialists now at work in the Subsystem will also draw on these many talents.

"No one really knows what an urban school should be," notes Clincy. "For the first time, local expertise will be involved in what a 'city school' means. We want to pull everyone into the act."

Clincy, Murray and Forsell are visiting large high schools across the country to pick up ideas and profit from others' mistakes. One such trip to New Haven may lead to a request for carpeting in all parts of the central High school as a noise and distraction dampener.

But Murray has no illusions about his role, despite armies of available help.

"As I see it," he says, "the burden of proof is on us. When we know what we want, I hope we will have enough reasons to justify what we're doing and convince the school committee we're right."

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,737,900

NOV 18 1966

JAZZ

Buddy, the Drum Wonder

At 18 months, Bernard Rich was carried onstage by the seat of his pants to play drums in his parents' vaudeville act. At six, sporting a sailor suit and Lord Fauntleroy curls, he played the Tivoli theater circuit as "Traps, the Drum Wonder." At seven, he toured Australia for $1,000 a week, and at eleven conducted his own band. Now a greying 49, Buddy Rich is still the Drum Wonder, still hanging on by the seat of his pants.

Only this time around he may have a real grip on something. When he announced six months ago that he was forming the new Buddy Rich Band, the boys in the business merely yawned. Cocky, flip, belligerent, Rich had drummed his way in and out of more orchestras, mismanaged more money than any ten musicians. The new Buddy Rich Band? "Another one of his fancies for the moment," shrugged Bandleader Stan Kenton. But then, to everyone's surprise, the band not only materialized but drew enthusiastic, sellout crowds in Las Vegas and Los Angeles. Marveled Kenton: "Rich is serious!"

Whirring Propellers. Last week musicians of all stripes gathered at Manhattan's Basin Street East to hear for themselves. Perched on a pyramid of risers, Rich set a blistering pace, insistently coaxing but never intruding. And when it came time for his solo, all 16 of his sidemen, like disciples at the feet of the master, craned in their chairs to watch and listen. Feet dancing, hands whirring like propellers, he sparked a kind of static electricity between cymbals and drums, tossing in an extra riff here, a random bass line there. His rolls were incredibly fast, his technique and rhythmic continuity flawless.

"He's a freak," said one bass player afterward. It was an expression of respect, for Rich has always been ranked by musicians as a drummer's drummer. They marvel at the fact that he never practices, has none of the calluses and bumps on his hands that other drummers have. Among rival stickmen, the admiration extends from old guardists such as Gene Krupa ("Buddy is the Maury Wills of the drums") to such new guardists as Elvin Jones ("His artistry is almost beyond belief"). But perhaps his most avid fans are symphony percussionists. "He's the world's greatest living natural jazz drummer," says the Boston Symphony's Howard Thompson. "He plays faster with one hand than most of us do with two. He is rhythmically original. He has no clichés."

Everything '67. That Rich is playing at all is remarkable. Seven years ago, he suffered a heart attack and was told by doctors that he would never play again. Though he has had three seizures since, he still keeps pounding away. "I've got to," he exclaims. "What am I going to do? Sit around the house and bite my nails?" Not content to be just the highest-paid ($1,500 a week) sideman in music, he left Harry James's band in March "to put music back in its perspective, to offer something else than just twang, twang, twang." His new band, he says, has nothing to do with nostalgia. "Who the hell wants to hear the Glenn Miller sound? I dress '67, I drive '67, I think '67, I play '67. There is no such thing as the good old days."

Rich's good old days were often bad: one long round of run, Buddy, run from bill collectors and irate bandleaders. On and off, through romances and rifts, he played with Artie Shaw, Les Brown, Tommy Dorsey (four times) and Harry James (three times), once even took a fling at being a nightclub crooner. Trouble was, Rich had and still has a low regard for bandleaders. "The drummer is the real quarterback of a band," he says. "Hell, Guy Lombardo might just as well be hailing a cab on the bandstand. None of the musicians look at him." The compulsion to say what he thinks has led the stick-thin drummer (5 ft. 8 in., 125 lbs.) into a lot of free-swinging battles. He has thrown punches at his sergeant in the Marine Corps, where he had been a judo instructor, and at Frank Sinatra, who is now one of his closest friends. Today, his heart condition keeps him limited to an occasional "one-or-two-punch thing in the parking lot."

Yet, in his own toy-bulldog way, Rich is engaging, and fellow musicians are hoping that the band will make it big. If so, it will be another boost for the big-band business, which is enjoying a mild resurgence. If not, says Harry James, "I'm keeping his chair warm."

ALFRED STATLER

RICH AT BASIN STREET EAST
When "freak" means respect.

TIME, NOVEMBER 18, 1966

249

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Boston
BOSTON, Mass.
Monthly Circ. 6,000
NOV 1966

INSIDE SYMPHONY HALL

PHOTOGRAPHS AND TEXT
BY ROBERT A. MAMIS

All cities have their special sections, ghettoed or otherwise. Furniture stores, junk shops, banana distributors, and various descriptions of people often tend to gather together, either to keep a weather eye on competitors, or because misery loves company. Along Massachusetts Avenue between Boylston and Huntington, it's aged ladies.

Perhaps what has drawn them here is the presence of three of the noblest old ladies in the city: the Mother Church, and Horticultural and Symphony Halls. Of the three, the Church stands agelessly alone, as churches do, while Symphony and Horticultural fight the ravages of time from opposite sides of the street. Last year, when Symphony Hall threw her Golden Trumpet Ball—the first event of such a fund-raising nature in her history—sister Horticulture (both were built in the same year, 1900) decked herself out in the finest fall fashion, with leaves and flowers and spotlights, and stood hopefully at the edge of the crowd, windows sparkling like jewels, uninvited, ancient, and dispirited. No one even asked her to a movie at the Uptown. Horticulture is a grande dame, but she never did have the inner comeliness of her crony.

Roger Voisin, trumpet, pastes a score.

For one thing, along with gangland murders, a school committee, and its basketball team, its symphony orchestra is one of the institutions for which Boston is renowned. And an orchestra, like a solo violinist, can be no better than the instrument on which it performs. Symphony Hall is a Stradivarius of concert halls, one of the very few fine concert auditoriums anywhere in the world.

Acoustically the hall is ideal. The last note from the stage takes exactly 2.34 seconds to die out completely. While this interval may be barely adequate for an aisle sitter to dash out a chamber door (of which there are twenty-two), it is considered the perfect reverberation period, give or take a few hundredths of a second for subjective preference, for sound in a concert hall.

That this is so is not fortuitous. Symphny Hall is the first auditorium ever to have been designed according to predetermined acoustical formulae. In view of the inchoate condition of such formulae at the time, and given the fact that the hall has never had to be retuned, the accomplishment (executed by Wallace Sabine, then an Assistant Professor of Physics at Harvard) is astounding. It has become all the more astounding noting the hodgepodge a more sophisticated science has made of New York's new Philharmonic Hall—strident, mushy, dry, opaque, flat, and cold are among the critical epithets still in use. "In Symphony Hall," remarked a member of the BSO, "a musician hears the whole orchestra and feels a part of it. At Philharmonic, you play alone." RCA Victor, for whom the BSO exclusively records, considers Symphony Hall one of the best recording studios in the country.

The Hall's inner chamber ceiling is broken up into 88 separate, various-sized segments, and there are sixteen niches along the balcony walls, each occupied by a plaster figure (several of which are stark naked—a drawing card that Horticulture doesn't vaguely approach). These, along with other filigree lacing balcony railings, contribute to the calculated control of echo, or reverberation. Mr. Sabine also estimated the absorption factor of 2,631 fully-dressed seat occupants (2,365 at Pops, at which sound is slightly shriller but less demanding of perfection). The deadening effect of filled seats is of such magnitude that the orchestra has a thick blanket dropped from the ceiling across the entire stage to substitute for this factor when rehearsing in an empty hall.

At any given point the hall is equally responsive—full bass, bright and mellow mid-range, live and clean highs—and suffers virtually no diminution of volume even to the last row of the second balcony (where there are symphony habitués who insist that standing

The Russian cellist Rostropovitch performs in a rehearsal room for enthralled BSO string players.

249

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Boston
BOSTON, Mass.
Monthly Circ. 6,000

in the uppermost corner is the best place to hear, if not see). Any flaws in the sound are much more apt to be produced by a neighbor's catarrh than a defect inherent to the hall.

When the new Boston Music Hall was built (Symphony stairways carry the insignia BMH due to an assumption by the architect that the new structure would bear the same name as the old building from which the orchestra had moved), the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington marked the edge of town, and the out-of-doors in those days maintained a natural quiet. But with remarkable, if perhaps unintended, farsightedness, yesterday's planners ingeniously insulated today's audiences from the din of climbing jets, airbraking trucks, subways, buses, and other clamorous passersby. The concert chamber is surrounded by corridors, lobbies, salons, and passageways on all sides, hence is protected by at least two and sometimes three or four walls. The building itself, in fact, shares no wall in contiguity with a neighbor. (Though for a few years a tiny wood-and-tar-paper shack tacked on next to the Huntington Avenue steps housed Arnold's Record Shop, it would hardly count as another building.)

James Pappautsakis, flute, warms up in the cellar.

The brick, steel, and plaster structure, built at a total cost of $750,000, is today rarely in a state of full repair. A crew of two dozen or so maintenance men and women (some of whom double as ticket takers) constantly apply paint, polish, and soap to aging surfaces, cane and resew chairs (the seats, as is all the gold leaf, are original equipment), replace bulbs—for which the five auditorium chandeliers can be lowered by cable—and attend to the many exigencies that have by now become daily ritual. Plumbing is in the usual toilsome condition of vintage piping but gets by, and heat is manufactured off the premises and fed to the hall underground, sparing concertgoers pings and hisses from a basement leviathan.

One thing Symphony Hall lacks is an air-conditioning system, but the management someday intends to have one installed. Until then, its huge pump will continue to exchange inside air for outside air once every few minutes—in these days not always a salubrious trade.

continued on page 69

The line for 251 rush seats starts early.

SYMPHONY continued from page 34

In addition to the crew of maintenance workers, there is a like number of ticket sellers, secretaries, and office workers (ushers are paid, but are provided mostly by local music schools) who contribute to the fiscal side of the operation—renting the hall for non-symphony use (an annual auto show used to be held here), publishing programs, releasing news, selling subscriptions, mollifying customers who can't get tickets—and through them the hall is kept solvent, or partially so.

Actually the BSO, which unlike many other symphonic institutions receives no public support, suffers a yearly deficit approaching $400,000, redeemed annually by contributions from Friends of the Symphony. The payroll for the orchestra alone (which numbers 104 musicians, four of whom are women, and is one of the largest in the country) is over $20,000 per week. The $205 base pay is fourth best among U.S. orchestras, but recording, television, and other activities add about $2,000 to a musician's yearly salary. The efficiency of the BSO in earning over eighty per cent of its keep is unmatched. Even profits from refreshments sold at Pops are pure gravy, inasmuch as the hall does not lease concessions.

There are eleven plaques fixed to the proscenium of Symphony Hall. On each was intended to be inscribed the name of an immortal composer, but in 1900 the trustees would commit themselves to the permanence of only one name: Beethoven. The other ten still remain blank. There has been some talk recently of possibly adding Brahms or Bach. It might also be suggested that one of the empty spaces be given to Wallace Sabine, a man who appreciated the quality of sound with the ear of a master, and who helped make Symphony Hall the modern building and pride of Boston that she remains after sixty-six years. □

TV crew in dry run prior to live broadcast uses cards to sit in for musicians

Lanning Humphrey demonstrates antique lute to visiting schoolchildren in Old Instrument room

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 105,712
DEC 18 1966

Gong Drum To Star In Requiem

By JOHN R. THORNTON

WHEN DR. HERROLD HEADLEY directs a performance of the great Verdi "Requiem" at the University of Maine in Orono next spring, he will have in the orchestra an enormous drum developed by Harold J. Thompson of the percussion section of the Boston Symphony.

Thompson, who has been a member of the BSO since 1952, is a musician fascinated by the art and science of percussion playing, and his new drum represents a radical departure from normal skin-type percussion architecture.

Normally the side-drum used in the Verdi score consists of two heads. Thompson, anxious to produce a different type of impact-sound, has come up with an instrument containing only one skin, facing a curved enclosure.

The two-headed, normal drum, having a batter, or striking side, sets in vibration the opposite head, which limits the length of the original series of vibrations.

"A single headed drum is not so restricted," Thompson explains. "It thus produces a sound of different character. The construction of this drum must be substantially larger in diameter. Ours at Boston is four feet, with an ox-hide head, and requires a larger membrane capable of greater, lower pitch variations."

Thompson also reasoned that the drum shell would have to be heavier than usual in order to make it a fulcrum strong enough to hold the large skin stationary.

IN PRESENTING the drum to the manufacturer with its particular specifications, Thompson knew that all membranes have minute but very different characteristics. So he requested of the Hunt Drum Club of London a heavier tension system to allow for more critical tuning, especially when membranes were interchanged.

The first use of the new instrument came in a performance of the Verdi Requiem at Tanglewood in the summer of 1964. Its effect was startling, to say the least.

Howard Klein, of the New York Times, reviewing the performance, said in part: "The new drum . . . sounded like bomb bursts in the Dies Irae . . . and when lightly tapped, as in the Lachrymosa, like blows in the pit of the stomach."

To obtain full-color sounds from the radical drum, Boston Symphony percussionists have experimented with new types of percussion beaters.

Thompson came up with a mallet consisting of a cylinder, with carrying handle fitted in the center at a right angle.

Harold J. Thompson, left, its inventor, watches as a colleague tests the new gong drum he has invented for the Boston Symphony orchestra.

With this beater—it looks a bit like a household paint roller—the player can use four different impact points of an extended area, each presenting a different sound quality when applied to the skin.

The cover of the cylinder, held by a lace and eyelet arrangement, is removable and adjustable.

The two ends, one of gum rubber, the other of felt rubber, produce a static vibration, something like a one-hand tremolo and staccato sound in that order.

So shattering is its impact, it has been called a "Gong Drum."

There are only three in the United States, and all are in great demand since there is no known drum that can duplicate its sonics.

DURING A RECENT trip to Boston, I spoke to Thompson backstage at Symphony Hall and mentioned that the Verdi Requiem would be performed at Orono next May.

"I'll be glad to send one of the drums up to Maine," Thompson declared, "and will also explain to the musician who will use it the special techniques required. It sounds, when used correctly, like a huge cannon shot."

Thompson, a native of Akron, who looks like a Green Bay Packer — he's over six feet tall — is also one of the world's leading experts in cymbal playing and has written two books on the subject. One is a guide for high school players, the other for professionals.

Before coming to Boston he was with the Cincinnati Symphony.

It will be remembered by some of the ancients, that when Toscanini directed a performance of the Verdi Requiem at New York City, he became very unhappy with the Philharmonic's drum.

The Maestro heard of a huge drum in Chicago, owned by the Shriners, which was used only in their giant parades.

It was shipped by special air-freight to New York, and the leviathan used in a stunning performance at Carnegie Hall. It was, I believe, something like eight feet high.

But Thompson's drum, although smaller, is capable of producing even more sound.

When the "gong" is struck at the Maine University's big gymnasium, it will surely loosen some rivets in the steel girders overhead and result in some rupture of the plumbing!

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, December 14, 1966

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

'Messiah' Wakens Memory

Everyone has had the retrogressive experience, upon smelling the odor of a flower, or other perfume, or hearing a snatch of a long-forgotten song to have memories revived of something from their earlier life. While listening to the magnificent performance of Handel's immortal oratorio, "The Messiah" in Chancellor's Hall Friday evening, by the Capitol Hill Choral Society, under the dynamic direction of Judson Rand, my memory went back to 1908.

The opening tenor solo: "Every valley shall be exalted and every hill made low" left a flood of political rather than spiritual memories. In 1908 a new party, called the progressives, led by Teddy Roosevelt, tried to form and became known as "The Bull Moose" subdivision of the Republican party. I received a telephone call from the Amsterdam contingent asking me if I were available to come to that city for a Bull Moose rally, specifically, to sing the tenor solo above mentioned from the "Messiah."

I was a bit nonplussed by the unusual request, but the stipend was attractive. My wife accompanied me on the train and later at the piano in one of the local motion picture houses. Music and politics—like politics—make strange bedfellows.

The hall was covered with banners, bearing a certain likeness to Teddy Roosevelt, gleaming teeth n'everything, who was running for president of the United States on the Bull Moose ticket, but the organization staged a tremendous flop when William Howard Taft got the nod from the national electorate. When the treasurer handed me my check, I asked him why that particular aria from the "Messiah" was stipulated.

"Why, that's simple," he replied. "You will recall that the final stanzas advance the theory, that if the Bull Moose Party, attained ascendency in the coming election, they would see to it that "The crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain." And was my face red!

Another favorite musical story concerns the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ignace Paderewski, as guest pianist, on a tour in the early part of the century. The concert was to be given in the large auditorium. In the basement was a make-shift motion picture theatre, also functioning the same night. The film to be shown was Victor Hugos great drama, "Les Misearables."

Standing at the entrance to both halls was a uniformed attendant, who proclaimed in a booming baritone:

"Paderewski upstairs. Less miserable downstairs."

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
DEC 1966

News Nuggets

Pablo Casals will be ninety years old this coming December 29. He will probably celebrate the event as he did his eighty-ninth birthday last year; with master classes in cello given gratis to a selected group of students at his home in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

It's well to take a risk sometimes. Robert Menga did. He took time off from his regular job, in the violin section of the New York Philharmonic, and competed in the Paganini Competition in Genoa, Italy. No first prizes were awarded, but he did get second prize, worth some $1,200, and he also was granted the permission (it went along with the prize) of playing on a violin that had belonged to Paganini. When he returned to New York he gave a recital in the auditorium of the Lincoln Center Library-Museum, and at the next concert of the New York Philharmonic was sitting in his regular place again.

Returning from Moscow after winning Second Prize in the Third International Tchaikovsky Competition, Stephen Kates, cellist, played the Shostakovich Concerto with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood in August. In September he was one of the American winners to play a Command Performance at The White House.

Forthcoming solo appearances will include a reengagement with

Stephen Kates

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at the December 11 Pension Concert and with Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic at the February 25 Young People's Concert. He will be guest artist at two concerts with the Fine Arts Quartet in Chicago in February and will play a solo recital in that city in April. Performances with the Chicago Symphony and the Minneapolis Symphony are also scheduled.

The Jesse H. Jones Hall for the Performing Arts opened in Houston on October 2. It is to be the permanent home of the Houston Symphony and the Houston Grand Opera Association.

The performing arts touring program of the New York State Council on the Arts will offer nine Broadway shows — the largest number of productions since the council's inception in 1960 — to community groups throughout the state during the 1966-67 season.

The council, designed to prime the cultural pump in communities around the state, is working this year with an appropriation of $905-000 from the State Legislature. In its first year, it operated with a $450,000 budget.

Some of the council-supported attractions are the Baltimore Symphony, the Buffalo Philharmonic, the Cincinnati Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the Hudson Valley Philharmonic, the Indianapolis Symphony, the Minneapolis Symphony, the National Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Rochester Philharmonic, the Syracuse Orchestra and the Boston Symphony. In opera, it lends support to the After Dinner Opera Company, the Goldovsky Grand Opera Theater, the Metropolitan Opera Studio, the New York City Opera and the Turnau Opera Players.

The New York State Council on the Arts is an agency of the State Government which provides necessary financial support to local art groups anxious to begin or augment cultural programs in their communities. It makes up the financial difference between production expenses and that which can be earned by ticket sales and contributions from local sources.

MONTEREY, CALIF.
PENINSULA HERALD
D. 26,000
NOV 24 1966

Pianist John Browning Plays Dec. 3 in Carmel

John Browning, brilliant young American pianist whose meteoric career has excited the music world of every continent, will be heard in concert Saturday evening, Dec. 3, in Sunset Auditorium as the second artist of the Carmel Music Society's current season.

Described by the music critic of The London Times as "unquestionably one of the outstanding pianists of his generation" and by the Los Angeles Times as "one of the most sensitive and poetic artists America has produced," John Browning is the recipient of three famous competition prizes: The Steinway Centennial Award sponsored by the National Foundation of Music Clubs; the Edgar M. Leventritt Award; and the Gold Medal Award of the Concours International Reine Elisabeth in Brussels.

Born in Denver, Colo., he showed his musical interest before he could reach the keyboard and by the time he was 5, was able to identify any tone he heard. He made his orchestral bow at the age of 10, playing Mozart's "Coronation Concerto" at a special concert with members of the Denver Symphony. Instead of exploiting this immediate success, his parents decided that he should not have the hectic career of a child prodigy, but be allowed to study and mature away from the limelight.

Studied in L.A.

When the family moved to Los Angeles, he continued his piano training with Lee Pattison and his academic studies in public schools and at Occidental College. Eventually he moved to New York to attend the Juilliard School of Music on scholarship, studying with Madame Rosina Lhevinne.

News of an exciting young piano talent quickly made the round of this country's music world and was confirmed when in 1954, at the age of 21, he won the first of his three coveted awards. The following year, the Leventritt Award enabled him to make his brilliant New York Philharmonic debut in February, 1956.

Also in 1956, by winning in the famous competition founded by Queen Elisabeth of Belgium, Browning became an international celebrity. Annual tours abroad have followed, taking him to other European countries, the Near East and Mexico. La Libre Belgique said of one of his many Brussels recitals:

"John Browning's musicality is exquisite. His technique is simply prodigious. He plays with extraordinary virtuosity, sensitivity and penetrating intelligence. This performance places him among the very truly great pianists."

The esteem accorded Browning by the music world was dramatically underscored in 1962 when at 29 he created the world premiere of Samuel Barber's "First Piano Concerto" with the Boston Symphony under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf at the gala opening week of New York's Lincoln Center. Within two years, he had been called upon to play it more than 60 times, with leading symphony orchestras in key music centers on both sides of the Atlantic.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 9,367
DEC 9 1966

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,433
DEC 10 1966

Chorus Pro Musica Gives Sunday Concert

BOSTON — The famed 120-voice Chorus pro Musica will present five centuries of Christmas music in its fourth annual Christmas concert at the Old South Church, Copley Square, Sunday, Dec. 11, at 7 p.m. The public is invited without charge.

Alfred Nash Patterson of Newton Centre will conduct the group he founded, which in 17 years has become one of the nation's leading choral organizations. He is also organist and director of music at the historic church, conductor of choruses for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and music director of the Worcester Festival.

The soloists include Nancy Aspel, West Roxbury, soprano; Ruth Romberg, Betsy Close, Wellesley Hills, mezzo soprano; Elaine Panaretos, Cambridge, alto; Barbara Patterson, Newton Centre, alto; Alexander Clement Reading, tenor; Thorne Griscom, Lexington, tenor; Theodore Romberg, Pawtucket, R. I., tenor; Walter Brassert, Cambridge, baritone; Lawrence Chvany, Watertown, bass, and George Watkins, Wenham, bass.

Women's

Donald Teeters of Back Bay, who is organist at St. Andrew's church, Wellesley, is assistant conductor. The group will be assisted by a string quartet, harpsichord, organ and piano.

The program will feature contemporary works of John Crawford and Kirke Mechem who studied composition at Harvard.

A Bach Cantata, and compositions by Gabrieli, Praetorius, Purcell, Scheidt, Distler, Schein, Kountz, Pfautach, and Middleton complete the varied program.

251

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396
DEC 2 1966

[redacted] Puts Boston on th[redacted] Operatic Map

BY MARTIN [redacted]

BOSTON—The [redacted] of the [redacted] world were on [redacted] Wed[redacted] night. To be exact, they [redacted] gathered on the Back Bay [redacted] once an ornate movie palace with a shallow stage, now the home of Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston.

The redoubtable Miss Caldwell, [redacted] anti-Establishment genius, [redacted] director and impresaria, and [redacted] time conductor, trained the [redacted] long ago to expect the unex[redacted] from her. She had, after all, [redacted]ished a major opera com[redacted] time when Boston's funds [redacted] were dwindling and when [redacted] marvelous old opera [redacted] razed to make ro[redacted] lot. She also had [redacted] sponsible for brin[redacted] to the East, not to [redacted] such [redacted]ities as Rossini's [redacted] no's "Intolleranza [redacted] the original [redacted] dunov" and [redacted]

[redacted] — a challeng[redacted] immense that only [redacted] other companies had ever approached it. Arnold Schoenberg's "Moses and Aaron" is a work of staggering musical complexity and seemingly insurmountable theatrical problems. Although incomplete — Schoenberg never wrote music to match his text for the last act—it can stand effectively in its present form, provided it is mounted with suitable, i.e. massive, forces, and by administrative minds sensitive to the pitfalls involved.

Schoenberg began work on the opera as early as 1926. The score for the first two acts was completed in 1932. The resolution of the work preoccupied the composer, unsuccessfully, until his death in 1951.

The first performance took place in concert form three years later in Hamburg. The stage premiere followed in Zurich during 1957, seconded eventually by productions in Berlin and London. Miss Caldwell had originally scheduled the first American performance last season, but had to postpone the date on several occasions because of casting complications.

Personnel Shift

Even now, a late shift in personnel was necessitated by the indisposition of George London, who was to have sung Moses. He was replaced a month ago by Donald Gramm. The latter moved up from his original, smaller assignment, the High Priest.

As vexing as this must have been, it represented but one of many backstage trials. Miss Caldwell and her associates had chosen an opera that demands depiction of such Biblical events as the Burning Bush, such miracles as the staff that changes into the serpent. Bloody sacrifices, both human and animal, are integral portions of the text, nudity is specifically demanded in several episodes, the Golden Calf sequence develops into what must be the most explicit orgy in history.

To compound the producer's headache, Schoenberg has left us a grandiose 12-tone score, in which significance is equalled by complexity.

The miracle of "Moses and Aaron" lies, however, in its emotional appeal. For all its philosophical concern, it still speaks in basic terms of humanity—even theatricality. This, in turn, underscores the premise of the protagonist symbols.

Moses represents the ab-

'MOSES AND AARON'

Music and text by Arnold Schoenberg. American premiere by Opera Company of Boston. Staged by Sarah Caldwell. Conducted by Osbourne McConathy. Sets designed by Oliver Smith, lighting by John Harvey, costumes by Stanley Simmons. Chorus augmented by members of the Handel and Haydn Society and New England Conservatory. Choreography by Claude Kipnis. Performed at Back Bay Theatre.

Moses ..... Donald Gramm
Aaron ..... Richard Lewis
High Priest ..... Herbert Scott Gibson
Young Man ..... Harry Theyard
Another Man ..... Robert Trasy
Invalid Woman ..... Eunice Alberts
Naked Virgins ..... Maxine Makas, Eunice Alberts, Evelyn Kasanjian, Elizabeth Lewis

stract, the lofty; Aaron, his brother and spokesman, represents the practical and worldly. Each is a separate force, and yet each is part of the same entity. The opera, by the same token, deals with the subtle intellect—in form, language, and structure—and with overt human reaction — in mood and histrionics.

It would be futile to pretend that the Boston production is ideal. But that is not the point. More crucial is the fact that Miss Caldwell had the courage and perseverance to attempt the work, plus the skill to make it reasonably effective.

An ironic footnote in the program, by the way, says that Boston is an appropriate site for the premiere because Schoenberg lived in the Hub city for a year in 1933. How much more fitting a Los Angeles-oriented tribute would have been. It was here, after all, that he spent the last 17 years of his life.

Musically, the Boston production proved remarkably successful. In the pit, partially obscured by an unconventional thrust stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided virtuosic solutions to the unique problems before them. The conductor, Osbourne McConathy, himself a former horn player with the Boston Symphony, revealed a flair for precision, architecture and lucidity. He lacked a comparable flair for dramatic impetus, but this, for once, seemed forgiveable. Comparable virtuosity, plus a good deal more power, marked the contribution of the gigantic chorus.

Richard Lewis sang the relatively ornate, relatively lyrical lines of the worldly Aaron [redacted] at the top, and ex[redacted] diction. If his char[redacted] tion seemed more [redacted] than was absolutely necessary, the blame cannot be his alone.

In the contrasting declamation of Moses, Donald Gramm did all that intelligence and artistry can do against this casting. Overpowering magnetism of personality is not his to expend on the part. Nor, for that matter, is the ideal weight of tone. Compounding his disadvantages, Gramm seemed tempted to sing his lines more than is warranted by the "Sprechgesang" tradition. Still, his was a sympathetic, wholly professional contribution to the performance, and, as things turned out, the saving one.

In general, the visual [redacted] inconsistent sets of Oliver Smith — failed to define the tone of the work.

"Moses and Aaron" can be interpreted two ways. Either as a spectacular magic show, in which nothing is left to the imagination; or, as a stylized psychological experience in which everything is. The Boston production satisfied proponents of neither extreme. Most physical props, like the transformed Staff and the Burning Bush, were invisible. So were animals, even though they had been present at the dress rehearsal two days earlier. When the action involved such variables, the actors mimed as if only the pure in heart could see the props.

Fine. If applied without compromise, such a technique can indeed be meaningful. But in Boston, Moses and Aaron wore [redacted] dals; realis[redacted] painted on [redacted] flats; a soli[redacted] emerged from the wings (despite the fact that Aaron had fashioned it from invisible donations); slaves toppled a substantial obelisk. In this context, the mimicry looked silly. And the orgy, enacted rather dutifully by gentlemen in fig-leaves and ladies in leotards, failed to create the illusion that might have been possible with a bit less bluntness.

In the final evaluation, however, the deed proved far more important than its execution. Boston has secured its place on the operatic map.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100
DEC 17 1966

Los Angeles

DESPITE the fact that Dido and Aeneas probably never did meet and become entangled on the North African shores of Carthage, the two operas based on this "incident"—Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and Berlioz's Les Troyens à Carthage—have been the benefactors of current and renewed interest on stage and on the turntable. Even in the face of possible historical inaccuracy, the poet Virgil's story of a great queen's tragic love for the man whose destiny it was to found Rome cannot help being an irresistible theatrical-musical experience. N. D. Boyling, in his highly informative notes to Angel's new recording of the Purcell opera (36359; S-36359), points up the fact that the fall of Troy, and Aeneas's flight, occurred more than three centuries before Dido's supposed founding of Carthage.

But no matter, Purcell's only real opera (1689), with a libretto by Nahum Tate, has been treated with rewarding care and affection on this, the third stereo version of the chamber opera. Long-time Purcellian and pioneer in matters of English music, Sir John Barbirolli conducts the English Chamber Orchestra and The Ambrosian Singers in an immensely satisfying performance that is spacious and sympathetic, always enhancing Purcell's fresh and lively melodies.

Arias, choruses, and the free arioso recitatives are all well articulated, with not a trace of scholar-like rigidity. The strings sound bright, warm, and polished; and Barbirolli's flexible rhythms carry the music along at a fine pace that is never anything but considerate to his singers. Harpsichordist-conductor-scholar Raymond Leppard, who with Boying sorted out all the available editions of the opera (this version is based mainly on the Tatton Park manuscript, written by Philip Hayes about 1780) in search of the most authentic score possible, adds his own measure of authenticity in his imaginative harpsichord realizations and has seemingly encouraged the entire forces to performances that accurately reflect the conventions of the period.

Certainly on an equal plane of interest with Sir John's direction of the Purcell score is the presence of Victoria de los Angeles, essaying the role of Dido for the first time in her career. It can be said that hers is a beguiling performance with the qualities equal to the best she has given in the past on stage and rec-

SR/December 17, 1966

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WEEKLY-CIRC.N.AVAIL.
DEC 7 1966

Schoenberg Couldn't Raise $3,000, But Hub Stages 'Moses & Aron' With $200,000 From Foundations

By TRUDY GOTH

Boston, Dec. 6.

When he arrived in the United States as a refugee from Nazi Germany, the late composer Arnold Schoenberg sought in vain for $3,000 in aid to complete his 12-tone opera, "Moses and Aron." Last week the still-uncomplete opera was produced in a Back Bay film theatre with $200,000 from foundations, proving the point that donors most favor dead genius. The widow collected $20,000 for the exclusive U.S. performance rights through 1969, a windfall of some irony in the light of her husband's frustrations.

For the Opera Co. of Boston production (Sarah Caldwell) "Moses and Aron" attracted critics from the Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Washington Star, Baltimore Sun, Philadelphia Bulletin, all of the New York dailies, the New Yorker, Saturday Review, Opera News, Cue, VARIETY, both wire services.

Schoenberg's only full length opera is considered by many music authorities as the most significant operatic work of this century. Miss Caldwell has dared it's difficulties against the technical limitations of a "non-theatre" built for films. Her vision, imagination and sheer guts brought off "the event" of the 1966 operatic year. Her staging of "Moses and Aron" makes for one of the impressive and elaborate operatic shows ever attempted.

As conceived by the composer the opera is in itself a masterpiece of dramatic impact, with his own text derived from Exodus. The basic issue is simple: the inability of a man to communicate to others what he feels and understands, and the resultant misunderstanding and rejection which deepens his plight. Moses is obsessed by God as "Idea" alone. The vacillating Aron, (his brother) on the other hand, succumbs to the hysterical mob and gives them the Golden Calf. By having Moses and Aron appear several times, as a Janus figure, pivoting back-to-back, the staging suggests Schoenberg's textual implications that they represent different aspects of "man."

Schoenberg started sketching the opera in 1926 and finished the second act in 1932, but never completed the opera. But a third act hardly seems necessary. It would be difficult to conceive of a more satisfying culmination of the opera, than the frustration of Moses and his desperate cry: "Oh word, thou word, that I lack!" with which the second act ends. Written by a great composer this torso of an opera is a rewarding enterprise.

Opera had its first stage presentation in Zurich in 1957, Deutsche Oper in (West) Berlin has it in its repertory and performances have been seen in Italy, Austria and France. Covent Garden, London, staged it in 1965. The work is most difficult to stage, play and sing. Yet, the audience impact is overwhelming. In a wild surging panorama, the Israelites are led out of Egypt Close to 200 choristers shout, brawl, exult and doubt and after they get their Golden Calf indulge in an orgy of which much has been said and written, but Miss Caldwell has done well to "de-emphasize" this scene and concentrate more on the spiritual conflict of the opera. Taking the Calf by the horns and with a magnificent set by Oliver Smith, Miss Caldwell hurled action from the orchestra and up the other side. It worked remarkably well.

Boston U. Chorus with addition of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, prepared for many months by Roland Gagnon and the conductor McConathy, was most impressive and its diction delightfully clear (in Allen Forte's English translation). The protagonists were Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) both superb in portrayal and diction. Lewis, who sang the role in the London production, displayed a ringing, glorious tenor voice and Donald Gramm, whose part calls for spoken song, "Sprechstimme" projected with clarity and force. The chorus moved, walked, shouted, whispered, sang and acted their feelings most effectively. Osbourne McConathy conducted the first-rate players, members of the Boston Symphony.

Pantomime devised by Claude Kipnis, the costumes by Stanley Simmons and the shrewd lighting of John Harvey contributed to the success. And so it has come to pass that on an inadequate stage, despite inadequate facilities, "Moses and Aron" had a production that would do honor to any opera house and company in the world.

251

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

DEC 2 1966

M[redacted] Puts Boston on th[redacted] Operatic Map

BY MARTIN [redacted]
Times Music Critic

BOSTON—The [redacted] of the [redacted] world were on [redacted] Wed[redacted] night. To be exa[redacted] they [redacted] cased on the Back Bay [redacted] once an ornate movie palace with a shallow stage, now the home of Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston.

The redoubtable Miss Caldwell, [redacted] anti-Establishment genius, s[redacted] director and impresaria, and s[redacted] time conductor, trained the p[redacted] long ago to expect the unexp[redacted] from her. She had, after all, [redacted] lished a major opera comp[redacted] time when Boston's funds [redacted] were dwindling and when [redacted] marvelous old opera ho[redacted] razed to make roo[redacted] lot. She also had [redacted] sponsible for bring[redacted] "Lu[redacted] to the East, not to [redacted] such [redacted] tities as Rossini's [redacted] no's "Intolerance" [redacted] the original [redacted] dunes" and [redacted] and [redacted]

[redacted] project — a challeng[redacted] immense that only [redacted] other companies had ever approached it. Arnold Schoenberg's "Moses and Aaron" is a work of staggering musical complexity and seemingly insurmountable theatrical problems. Although incomplete — Schoenberg never wrote music to match his text for the last act—it can stand effectively in its present form, provided it is mounted with suitable, i.e. massive, forces, and by administrative minds sensitive to the pitfalls involved.

Schoenberg began work on the opera as early as 1926. The score for the first two acts was completed in 1932. The resolution of the work preoccupied the composer, unsuccessfully, until his death in 1951.

The first performance took place in concert form three years later in Hamburg. The stage premiere followed in Zurich during 1957, seconded eventually by productions in Berlin and London. Miss Caldwell had originally scheduled the first American performance last season, but had to postpone the date on several occasions because of casting complications.

Personnel Shift

Even now, a late shift in personnel was necessitated by the indisposition of George London, who was to have sung Moses. He was replaced a month ago by Donald Gramm. The latter moved up from his original, smaller assignment, the High Priest.

As vexing as this must have been, it represented but one of many backstage trials. Miss Caldwell and her associates had chosen an opera that demands depiction of such Biblical events as the Burning Bush, such miracles as the staff that changes into the serpent. Bloody sacrifices, both human and animal, are integral portions of the text, nudity is specifically demanded in several episodes, the Golden Calf sequence develops into what must be the most explicit orgy in history.

To compound the producer's headache, Schoenberg has left us a grandiose 12-tone score, in which significance is equalled by complexity.

The miracle of "Moses and Aaron" lies, however, in its emotional appeal. For all its philosophical concern, it still speaks in basic terms of humanity—even theatricality. This, in turn, underscores the premise of the protagonist symbols.

Moses represents the ab-

'MOSES AND AARON'

Music and text by Arnold Schoenberg. American premiere by the Opera Company of Boston, staged by Sarah Caldwell. Conducted by Osbourne McConathy. Sets designed by Oliver Smith, lighting by John Harvey, costumes by Stanley Simmons. Chorus augmented by members of the Handel and Haydn Society and New England Conservatory. Choreography by Claude Kipnis. Performed at Back Bay Theater.

Moses ..... Donald Gramm
Aaron ..... Richard Lewis
High Priest ..... Herbert Scott Gibson
Young Man ..... Harry Theyard
Another Man ..... Roger Trapp
Young Woman ..... Bernice Alberta
Naked Virgins ..... Maxine Akkom, Eunice Alberta, Sylvia Karanian, Elizabeth Lewis

stract, the lofty; Aaron, his brother and spokesman, represents the practical and worldly. Each is a separate force, and yet each is part of the same entity. The opera, by the same token, deals with the subtle intellect—in form, language, and structure—and with overt human reaction — in mood and histrionics.

It would be futile to pretend that the Boston production is ideal. But that is not the point. More crucial is the fact that Miss Caldwell had the courage and perseverance to attempt the work, plus the skill to make it reasonably effective.

An ironic footnote in the program, by the way, says that Boston is an appropriate site for the premiere because Schoenberg lived in the Hub city for a year in 1933. How much more fitting a Los Angeles-oriented tribute would have been. It was here, after all, that he spent the last 17 years of his life.

Musically, the Boston production proved remarkably successful. In the pit, partially obscured by an unconventional thrust stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided virtuosic solutions to the unique problems before them. The conductor, Osbourne McConathy, himself a former horn player with the Boston Symphony, revealed a flair for precision, architecture and lucidity. He lacked a comparable flair for dramatic impetus, but this, for once, seemed forgiveable. Comparable virtuosity, plus a good deal more power, marked the contribution of the gigantic chorus.

Richard Lewis sang the relatively ornate, relatively lyrical lin[redacted] the worldly Aaron [redacted] lines [redacted] p[redacted] p[redacted] de[redacted] at the top, and ex[redacted] diction. If his chara[redacted] tion seemed more pallid than was absolutely necessary, the blame cannot be his alone.

In the contrasting declamation of Moses, Donald Gramm did all that intelligence and artistry can do against this casting. Overpowering magnetism of personality is not his to expend on the part. Nor, for that matter, is the ideal weight of tone. Compounding his disadvantages, Gramm seemed tempted to sing his lines more than is warranted by the "Sprechgesang" tradition. Still, his was a sympathetic, wholly professional contribution to the performance, and, as things turned out, the saving one.

In general, the visual [redacted] inconsistent sets of Oliver Smith — failed to define the tone of the work.

"Moses and Aaron" can be interpreted two ways. Either as a spectacular magic show, in which nothing is left to the imagination; or, as a stylized psychological experience in which everything is. The Boston production satisfied proponents of neither extreme. Most physical props, like the transformed Staff and the Burning Bush, were invisible. So were animals, even though they had been present at the dress rehearsal two days earlier. When the action involved such variables, the actors mimed as if only the pure in heart could see the props.

Fine. If applied without compromise, such a technique can indeed be meaningful. But in Boston, Moses and Aaron wore [redacted] whiskers and sandals; realistic rocks were painted on some of the flats; a solid Calf of Gold emerged from the wings (despite the fact that Aaron had fashioned it from invisible donations); slaves toppled a substantial obelisk. In this context, the mimicry looked silly. And the orgy, enacted rather dutifully by gentlemen in fig-leaves and ladies in leotards, failed to create the illusion that might have been possible with a bit less bluntness.

In the final evaluation, however, the deed proved far more important than its execution. Boston has secured its place on the operatic map.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

DEC 17 1966

MUSIC TO MY EARS

A Boston Premiere for "Moses and Aron"

BOSTON.

IT WAS a Bostonian who, when asked "Why go to the moon?" replied "Because it is there." Some similar spirit of steely eyed determination might have animated the Opera Company of Boston to give the first American performance of Arnold Schoenberg's thirty-five-year-old Moses and Aron in what was once the Loew's State and is now the Back Bay Theater. Relative to ordinary opera, its style is lunar-like in remoteness; relative to even an ill-equipped opera house, the Back Bay's launching pad is but primitive. That Sarah Caldwell, director of the production as well as of the company, managed to convey some idea of how it all goes together was—as has been said in another lyric circumstance—"greatly to her credit."

Indeed, in a work which probes dialectically back and forth from the word to the miracle and the miracle to the word (Schoenberg never composed his projected Act III, so the issue remains unresolved), the real miracle was Miss Caldwell's accomplishment in making room for the large chorus to get on and off and take an active, positive part in the conflicts between the brothers. Her most apt thought was to order into existence a lateral front platform running the width of the theater where the rail separating orchestra from audience would normally be. This permitted circulation all around the stage as well as drawing the audience closer into what action there is in the two acts. She also plotted well in building connections from the front boxes of the old movie house down to the stage, thus making possible a small likeness to the pageantry practiced at the Radio City Music Hall.

All this was mothered by the necessity arising from a "stage" which is but thirty feet from footlights to rear wall and was cramped even for the close contacts of the "virgins" and their lovers in the scene of the Golden Calf. Aside from a well gilded bovine (which fell apart nicely when Moses commanded), and a large symbol of a prior faith (which toppled impressively in Act I), the two acts were played against but a suggestion of scenery (by Oliver Smith). Rather it was the sight of the two hundred or more choristers, actors, and supers, ranged in groups on the stage or positioned on ramps running high up into the wings, which comprised a kind of living curtain before which Moses and Aron, identically clad in blue robes and white beards, carried on their struggle for ideological supremacy.

Indeed, with Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) as the "opposite" twins, the visual aspect of the evening came off rather better than the aural. This, again, derived largely from the directness and imagination of Miss Caldwell's conception, in which practically all the "effects" demanded in Schoenberg's script—the rod and the serpent, the leprous hand and the well, the waters of the Nile and the blood, the slaughterous orgies of Act II—were pantomimed. After awhile one did not particularly care, for this device became merely one more instance of unreality in addition to all the others in the work.

Most sizable of these was Schoenberg's serious whimsy in calling this work an opera rather than an oratorio on a sacred-secular theme. Moses himself produces a sustained vocal line only once in the two acts, and then briefly; Aron's part is written in sprechstimme, a form of half-sung, half-spoken declamation; and the orchestra goes through the whole proceedings with those brief, disjointed, formally related but audibly non-consecutive interjections that delight the analysts and bore the public. Even the dance before the Golden Calf which, in some circumstances, can make a lively likeness of intellectualized frenzy, did not achieve such an outcome this time. Possibly because the excellent orchestra of Boston Symphony personnel was so blocked off by the construction before and behind it, the quantity of sound it produced under Osbourne McConathy was rather dead and distant.

Perhaps the most interesting discovery from this adventure into the relatively unknown (there has been, for years, a recording available of a German radio performance) is that it no longer sounds very adventurous, or even perplexing. Since Schoenberg laid the score aside in 1931, after bringing it more or less to the point where it stands today, composers have moved on to sound combinations much more tenuous, skeletonized, and arbitrary than his. Thus one may listen not only with an open mind but also with open ears and conclude that the whole intellectual apparatus is weighted down by commitment to a style which takes it no place, least of all into the emotions of the onlooker-listener. There were, of course, bravos at the end, but one wonders how many of them bespoke an enthusiasm to hear it again—ever.

In terms of an ultimate performance—say, the one Schoenberg imagined in his mind—this one fell short in several respects unrelated to the lack of scenery or other visual resources. Principal among them was the decision to perform the work in English rather than German. This conferred some modest advantage in intelligibility on the solo performers (the choral English, as is almost always the case, was mostly a syllabic hash), but it destroyed the pattern of alliteration to which the composer attached so much importance. As Allen Forte points out in one of his penetrating commentaries on the subject, it is present from Moses's opening "Einziger, Eweger Allgegenwärtiger" (hardly matched by "Only one, infinite, thou omnipresent one") to his final "O Wort, du Wort, das mir fehlt" ("O Word, thou Word, that I lack!"). It was Forte's own translation, with some small alterations for singing convenience, that was utilized.

However, even should such an ultimate performance be organized somewhere, somehow, it could scarcely affect profoundly, let alone reverse, the canon of values embodied in Moses and Aron. Undertaken shortly after Wozzeck was first performed, it lacks, from the outset, the factor that has drawn more and more audiences into Berg's somewhat similar orbit—identification with the personal woe of a recognizable human. There is, indeed, much more drama in Schoenberg the man, with his dauntless pursuit of an ideal, his devotion to principle, his conviction that he was unlocking secrets of art that would endure for decades, than in the work he did under the spell of his visions.

There was, while it remained unproduced, a lingering possibility that Moses and Aron would be the work to make much else about Schoenberg's theorizing "come right." Now that it has been put on, this possibility is, for me at least, foreclosed. What held the attention was, for the most part, the nonmusical elements of the whole—the resourceful scheme of Miss Caldwell's production, the animation generated by the masses of choristers (mostly young, a majority from the New England Conservatory and local choral societies), the wriggling abandon of some of Claude Kipnis's choreography. But these are hardly the stuff from which enduring interest—the life force of operatic vitality—derives.

BACK at home, the season's first matinee broadcast from the Metropolitan of Puccini's Turandot confirmed what the opening night's transmission of Antony and Cleopatra had suggested—that the new pickup for these far flung enterprises is vastly superior to the old. A by-product of the new Metropolitan's much more live sound projection, it gave

(Continued on page 64)

[redacted] a more satisfying culmination of the opera, than the frustration of Moses and his desperate cry: "Oh word, thou word, that I lack!" with which the second act ends. Written by a great composer this torso of an opera is a rewarding enterprise.

Opera had its first stage presentation in Zurich in 1957, Deutsche Oper in (West) Berlin has it in its repertory and performances have been seen in Italy, Austria and France. Covent Garden, London, staged it in 1965. The work is most difficult to stage, play and sing. Yet, the audience impact is overwhelming. In a wild surging panorama, the Israelites are led out of Egypt Close to 200 choristers shout, brawl, exult and doubt and after they get their Golden Calf indulge in an orgy of which much has been said and written, but Miss Caldwell has done well to "de-emphasize" this scene and concentrate more on the spiritual conflict of the opera. Taking the Calf by the horns and with a magnificent set by Oliver Smith, Miss Caldwell hurled action from the orchestra and up the other side. It worked remarkably well.

Boston U. Chorus with addition of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, prepared for many months by Roland Gagnon and the conductor McConathy, was most impressive and its diction delightfully clear (in Allen Forte's English translation). The protagonists were Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) both superb in portrayal and diction. Lewis, who sang the role in the London production, displayed a ringing, glorious tenor voice and Donald Gramm, whose part calls for spoken song, "Sprechstimme" projected with clarity and force. The chorus moved, walked, shouted, whispered, sang and acted their feelings most effectively. Osbourne McConathy conducted the first-rate players, members of the Boston Symphony.

Pantomime devised by Claude Kipnis, the costumes by Stanley Simmons and the shrewd lighting of John Harvey contributed to the success. And so it has come to pass that on an inadequate stage, despite inadequate facilities, "Moses and Aron" had a production that would do honor to any opera house and company in the world.

251

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

DEC 2 1966

'Moses' Puts Boston on the Operatic Map

BY MARTIN BERNHEIMER
Times Music Editor

BOSTON—The eyes of the music world were on Boston Wednesday night. To be exact, they were focused on the Back Bay Theater, once an ornate movie palace with a shallow stage, now the home of Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston.

The redoubtable Miss Caldwell, an anti-Establishment genius, stage director and impresaria, and sometime conductor, trained the public long ago to expect the unexpected from her. She had, after all, established a major opera company at a time when Boston's funds for the arts were dwindling and when the city's marvelous old opera house had been razed to make room for a parking lot. She also had been the power responsible for bringing Berg's "Lulu" to the East, not to mention such rarities as Rossini's "Semiramide," Nono's "Intolleranza" (U.S. premiere), the original version of "Boris Godunov" and Penderecki's "Hymnen" and [illegible]

[illegible] project — a challenge so immense that only three other companies had ever approached it. Arnold Schoenberg's "Moses and Aaron" is a work of staggering musical complexity and seemingly insurmountable theatrical problems. Although incomplete — Schoenberg never wrote music to match his text for the last act—it can stand effectively in its present form, provided it is mounted with suitable, i.e. massive, forces, and by administrative minds sensitive to the pitfalls involved.

Schoenberg began work on the opera as early as 1926. The score for the first two acts was completed in 1932. The resolution of the work preoccupied the composer, unsuccessfully, until his death in 1951.

The first performance took place in concert form three years later in Hamburg. The stage premiere followed in Zurich during 1957, seconded eventually by productions in Berlin and London. Miss Caldwell had originally scheduled the first American performance last season, but had to postpone the date on several occasions because of casting complications.

Personnel Shift

Even now, a late shift in personnel was necessitated by the indisposition of George London, who was to have sung Moses. He was replaced a month ago by Donald Gramm. The latter moved up from his original, smaller assignment, the High Priest.

As vexing as this must have been, it represented but one of many backstage trials. Miss Caldwell and her associates had chosen an opera that demands depiction of such Biblical events as the Burning Bush, such miracles as the staff that changes into the serpent. Bloody sacrifices, both human and animal, are integral portions of the plot, nudity is specifically demanded in several episodes, the Golden Calf sequence develops into what must be the most explicit stage orgy in history.

To compound the producer's headache, Schoenberg has left us a grandiose 12-tone score, in which significance is equalled by complexity.

The miracle of "Moses and Aaron" lies, however, in its emotional appeal. For all its philosophical concern, it still speaks in basic terms of humanity—even theatricality. This, in turn, underscores the premise of the protagonist symbols.

Moses represents the abstract, the lofty; Aaron, his brother and spokesman, represents the practical and worldly. Each is a separate force, and yet each is part of the same entity. The opera, by the same token, deals with the subtle intellect—in form, language, and structure—and with overt human reaction — in mood and histrionics.

It would be futile to pretend that the Boston production is ideal. But that is not the point. More crucial is the fact that Miss Caldwell had the courage and perseverance to attempt the work, plus the skill to make it reasonably effective.

An ironic footnote in the program, by the way, says that Boston is an appropriate site for the premiere because Schoenberg lived in the Hub city for a year in 1933. How much more fitting a Los Angeles-oriented tribute would have been. It was here, after all, that he spent the last 17 years of his life.

Musically, the Boston production proved remarkably successful. In the pit, partially obscured by an unconventional thrust stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided virtuosic solutions to the unique problems before them. The conductor, Osbourne McConathy, himself a former horn player with the Boston Symphony, revealed a flair for precision, architecture and lucidity. He lacked a comparable flair for dramatic impetus, but this, for once, seemed forgiveable. Comparable virtuosity, plus a good deal more power, marked the contribution of the gigantic chorus.

Richard Lewis sang the relatively ornate, relatively lyrical lines of the worldly Aaron [illegible] linear [illegible] pa[illegible] pr[illegible] de[illegible] at the top, and exce[illegible] diction. If his characterization seemed more pallid than was absolutely necessary, the blame cannot be his alone.

In the contrasting declamation of Moses, Donald Gramm did all that intelligence and artistry can do against this casting. Overpowering magnetism of personality is not his to expend on the part. Nor, for that matter, is the ideal weight of tone. Compounding his disadvantages, Gramm seemed tempted to sing his lines more than is warranted by the "Sprechgesang" tradition. Still, his was a sympathetic, wholly professional contribution to the performance, and, as things turned out, the saving one.

In general, the visual [illegible] inconsistent sets of Oliver Smith — failed to define the tone of the work.

"Moses and Aaron" can be interpreted two ways. Either as a spectacular magic show, in which nothing is left to the imagination; or, as a stylized psychological experience in which everything is. The Boston production satisfied proponents of neither extreme. Most physical props, like the transformed Staff and the Burning Bush, were invisible. So were animals, even though they had been present at the dress rehearsal two days earlier. When the action involved such variables, the actors mimed as if only the pure in heart could see the props.

Fine. If applied without compromise, such a technique can indeed be meaningful. But in Boston, Moses and Aaron wore [illegible] genuine whiskers and sandals; realistic rocks were painted on some of the flats; a solid Calf of Gold emerged from the wings (despite the fact that Aaron had fashioned it from invisible donations); slaves toppled a substantial obelisk. In this context, the mimicry looked silly. And the orgy, enacted rather dutifully by gentlemen in fig-leaves and ladies in leotards, failed to create the illusion that might have been possible with a bit less bluntness.

In the final evaluation, however, the deed proved far more important than its execution. Boston has secured its place on the operatic map.

MOSES AND AARON'

Music and text by Arnold Schoenberg. American premiere by the Opera Company of Boston. Staged by Sarah Caldwell. Conducted by Osbourne McConathy. Sets designed by Oliver Smith, lighting by John Harvey, costumes by Stanley Simmons. Chorus augmented by members of the Handel and Haydn Society and New England Conservatory. Choreography by Claude Kipnis. Performed at Back Bay Theater.

Moses ..... Donald Gramm
Aaron ..... Richard Lewis
High Priest .... Herbert Scott Gibson
Young Man ..... Harry Theyard
Another Man ..... Robert Treby
Invalid Woman ..... Eunice Alberts
Naked Virgins ..... Maxine Makas, Eunice Alberts, Evelyn Kazanjian, Elizabeth Lewis

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

DEC 17 1966

MUSIC TO MY EARS

A Boston Premiere for "Moses and Aron"

BOSTON.

IT WAS a Bostonian who, when asked "Why go to the moon?" replied "Because it is there." Some similar spirit of steely eyed determination might have animated the Opera Company of Boston to give the first American performance of Arnold Schoenberg's thirty-five-year-old Moses and Aron in what was once the Loew's State and is now the Back Bay Theater. Relative to ordinary opera, its style is lunar-like in remoteness; relative to even an ill-equipped opera house, the Back Bay's launching pad is but primitive. That Sarah Caldwell, director of the production as well as of the company, managed to convey some idea of how it all goes together was—as has been said in another lyric circumstance—"greatly to her credit."

Indeed, in a work which probes dialectically back and forth from the word to the miracle and the miracle to the word (Schoenberg never composed his projected Act III, so the issue remains unresolved), the real miracle was Miss Caldwell's accomplishment in making room for the large chorus to get on and off and take an active, positive part in the conflicts between the brothers. Her most apt thought was to order into existence a lateral front platform running the width of the theater where the rail separating orchestra from audience would normally be. This permitted circulation all around the stage as well as drawing the audience closer into what action there is in the two acts. She also plotted well in building connections from the front boxes of the old movie house down to the stage, thus making possible a small likeness to the pageantry practiced at the Radio City Music Hall.

All this was mothered by the necessity arising from a "stage" which is but thirty feet from footlights to rear wall and was cramped even for the close contacts of the "virgins" and their lovers in the scene of the Golden Calf. Aside from a well gilded bovine (which fell apart nicely when Moses commanded), and a large symbol of a prior faith (which toppled impressively in Act I), the two acts were played against but a suggestion of scenery (by Oliver Smith). Rather it was the sight of the two hundred or more choristers, actors, and supers, ranged in groups on the stage or positioned on ramps running high up into the wings, which comprised a kind of living curtain before which Moses and Aron, identically clad in blue robes and white beards, carried on their struggle for ideological supremacy.

Indeed, with Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) as the "opposite" twins, the visual aspect of the evening came off rather better than the aural. This, again, derived largely from the directness and imagination of Miss Caldwell's conception, in which practically all the "effects" demanded in Schoenberg's script—the rod and the serpent, the leprous hand and the well, the waters of the Nile and the blood, the slaughterous orgies of Act II—were pantomimed. After awhile one did not particularly care, for this device became merely one more instance of unreality in addition to all the others in the work.

Most sizable of these was Schoenberg's serious whimsy in calling this work an opera rather than an oratorio on a sacred-secular theme. Moses himself produces a sustained vocal line only once in the two acts, and then briefly; Aron's part is written in sprechstimme, a form of half-sung, half-spoken declamation; and the orchestra goes through the whole proceedings with those brief, disjointed, formally related but audibly non-consecutive interjections that delight the analysts and bore the public. Even the dance before the Golden Calf which, in some circumstances, can make a lively likeness of intellectualized frenzy, did not achieve such an outcome this time. Possibly because the excellent orchestra of Boston Symphony personnel was so blocked off by the construction before and behind it, the quantity of sound it produced under Osbourne McConathy was rather dead and distant.

Perhaps the most interesting discovery from this adventure into the relatively unknown (there has been, for years, a recording available of a German radio performance) is that it no longer sounds very adventurous, or even perplexing. Since Schoenberg laid the score aside in 1931, after bringing it more or less to the point where it stands today, composers have moved on to sound combinations much more tenuous, skeletonized, and arbitrary than his. Thus one may listen not only with an open mind but also with open ears and conclude that the whole intellectual apparatus is weighted down by commitment to a style which takes it no place, least of all into the emotions of the onlooker-listener. There were, of course, bravos at the end, but one wonders how many of them bespoke an enthusiasm to hear it again—ever.

In terms of an ultimate performance—say, the one Schoenberg imagined in his mind—this one fell short in several respects unrelated to the lack of scenery or other visual resources. Principal among them was the decision to perform the work in English rather than German. This conferred some modest advantage in intelligibility on the solo performers (the choral English, as is almost always the case, was mostly a syllabic hash), but it destroyed the pattern of alliteration to which the composer attached so much importance. As Allen Forte points out in one of his penetrating commentaries on the subject, it is present from Moses's opening "Einziger, Eweger Allgegenwärtiger" (hardly matched by "Only one, infinite, thou omnipresent one") to his final "O Wort, du Wort, das mir fehlt" ("O Word, thou Word, that I lack!"). It was Forte's own translation, with some small alterations for singing convenience, that was utilized.

However, even should such an ultimate performance be organized somewhere, somehow, it could scarcely affect profoundly, let alone reverse, the canon of values embodied in Moses and Aron. Undertaken shortly after Wozzeck was first performed, it lacks, from the outset, the factor that has drawn more and more audiences into Berg's somewhat similar orbit—identification with the personal woe of a recognizable human. There is, indeed, much more drama in Schoenberg the man, with his dauntless pursuit of an ideal, his devotion to principle, his conviction that he was unlocking secrets of art that would endure for decades, than in the work he did under the spell of his visions.

There was, while it remained unproduced, a lingering possibility that Moses and Aron would be the work to make much else about Schoenberg's theorizing "come right." Now that it has been put on, this possibility is, for me at least, foreclosed. What held the attention was, for the most part, the nonmusical elements of the whole—the resourceful scheme of Miss Caldwell's production, the animation generated by the masses of choristers (mostly young, a majority from the New England Conservatory and local choral societies), the wriggling abandon of some of Claude Kipnis's choreography. But these are hardly the stuff from which enduring interest—the life force of operatic vitality—derives.

BACK at home, the season's first matinee broadcast from the Metropolitan of Puccini's Turandot confirmed what the opening night's transmission of Antony and Cleopatra had suggested—that the new pickup for these far flung enterprises is vastly superior to the old. A by-product of the new Metropolitan's much more live sound projection, it gave a more satisfying culmination of the opera, than the frustration of Moses and his desperate cry: "Oh word, thou word, that I lack!" with which the second act ends. Written by a great composer this torso of an opera is a rewarding enterprise.

(Continued on page 64)

Opera had its first stage presentation in Zurich in 1957, Deutsche Oper in (West) Berlin has it in its repertory and performances have been seen in Italy, Austria and France. Covent Garden, London, staged it in 1965. The work is most difficult to stage, play and sing. Yet, the audience impact is overwhelming. In a wild surging panorama, the Israelites are led out of Egypt Close to 200 choristers shout, brawl, exult and doubt and after they get their Golden Calf indulge in an orgy of which much has been said and written, but Miss Caldwell has done well to "de-emphasize" this scene and concentrate more on the spiritual conflict of the opera. Taking the Calf by the horns and with a magnificent set by Oliver Smith, Miss Caldwell hurled action from the orchestra and up the other side. It worked remarkably well.

Boston U. Chorus with addition of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, prepared for many months by Roland Gagnon and the conductor McConathy, was most impressive and its diction delightfully clear (in Allen Forte's English translation). The protagonists were Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) both superb in portrayal and diction. Lewis, who sang the role in the London production, displayed a ringing, glorious tenor voice and Donald Gramm, whose part calls for spoken song, "Sprechstimme" projected with clarity and force. The chorus moved, walked, shouted, whispered, sang and acted their feelings most effectively. Osbourne McConathy conducted the first-rate players, members of the Boston Symphony.

Pantomime devised by Claude Kipnis, the costumes by Stanley Simmons and the shrewd lighting of John Harvey contributed to the success. And so it has come to pass that on an inadequate stage, despite inadequate facilities, "Moses and Aron" had a production that would do honor to any opera house and company in the world.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WEEKLY-CIRC.N.AVAIL.
DEC 7 1966

Schoenberg-Coulbi't Raise $3,000, But Hub Stages 'Moses & Aron' With $200,000 From Foundations

By TRUDY GOTH

Boston, Dec. 6.

When he arrived in the United States as a refugee from Nazi Germany, the late composer Arnold Schoenberg sought in vain for $3,000 in aid to complete his 12-tone opera, "Moses and Aron." Last week the still-incomplete opera was produced in a Beck Bay film theatre with $200,000 from foundations, proving the point that donors most favor dead genius. The widow collected $20,000 for the exclusive U.S. performance rights through 1969, a windfall of some irony in the light of her husband's frustrations.

For the Opera Co. of Boston production (Sarah Caldwell) "Moses and Aron" attracted critics from the Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Washington Star, Baltimore Sun, Philadelphia Bulletin, all of the New York dailies, the

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396
DEC 2 1966

Moses Tus Boston on the Operatic Map

BY MARTIN BERNHEIMER

BOSTON—The eye of the opera world were on Boston last night. To be exact, they were focused on the Back Bay Wednesday night, when Boston's shallow stage, mere palace with a mini-Estabblishment, genius, director and impresario, and Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston

The redoubtable Miss Caldwell

Personnel Shift

Even now, a late shift in personnel was necessitated by the indisposition of George London, who was to have sung Moses. He has replaced a month ago by Donald Gramm. The latter moved up from his original, smaller assignment, the High Priest.

As vexing as this must have been, it represented but one of many backstage hurdles. Miss Caldwell and her associates had chosen an opera that demands defiction of such Biblical events as the Burning Bush, such miracles as the staff that changes into the serpent, Bloody sacrifices, human and animal, integral portions of the nudity is specifically commended in several epistles, the Golden Calf sequence develops into what must be the most explicit sage orgy in history.

To compound the problems, Schoenberg's bedazzle, Schoenberg's 12-tone score, in which intelligence is equalled by complexity.

The miracle of "Moses and Aron" lies, however, in its emotional appeal, for all its philosophical concern, it still speaks in basic terms of humanity—even theatrically. This, in turn, underscores the prerequisite of the protagonist, symbolic.

Moses represents the abstract, undersoores the prerequisite of the protagonist.

Richard Lewis sang the relatively ornate, relatively lyrical title role in the worldly Aaron.

Gentle chorus

The contribution of the girl pit, partially obscured by an unconventional thrust stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided virtuosic solutions to the unique problems s before them. The conductor, Osbourne McConathy, himself a former horn player with the Boston Symphony, revealed a flair for precision, architecture and lucidity. He lacked a comparable flair for dramatic impetus, but this, for once, seemed forgiveable. Comparable virtuosity, plus a good deal more power, marked the contribution of the girl-the home listener a keen appreciation of the colorful sound that Zubin Mehta's direction makes of this score, not to mention a heightened esteem for Birgit Nilsson's prodigious Turandot and the ever improving Calaf of Franco Corelli. Mirella Freni's Liù was a particular plus, for those who value her art, in a season where she has not had the opportunities her qualities cry out for.

Continued from page 41

VOCAL art on an estimable level was also provided by Janet Baker in her first Town Hall recital, after prior participation in Carnegie Hall performances of major works by Handel (Serse) and Donizetti (Anna Bolena). It was, indeed, a good enough evening of singing (on a classical plan that ranged from Mozart to Fauré) to raise the flattering question of how it could be even better. That should begin at the beginning: namely, whether Miss Baker is a mezzo soprano, as billed, or more properly a soprano.

Aside from ending Schubert's "Abendröte" on a low G and visiting that region from time to time later, Miss Baker did most of her performance in close to normal soprano territory. The voice is anything but heavy (it is inclined, indeed, to be reedy or white) and she caressed it into a barely audible but beautifully sustained pianissimo in "Der Gondelfahrer," another of her discriminating selections from the less frequently favored but no less great range of the Schubert literature.

Miss Baker's ability to color sound and to control the amount of it she utilized was conspicuous also in the opening Mozart ("Vado, ma dove?" from Martin's Il Burbero di buon core and "Parto, parto" from Titus). In the latter she showed a full formed florid technique rare among contemporary singers of any category. Her French literature (Duparc, Berlioz, Fauré) was likewise idiomatic. Generally, however, the effect of her singing derived from a well polished surface rather than from penetration of essentials. Martin Isepp was the spirited accompanist. —IRVING KOLODIN.

251

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 839,735 SUN. 1,175,396

DEC 2 1966

'Moses' Puts Boston on the Operatic Map

BY MARTIN BERNHEIMER
Times Music Editor

BOSTON—The eyes of the music world were on Boston Wednesday night. To be exact, they were focused on the Back Bay Theater, once an ornate movie palace with a shallow stage, now the home of Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston.

The redoubtable Miss Caldwell, an anti-Establishment genius, stage director and impresaria, and sometime conductor, trained the public long ago to expect the unexpected from her. She had, after all, established a major opera company at a time when Boston's funds for the arts were dwindling and when the city's marvelous old opera house had been razed to make room for a parking lot. She also had been the power responsible for bringing Berg's "Lulu" to the East, not to mention such rarities as Rossini's "Semiramide," Nono's "Intolleranza" (U.S. premiere), the original version of "Boris Godunov" and Britten's "Humphry Clinker" and [illegible]

[illegible] regarding her most ambitious project — a challenge so immense that only three other companies had ever approached it. Arnold Schoenberg's "Moses and Aaron" is a work of staggering musical complexity and seemingly insurmountable theatrical problems. Although incomplete — Schoenberg never wrote music to match his text for the last act—it can stand effectively in its present form, provided it is mounted with suitable, i.e. massive, forces, and by administrative minds sensitive to the pitfalls involved.

Schoenberg began work on the opera as early as 1926. The score for the first two acts was completed in 1932. The resolution of the work preoccupied the composer, unsuccessfully, until his death in 1951.

The first performance took place in concert form three years later in Hamburg. The stage premiere followed in Zurich during 1957, seconded eventually by productions in Berlin and London. Miss Caldwell had originally scheduled the first American performance last season, but had to postpone the date on several occasions because of casting complications.

Personnel Shift

Even now, a late shift in personnel was necessitated by the indisposition of George London, who was to have sung Moses. He was replaced a month ago by Donald Gramm. The latter moved up from his original, smaller assignment, the High Priest.

As vexing as this must have been, it represented but one of many backstage trials. Miss Caldwell and her associates had chosen an opera that demands depiction of such Biblical events as the Burning Bush, such miracles as the staff that changes into the serpent. Bloody sacrifices, both human and animal, are integral portions of the plot, nudity is specifically demanded in several episodes, the Golden Calf sequence develops into what must be the most explicit stage orgy in history.

To compound the producer's headache, Schoenberg has left us a grandiose 12-tone score, in which significance is equalled by complexity.

The miracle of "Moses and Aaron" lies, however, in its emotional appeal. For all its philosophical concern, it still speaks in basic terms of humanity—even theatricality. This, in turn, underscores the premise of the protagonist symbols.

Moses represents the abstract, the lofty; Aaron, his brother and spokesman, represents the practical and worldly. Each is a separate force, and yet each is part of the same entity. The opera, by the same token, deals with the subtle intellect—in form, language, and structure—and with overt human reaction — in mood and histrionics.

It would be futile to pretend that the Boston production is ideal. But that is not the point. More crucial is the fact that Miss Caldwell had the courage and perseverance to attempt the work, plus the skill to make it reasonably effective.

An ironic footnote in the program, by the way, says that Boston is an appropriate site for the premiere because Schoenberg lived in the Hub city for a year in 1933. How much more fitting a Los Angeles-oriented tribute would have been. It was here, after all, that he spent the last 17 years of his life.

Musically, the Boston production proved remarkably successful. In the pit, partially obscured by an unconventional thrust stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided virtuosic solutions to the unique problems before them. The conductor, Osbourne McConathy, himself a former horn player with the Boston Symphony, revealed a flair for precision, architecture and lucidity. He lacked a comparable flair for dramatic impetus, but this, for once, seemed forgiveable. Comparable virtuosity, plus a good deal more power, marked the contribution of the gigantic chorus.

Richard Lewis sang the relatively ornate, relatively lyrical line[illegible] the worldly Aaron [illegible] linear [illegible] at the top, and exemplary diction. If his characterization seemed more pallid than was absolutely necessary, the blame cannot be his alone.

In the contrasting declamation of Moses, Donald Gramm did all that intelligence and artistry can do against this casting. Overpowering magnetism of personality is not his to expend on the part. Nor, for that matter, is the ideal weight of tone. Compounding his disadvantages, Gramm seemed tempted to sing his lines more than is warranted by the "Sprechgesang" tradition. Still, his was a sympathetic, wholly professional contribution to the performance, and, as things turned out, the saving one.

In general, the visual [illegible] inconsistent sets of Oliver Smith — failed to define the tone of the work.

"Moses and Aaron" can be interpreted two ways. Either as a spectacular magic show, in which nothing is left to the imagination; or, as a stylized psychological experience in which everything is. The Boston production satisfied proponents of neither extreme. Most physical props, like the transformed Staff and the Burning Bush, were invisible. So were animals, even though they had been present at the dress rehearsal two days earlier. When the action involved such variables, the actors mimed as if only the pure in heart could see the props.

Fine. If applied without compromise, such a technique can indeed be meaningful. But in Boston, Moses and Aaron wore [illegible] genuine whi[illegible] dals; realisti[illegible] painted on [illegible] flats; a solid [illegible] emerged from the wings (despite the fact that Aaron had fashioned it from invisible donations); slaves toppled a substantial obelisk. In this context, the mimicry looked silly. And the orgy, enacted rather dutifully by gentlemen in fig-leaves and ladies in leotards, failed to create the illusion that might have been possible with a bit less bluntness.

In the final evaluation, however, the deed proved far more important than its execution. Boston has secured its place on the operatic map.

'MOSES AND AARON'

Music and text by Arnold Schoenberg. American premiere by the Opera Company of Boston. Staged by Sarah Caldwell. Conducted by Osbourne McConathy. Sets designed by Oliver Smith, lighting by John Harvey, costumes by Stanley Simmons. Chorus augmented by members of the Handel and Haydn Society and New England Conservatory. Choreography by Claude Kipnis. Performed at Back Bay Theater.

Moses ..... Donald Gramm
Aaron ..... Richard Lewis
High Priest ..... Herbert Scott Gibson
Young Man ..... Harry Theyard
Another Man ..... Robert Trehy
Invalid Woman ..... Eunice Alberts
Naked Virgins ..... Maxine Makas, Eunice Alberts, Evelyn Kazanjian, Elizabeth Lewis

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100

DEC 17 1966

Los Angeles

DESPITE the fact that Dido and Aeneas probably never did meet and become entangled on the North African shores of Carthage, the two operas based on this "incident"—Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and Berlioz's Les Troyens à Carthage—have been the benefactors of current and renewed interest on stage and on the turntable. Even in the face of possible historical inaccuracy, the poet Virgil's story of a great queen's tragic love for the man whose destiny it was to found Rome cannot help being an irresistible theatrical-musical experience. N. D. Boyling, in his highly informative notes to Angel's new recording of the Purcell opera (36359; S-36359), points up the fact that the fall of Troy, and Aeneas's flight, occurred more than three centuries before Dido's supposed founding of Carthage.

But no matter, Purcell's only real opera (1689), with a libretto by Nahum Tate, has been treated with rewarding care and affection on this, the third stereo version of the chamber opera. Long-time Purcellian and pioneer in matters of English music, Sir John Barbirolli conducts the English Chamber Orchestra and The Ambrosian Singers in an immensely satisfying performance that is spacious and sympathetic, always enhancing Purcell's fresh and lively melodies.

Arias, choruses, and the free arioso recitatives are all well articulated, with not a trace of scholar-like rigidity. The strings sound bright, warm, and polished; and Barbirolli's flexible rhythms carry the music along at a fine pace that is never anything but considerate to his singers. Harpsichordist-conductor-scholar Raymond Leppard, who with Boying sorted out all the available editions of the opera (this version is based mainly on the Tatton Park manuscript, written by Philip Hayes about 1780) in search of the most authentic score possible, adds his own measure of authenticity in his imaginative harpsichord realizations and has seemingly encouraged the entire forces to performances that accurately reflect the conventions of the period.

Certainly on an equal plane of interest with Sir John's direction of the Purcell score is the presence of Victoria de los Angeles, essaying the role of Dido for the first time in her career. It can be said that hers is a beguiling performance with the qualities equal to the best she has given in the past on stage and rec-

Complet
Handel's
31 voice
3 record
RCA

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WEEKLY-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

DEC 7 1966

Schoenberg Couldn't Raise $3,000, But Hub Stages 'Moses & Aron' With $200,000 From Foundations

By TRUDY GOTH

Boston, Dec. 6.

When he arrived in the United States as a refugee from Nazi Germany, the late composer Arnold Schoenberg sought in vain for $3,000 in aid to complete his 12-tone opera, "Moses and Aron." Last week the still-uncomplete opera was produced in a Back Bay film theatre with $200,000 from foundations, proving the point that donors most favor dead genius. The widow collected $20,000 for the exclusive U.S. performance rights through 1969, a windfall of some irony in the light of her husband's frustrations.

For the Opera Co. of Boston production (Sarah Caldwell) "Moses and Aron" attracted critics from the Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Washington Star, Baltimore Sun, Philadelphia Bulletin, all of the New York dailies, the New Yorker, Saturday Review, Opera News, Cue, VARIETY, both wire services.

Schoenberg's only full length opera is considered by many music authorities as the most significant operatic work of this century. Miss Caldwell has dared it's difficulties against the technical limitations of a "non-theatre" built for films. Her vision, imagination and sheer guts brought off "the event" of the 1966 operatic year. Her staging of "Moses and Aron" makes for one of the impressive and elaborate operatic shows ever attempted.

As conceived by the composer the opera is in itself a masterpiece of dramatic impact, with his own text derived from Exodus. The basic issue is simple: the inability of a man to communicate to others what he feels and understands, and the resultant misunderstanding and rejection which deepens his plight. Moses is obsessed by God as "Idea" alone. The vacillating Aron, (his brother) on the other hand, succumbs to the hysterical mob and gives them the Golden Calf. By having Moses and Aron appear several times, as a Janus figure, pivoting back-to-back, the staging suggests Schoenberg's textual implications that they represent different aspects of "man."

Schoenberg started sketching the opera in 1926 and finished the second act in 1932, but never completed the opera. But a third act hardly seems necessary. It would be difficult to conceive of a more satisfying culmination of the opera, than the frustration of Moses and his desperate cry: "Oh word, thou word, that I lack!" with which the second act ends. Written by a great composer this torso of an opera is a rewarding enterprise.

Opera had its first stage presentation in Zurich in 1957, Deutsche Oper in (West) Berlin has it in its repertory and performances have been seen in Italy, Austria and France. Covent Garden, London, staged it in 1965. The work is most difficult to stage, play and sing. Yet, the audience impact is overwhelming. In a wild surging panorama, the Israelites are led out of Egypt Close to 200 choristers shout, brawl, exult and doubt and after they get their Golden Calf indulge in an orgy of which much has been said and written, but Miss Caldwell has done well to "de-emphasize" this scene and concentrate more on the spiritual conflict of the opera. Taking the Calf by the horns and with a magnificent set by Oliver Smith, Miss Caldwell hurled action from the orchestra and up the other side. It worked remarkably well.

Boston U. Chorus with addition of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, prepared for many months by Roland Gagnon and the conductor McConathy, was most impressive and its diction delightfully clear (in Allen Forte's English translation). The protagonists were Donald Gramm (Moses) and Richard Lewis (Aron) both superb in portrayal and diction. Lewis, who sang the role in the London production, displayed a ringing, glorious tenor voice and Donald Gramm, whose part calls for spoken song, "Sprechstimme" projected with clarity and force. The chorus moved, walked, shouted, whispered, sang and acted their feelings most effectively. Osbourne McConathy conducted the first-rate players, members of the Boston Symphony.

Pantomime devised by Claude Kipnis, the costumes by Stanley Simmons and the shrewd lighting of John Harvey contributed to the success. And so it has come to pass that on an inadequate stage, despite inadequate facilities, "Moses and Aron" had a production that would do honor to any opera house and company in the world.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POTSDAM COURIER FREEMAN
Thursday, December 8, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, December 7, 1966

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WATERTOWN TIMES
Monday, December 12, 1966

Mozart, Stravinsky Works Program for Crane Concert December 10-11

MISS BRYN-JULSON

Crane Chorus and Orchestra at The State University College at Potsdam will perform Mozart's, "Mass in C," and Stravinsky's, "Symphony of Psalms," to highlight the college's annual winter concert next weekend (Dec. 10-11).

One of two major on-campus concerts given annually by Crane Chorus and Orchestra, the winter program will con- urday at 8:30 p.m. and Sunday at 3 p.m. in Potsdam's College Theater.

Brock McElheran, co-conductor with Carl E. Druba of the Crane Chorus, will conduct the 450-member chorus and orchestra. Maurice H. Baritaud, director of the Crane Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra through the performance of Vaughan Williams', "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis."

Concert soloists will include soprano Phyllis Bryn-Julson, a Syracuse University senior who has performed with the Boston Symphony and at the Tanglewood (Mass.) Music Festival.

Miss Bryn-Julson will be joined in soloist roles by four students from Potsdam's Crane department of music. They are Rosalyn Paul, soprano; Pamela Nyce, mezzo-soprano; Richard Taylor, tenor; and Harry Gardner, baritone.

Tickets for either winter concert performance many be obtained at the door prior to the start of the program, or in advance through the Crane department of music office at the college.

Stravinsky composed the monumental "Symphony of Psalms" in 1930 "to the glory of God" and dedicated it to the Boston Symphony orchestra. Remaining faithful to his creed of order and meaning, the composer economically selected his musical materials, conceiving harmony, counterpoint, orchestration, thematic content, rhythm and dynamics as a unified whole which suggests the vastness of God. Revealing his predilection for isolating rather than mixing sounds, he lucidly drew and starkly contrasted instrumental and vocal lines. Stravinsky selected the text of the three movements from all or parts of three Psalms. By his use of the Latin language, he permitted objective treatment of voices as an additional instrumental color.

A difficult work to execute, listeners and performers alike stand in awe of this choral - instrumental "symphony". In performance, Stravinsky's esthetic emerges only when his economy of means and clarity of line are in evidence.

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 54,576 SUN. 75,701
DEC 4 1966

Tom Krause To Sing Here December 13

LSU's Lecturers and Artists Series will continue on Dec. 15 with a recital by Tom Krause, a young Finnish baritone who has won acclaim as one of the world's foremost concert and lieder singers.

The program is scheduled for 8 p.m. in the LSU Union Theater.

Tickets for this individual event in the Lecturers and Artists Series will go on sale Sunday at the Union box office. The box office is open from 12:30 to 5:30 p.m. daily.

TOM KRAUSE

Tom Krause made his American debut during one of the major musical events of 1963, the American premier of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The young singer also sang with the Boston Symphony when it performed Britten's masterpiece in New York. Krause won high critical praise for his part in both performances.

The baritone's New York recital debut was also enthusiastically received by audiences and critics alike. The New York "Herald Tribune" wrote that "Krause the recitalist lives up to his reputation and achievement as Krause the recording artist;" and another described him as a "first-rate lieder singer."

OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN
D. 26,500
DEC 31 1966

Lawrence Will Present Pianist Malcolm Frager

APPLETON — Award-winning American pianist Malcolm Frager will present the next concert of the Lawrence-Community Artist Series at 8 p.m. Monday, Jan. 9 in Lawrence University's Memorial Chapel.

Frager, 32, was the first pianist ever to win what Time Magazine called "two of the toughest competitions in music," the Edgar M. Leventritt Award in the United States (1959), and the First Prize at the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Music Competition in Brussels (1960).

The two prizes boosted the St. Louis-born artist to the forefront of the world's concert pianists. Since then he has undertaken annual European tours, semi-annual tours of Central and South America, and a widely heralded series of 25 concerts in the Soviet Union, all to the highest critical acclaim.

Success has been no stranger to Frager. After beginning piano study with his grandmother at the age of four, he gave his first public recital at six. At 10 he was soloist with the St. Louis Symphony under Vladimir Golschmann. At 14 he went to New York to study with the eminent Carl Friedberg. At 18 he entered Columbia University where he majored in languages, was elected to Phi Beta Kappa, and was graduated magna cum laude in 1957.

After military service, Frager again settled down to his music. His artistic maturity first showed in the Leventritt competition. Time Magazine reported: "While almost everybody else fidgeted nervously at last week's finals, pianist Frager retired to the artists' room, snapped off the lights and sat quietly in the pitch dark. 'I was thinking,' he explained later, 'about the music.'"

Other observers have found a distinctive quality about Frager's playing. Harold Schonberg, of the New York Times, once wrote that a particular Frager performance — of the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 2 — was "positively immoral" because he "made such difficult writing sound so easy."

Reviewer Harold Rogers, of the Christian Science Monitor, was moved by a Tanglewood performance to write: "He has an unusual ability to dazzle the ear — as all good concert pianists should do — but his playing is not for the ear alone. It also fulfills the basic function of music as a language that speaks to the heart."

In Russia, audiences simply acknowledged Frager's genius with standing ovations — at every one of his 25 concerts!

Frager's growth is laced with impressive accomplishments. Among his other awards have been the Prix d'Excellence at the American Conservatory in Fontainebleau, France (1952); the International Competition at Geneva (1955); the Michaels Memorial Music Award in Chicago (1956), and the National Career Award of the National Society of Arts and Letters in Los Angeles (1958).

President Eisenhower invited Frager to the White House in 1960 to play at a glittering banquet for the King and Queen of Denmark. Frager has appeared at Tanglewood in four consecutive summers with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf. While in Moscow he played four two-piano recitals with the brilliant young Soviet pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, a program which was repeated a year later when the two toured Belgium and Iceland.

Frager's concert, third of the Lawrence Artist Series season, will be followed by a public reception for the artist at Memorial Union. Tickets for the concert go on sale at the University Box Office in the Music-Drama Center, 115 N. Park Ave., on Tuesday, Jan. 3. Box Office hours are from noon to 6 p.m. daily, except Sunday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 51,098
DEC 7 1966

Joint Music Effort

The M.I.T. Choral Society, 48 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and four professional soloists will join to perform the Verdi Requiem Sunday, Dec. 11 at 3 p.m. in M.I.T. Kresge Auditorium in Cambridge.

Soloists will be contralto Eunice Alberts, soprano Helen Boatwright, tenor Richard McComb and bass Paul Matthen. M.I.T. professor of music Klaus Leipmann will direct the performance. Tickets may be purchased at the door or reserved by calling UN 4-6900.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News
W. HARTFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 5,920
DEC 29 1966

W. H. Adult School Will Hear Musical Lecture Series

The University of Connecticut's Continuing Education Services and the West Hartford Adult School are sponsoring a special spring lecture series in music at Conard High School.

The series titled "A Study in Viennese Classicism," will be held on six Thursdays starting February 9 from 8:15 to 9:45 p.m.

Instructor for the course will be Dr. Petter Juel-Larsen, associate professor of music at the University of Connecticut, and a talented pianist.

Dr. Juel-Larsen has spent recent summers touring Europe as a member of leading orchestras and perfored with the Boston Symphony when it appeared at the University of Connecticut campus in Storrs.

Topics of his lectures include: "The Opera," "The Symphony," "The Quartet," "The Sonata," and "The Concerto."

Those wishing to register for the course may do so by mail by writing to Continuing Education Services, Non-Credit Extension, Room 107, University of Connecticut, Storrs, Conn., 06268.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, December 31, 1966

New Music Year to Open With Gifted Guest Artists

PHILHARMONIC leads off in the New Year with programs Jan. 15 and 17, presenting guest conductor Eleazar de Carvalho of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. In a brief exchange, Buffalo conductor Lukas Foss will be in St. Louis for guest appearances.

Both musicians were students proteges of the distinguished conductor Sergei Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Buffalo Philharmonic principal cellist Howard Colf will be soloist on the programs, in the Villa-Lobos Fantasy. Mr. de Carvalho will conduct the Five Pieces Op. 16 of Shoenberg and the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique.

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO
Guest Conductor on Jan. 15, 17

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
DEC 8 1966

'Increasingly Waspish'

This letter is written to protest the appalling bad taste of your music critic, Michael Steinberg, in his "review" last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

I have appreciated Mr. Steinberg's writing on many occasions and quite often concurred with him. However, I find he is growing increasingly waspish this year in his reviews and altogether too prone to wish to display his erudition. Granted he knows a great deal about musicology —I recognize the fact. But music in Boston cannot be quite as inferior in quality as he would like us to believe. Some of us know something about music, too, although of course not as much as Mr. Steinberg!

It seems to me your critic owes our orchestra and its eminent guest conductor an apology. Mr. Steinberg's brashness may beget lively copy, but it is not in the tradition of The Globe and its high standards.

CAROLINE AYER ALBRIGHT
Cambridge

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 286,021
NOV 27 1966

Symphony At MIT to Play Dec. 4

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will join the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Symphony Orchestra as guest soloist in a performance of the Beethoven Violin Concerto at a concert in Kresge Auditorium at 8:30 p.m. Sunday, Dec. 4. The concert will be the first of the season for the M.I.T. Symphony.

The concert will include two Boston premieres: the "Drottningholms-Musique" by the 18th century Swedish composer Johan Helmich Roman, and the "Sinfonietta" by the contemporary Czech composer Leos Janacek.

Tickets may be obtained at the door only and are priced at $1.

253

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

JAN 15 1967

McLAREN HARRIS, Music Critic

Some Notes About Program Notes

Few would argue with the contention that program books are advertising leaflets first and musically informative last, but fewer still would be willing to give them up, if only because they may have forgotten the identity of the artist or artists in the concert they are about to hear.

And then, having restored memories as to artists and program content, what is more entertaining than to inspect the newest fashions in trousseaux and evening dress, plugs for automobiles, newspapers, banks, places to eat and ways to heat?

This may come as a blow to program annotators, some of whom expend considerable labor composing digests of fact and opinion about musical works which they hope will be helpful to the listener. To these we may offer the partial reassurance that a great many do pay attention to such annotations and reap benefits therefrom.

PROGRAM NOTES, to be useful, must identify the composer, offer pertinent biographical information if necessary, place the work historically and in relation to the composer's total output, and include some preview, in whatever terms possible, of the sounds in store. The facts must be accurate and the opinions reasonable; otherwise the annotator, anonymous or not, will be (and should be) polloried by sharp-eyed critics.

Of course where the work is generally familiar, the annotations need not be that complete; and when the program contains a multitude of pieces, such as for a vocal recital, space rarely permits inclusive summaries. But blanket assumptions about familiarity should be avoided in the former case, and an indication of content, if not entire texts or translations, should appear in the latter.

Styles of program annotation are often traditions with particular organizations; some are unfailingly complete, others provide the bare essentials, others bare non-essentials and still others nothing at all.

JOHN N. BURK, until his recent retirement, put together the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Burk was an infrequent victim (and therefore an infrequent perpetrator) of misinformation; his notes were elaborate in both data and description, and his capsule performance histories which preface each section have become standard references. The Symphony, having yet to appoint Mr. Burk's successor, continues to rely upon his work whenever possible.

Notes supplied in the past with programs of the Camerata of the Museum of Fine Arts were usually the fruits of the same musicological research which went into the preparation of the performances; they were often carried off by enterprising music students. Program books of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Chorus pro Musica consistently offer complete texts of choral works, usually in both languages if the original is foreign.

But most organizations, guided by purpose or budget necessities, offer less than the best. Celebrity Series pamphlets contain one or two paragraphs about each piece, frequently insufficient and occasionally inscrutable; the Opera Company of Boston rarely offers synopses of its productions and the Boston Opera Association (the Metropolitan's sponsor) never does; the Boston Symphony String Quartet, Chamber Players and the Morning Musicale, for practical reasons of economy, include few or no notes.

THERE HAVE been times when program notes defeated their own purpose. Consider poor Elliott Carter, whose Piano Concerto was introduced to Symphony audiences on Jan. 6.

Utilizing his own system of organization in a relatively unfamiliar idiom, Mr. Carter sought to clarify his intents by outlining his materials and methods in the program. We thought he did a respectable job.

One member of that audience, however, took another view, commenting afterwards to a friend: "I knew from reading the program notes that I wouldn't get anything out of it."

Forewarned is forearmed?

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,177

JAN 7 1967

As I Hear It

Second Fiddle

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

EVERY ORCHESTRA conductor has his own ideas about where he wants to place his strings. Almost without exception, as far as I know, the first violins are always to the conductor's left, as he faces his men. Koussevitzky and Munch, when they were at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, placed the violas to their right with the second violins behind the firsts and the cellos behind the violas. Leinsdorf has his cellos outside and the violas behind them. Stokowski in Philadelphia once tried placing a desk of flutes in front of the first violins and a desk of oboes ahead of the strings to his right. The object, of course, is to try for the best tonal balance and apparently there is little agreement on that point.

There are a few concerted compositions which do not require all four string voices. In general the four sections are like the legs of a table. It is no more possible to have music without a second violin than it is to build a house without a foundation. Yet in almost every endeavor the man who builds the facade "carries the tune" and gets the notices while those who build the substructure, or furnish the harmonic support, remain submerged and are passed by unobserved.

In music whether it be a small ensemble, an orchestra or an opera there is usually one person or one section which gets the salient role while everyone else involved is like the below-water parts of an iceberg. In fact there are few efforts in any field where a second fiddle isn't required. The football line must hold while the backfield star passes; the demure demoiselle on top of the human pyramid in the circus waves to the plaudits of the audience while the stalwarts on the ground strain to hold up the human triangle; the fellow playing second violin saws away at an essential harmonic mainstay from which the first takes off in virtuosic flight.

* * *

THERE HAVE BEEN string quartets where the two violinists interchanged chairs, alternating during a program or at successive concerts. Duo-pianists normally exchange keyboards during a recital. But some individuals are permanent second fiddles, not necessarily in music, but in any effort where teamplay is required. An enterprise could not exist or prosper without them. Indeed, some men are especially fitted and so recognized for the job, and there is no derogatory hint or stigma implied.

In music of the 18th century, a Haydn quartet, for example, the first violin normally tells the story and the other three voices provide the scenery. It is a remarkable analogy that, as society, bit by bit, has recognized the dignity of the individual in steadily increasing measure, music has given more stature to the voices which had been, so-to-speak, the background. By the time Beethoven was writing his "late" quartets everybody's place in the limelight was becoming more important and everyone was being given his chance to "carry the tune." And, as of today, the only reason we know a man is playing second fiddle, say, in a Bartok quartet, is by his place on stage. No one writes a part merely of oom-pahs and afterbeats any more. The first violin may be the dominant person in an ensemble but he is primus inter pares (first among equals).

* * *

AND SO IT IS in society. No country, no race, no people are willing any more to play second fiddle. As imperative as it is recognized that there is a need for second fiddlers in ever so many enterprises, no man feels that he should be chosen for the job for any reason other than for competence. His capacity should be the only measure.

The members of the second violin sections in every orchestra are always on the lookout for a chance to audition to be advanced to the first section. The ones already there are zealous to keep their places and hence, if necessary, keep the others in theirs. There are still people on earth who think that citizens of other nations who are not as advanced as we are "should be kept in their place." But the vast majority of the world's population recognizes the aspirations of those who, hitherto, for many reasons have been second fiddlers, and are desirous of helping them find seats in the section of the firsts.

As the world becomes smaller and the opportunities of education make more and more people compatible socially, some men of vision foresee a day when there will be no more need of second fiddlers. With automation and electronics the role of the musicians narrows. Who dares tell what science will do to make possible and viable what was unthinkable only yesterday!

* * *

OF COURSE, everyone can't carry the ball. We need vice presidents and assistant managers and their equivalents in every phase of living. Someone has to hand the surgeon his instruments and the chef his herbs. The assistants get impatient at times and seek to hasten their progress by aggressive action. This creates situations which may seem deplorable to the larger share of those involved but Frederick Douglas said, "Those who profess to favor freedom and yet deprecate agitation are men who want crops without plowing the ground."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

JAN 1 1967

Show Guide | MUSIC

McLAREN HARRIS, Music Critic:

Some Boston Bests In the Last Year

The music world is accustomed to operating on a fiscal year about four months removed from the regular calendar years, with New Year's Day arriving on Sept. 1. It may be a questionable practice, therefore, to select vintage musical events from January to December, 1966 as one must take in halves of two concert seasons; but since this is the traditional time to wake up in amazement and attempt to figure out what happened to the old year, I shall do it anyway.

Beside the intrusion of the newspaper strike early in the year, there is one further problem which deserves notice. Music critics, being mortal beings with human gifts and failings and rarely the insensitive, miscreant, frustrated semi-deities which some people suspect they are, can attend only one program at a time and just so many in a week's span. They cannot hear everyone. Hence among the choices there appear certain concerts I did not attend, and in these cases I have relied upon the eminent criticisms of my colleagues, Robert Taylor, Daniel Rosen and Rena Fruchter.

Any order in which the various categories are presented still looks like mild chaos from the outside, but an obvious candidate for first place would be the MOST IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENT — This goes to the American premiere of Schoenberg's opera, "Moses and Aron," staged in Nov.-Dec. by Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston after repeated reversals in obtaining leading singers.

BEST OPERATIC PRODUCTION (STAGING) — Obviously the thrilling, resplendent revival of Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" in April, highlight of the Boston Opera's winter-spring season.

BEST OPERATIC PRODUCTION (SINGING) — Gounod's "Faust," performed in April by the Metropolitan Opera Company with Gedda, Tucci, Siepi, Merrill, Baldwin, Kriese and Christopher.

BEST PERFORMANCE BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY: — Whether "best performance" or "best program" is the correct designation is open to question, but the honor still goes to the February concert of Schumann's Scenes from "Faust," with the orchestra, New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists under Erich Leinsdorf's direction.

BEST PERFORMANCE BY VISITING ORCHESTRA — To the Chicago Symphony's November concert by a hair, though the New York Philharmonic's Mahler First was a ringer.

BEST CHAMBER MUSIC PERFORMANCE — I can't decide between the Moscow Chamber Orchestra (October), the Stern-Istomin-Rose Trio (October) and the Vienna Octet (January); also the Hungarian Quartet's Bartok cycle in Oct.-Nov.

BEST CHORAL PERFORMANCE — Unquestionably the Concordia College Choir program in February. This also must be rated the best performance by a university group.

BEST VOCAL PERFORMANCE (RECITAL) — Scant material for consideration here, but the award goes to Phyllis Curtin's Morning Musicale program in December.

BEST VOCAL PERFORMANCE (OPERA) — An old standby — Renata Tebaldi as Mimi in the Boston Opera production of "La Boheme" in April.

BEST VOCAL PERFORMANCE (ORATORIO) — By Ernst Haeflinger as the Evangelist in Bach's St. John Passion, at Tanglewood in July.

BEST INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMANCE (RECITAL) — No surprise — Artur Rubinstein's January program; Alfred Brendel's Liszt and Beethoven piano program in December runs a close second.

BEST INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMANCE (WITH ORCHESTRA) — Malcolm Frager, pianist, with the Symphony in February and at Tanglewood; also various appearances by Sherman Walt, Ralph Gomberg and Jules Eskin, all members the orchestra, and violinist Itzhak Perlman in December.

BEST PERFORMANCE BY VISITING CONDUCTOR — The Mozart programs at Tanglewood by Sir Adrian Boult.

BEST VOCAL PERFORMANCE BY A NEW TALENT — Moscow-winner Simon Estes, bass, who performed "E lla giammai m'amo" from Verdi's "Don Carlo" with the BSO at Tanglewood.

BEST INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMANCE BY A NEW TALENT — Misha Dichter, doing Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto at December's BSO Pension Fund Concert.

And finally, the BRIGHTEST NEW FACE ON THE CONDUCTING SCENE — Arthur Fiedler — who else?

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 138,813 SUN. 210,387
JAN 1 1967

MUSIC

Should Late-Comers Wait Till First Number's Over?

By HARVEY W. SOUTHGATE
Democrat and Chronicle Music Editor

Scanning the Scores

This argument about whether to seat or not to seat late-comers at concerts is one that everyone can get into, and almost everybody is. The vast majority of people, so far as we have observed, are in favor of shutting the doors the moment the concert begins and keeping them shut until that selection ends and the people who have been waiting in the lobby can stream in while the orchestra waits.

We well remember a concert by the Boston Symphony at which the late Pierre Monteux, then an imposing looking man of middle age, turned around just as he was about to start the concert and glared at an unfortunate late patron who had just managed to squeeze inside the door and was slinking guiltily to his seat well down toward the front. Mr. Monteux stared stonily as the patron pushed his way into the middle of the row, forcing everybody to rise or be stepped on. After a moment of silence the maestro raised his baton for the first bar.

Lots of Good Excuses . . .

At our concerts in the Eastman Theater the official starting time is usually 8:15, with a few minutes' leeway permitted for those trying to get loose of the traffic jam outside. Those actually inside the theater when the concert begins are often permitted to take seats in the rear — if there are any — until the number is over. This has been the rule, so far as we know, since the time of the Parthenon, and there is no conceivable reason for breaking it. Even as it is, the late-comers often cause a distracting break in the music if, for example, they arrive between movements of a suite of a symphony.

Is there ever an excuse for anyone to be late to a concert? Of course, many reasons, and we rise here to deny that anyone who is not in his seat at concert time is a time-waster, shiftless or an arrogant disrespecter of the rights of others.

How about the professional man who gets an urgent telephone call — or any other kind for that matter — that delays him just long enough to miss the curtain? How about the unexpected friend one meets on the street while walking from the parking station? You don't just say "Hello" and "Goodbye."

How about the one who is caught in an unforeseeable traffic jam—perhaps an accident or a snail-like traffic lane that has been re-routed from some other street? The answer, we suppose, is to start early enough to allow for such imponderables, but maybe supper was late or service at the restaurant unconscionably slow.

And how about the one, particularly at Christmas time, who finds every inch of parking room occupied, even in the parking stations, and has to settle for what he can find three or four blocks away? Buses, too, have been known to be off schedule.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733
JAN 13 1967

Editorial Points

When the stock market is agitated, observers can't tell whether prices are about to fly or dive.

The President asks, and Congress does as it pleases when it gets around to it.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra doesn't match professional football. It puts on no half-time show at all.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515
JAN 21 1967

Four Foreign Conductors Honored

New York, Jan. 20 (AP) — Foreign contestants won all four top prizes in the annual Dimitri Mitropoulos competition for young conductors, but three of them have appeared in America—including a diminutive Chinese girl.

She is Miss Helen Quach, 26, born of Chinese parents in Saigon, and representing nationalist China, where she has conducted the Taiwan and Taipei symphonies.

She has served as an assistant conductor of the Houston [Tex.] symphony, and conducted it during its summer series last August.

Paul Capolongo, 26, who represented France, was in America in the summer of 1963 and won the Koussevitsky prize that year at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire festival at Tanglewood.

Alois Springer, 31, representing West Germany, and now assistant conductor of the Orchestra of Radio-TV Luxembourg, has spent two summers at the Berkshire festival, and in 1965 won the Koussevitsky prize.

Enrique Garcia-Asensio, 29, representing Spain, now is one of three principal conductors of the Spanish R. T. V. symphony.

All four were awarded equal first prizes late yesterday as the competition closed. Each will be given an assistant conductorship with either the New York Philharmonic or the National Symphony in Washington, a cash award of $5,000, and a gold medal. Their assignments will be announced Monday night.

Second prize of $2,500 and a silver medal went to Paul D. Freeman, 31, now in charge of a music center in San Francisco.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
News
STRATFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 8,515
JAN 5 1967

Symphony Orchestra presents Gustav Meier

The Greater Bridgeport Symphony Orchestra presents its third event in its twenty-first season on Saturday night, January 14, 8:30 p.m., in Klein Memorial Auditorium. Gustav Meier will make his second appearance this season as guest conductor, after which he leaves for six months of guest conducting European orchestras.

The program he will conduct includes Gluck's overture to "Alceste," Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "The Eroica" and Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

Soloist in the Concerto will be the brilliant young Israeli violinist Samuel Ashkenasi who is now making his third national tour under famed S. Hurok. Mr. Ashkenasi achieved international fame when he was winner of Second Prize in the Tschaikowsky Competition in Moscow in 1962. Since then he has played widely in North America and the European capitals, twice in the Soviet Union and as afar afield as Japan. Everywhere critics and public agree that Ashkenasi is among the musical elect of our time.

This past summer young Ashkenasi had the distinction of opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood under Erich Leinsdorf, who was so impressed with the violinist that he engaged him to also open the winter season of the orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston last September.

The January 14 concert is being sponsored by the Greater Bridgeport Jewish Community Center where tickets may be purchased. Tickets are also on sale at the symphony office, 1275 Post Road, Fairfield, phone 259-7828. All seats are reserved and priced at $2, $3, $4, and $5.

Teen-Age dress rehearsal program as usual will be held the night before the concert, Friday, January 13, from 7:30 to 10:30 in Klein Memorial Auditorium. Parents accompanying teen-agers will be admitted for the same nominal charge of $1.00. Tickets will be sold before the program at the box-office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Journal (e)
MERIDEN, Conn.
Circ. 9,332
JAN 18 1967

Religious Leader Unity Speaker

Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, has accepted an invitation to preach at the Christian Unity Week Service Thursday, Jan. 26, at St. Joseph's Church.

The internationally know religious speaker will join with Rt. Rev. John H. Esquirol, Episcopal Suffragan Bishop, for the evening observance.

Rev. Dr. Ferris' sermons, preached in Trinity Church, are printed each week and mailed to people in every state as well as many foreign countries. He also has been a guest preacher on several national radio and television religious programs.

A native of Port Chester, N. Y., he graduated from Harvard College and the General Theological Seminary, New York. He was ordinaed in 1934 and served in Grace Church, New York, and as a Fellow and tutor in the General Theological Seminary. He was rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, before his appointment to Trinity Church in 1942.

Rev. Dr. Ferris holds honorary degrees from several colleges and universities. He is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and former member of the Corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a trustee of Wellesley College and the General Theological Seminary. He was an alternate delegate to the First Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam, Holland, and has been a delegate to the General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He is author of numerous publications.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099
JAN 1 1967

Symphony's Programs to Be Studied

Weekly discussions of upcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra programs are a major part of the activity of Great Symphonic Masterpieces, a class taught by George Zilzer, instructor at Brandeis University, at the Boston Center for Adult Education on Mondays and Fridays.

The first section meets on Fridays at 10:30 a.m. beginning Jan. 6; another section meets on Mondays at 8 p.m. beginning Jan. 9. The course is offered for 10 weeks, though tickets for single sessions may also be purchased. For information write or call the Boston Center for Adult Education, 5 Commonwealth Ave.; 267-4430.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
JAN 24 1967
New England Newsclip

Simon Sternburg, 79, Symphony Percussionist

Simon Sternburg, 79, retired percussionist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the Boston Symphonette concert group, died Monday.

Mr. Sternburg, who lived at 97 St. Stephen st., Back Bay, played with the B.S.O. for 32 years, until his retirement in 1953.

A native of Medford, he was graduated from Medford High School. He received a chemistry degree from Boston University.

He served on the faculties of the Boston School of Music, the University of New Hampshire's music department, and the Boston and New England conservatories of music.

Mr. Sternburg was a national authority on drums and the author of several books.

He also played trombone and string bass professionally. And he manufactured lubricants for instruments' valves and slides.

An active Mason, he belonged to the Euclid Lodge of Masons, the Aleppo Shrine and Taleb Grotto, Quincy.

He leaves a wife, Gertrude (Goldstein); a son, Horatio S. of Brookline; and a brother, Meyer, of Cape Elizabeth, Me.

Services will be at 11 a.m. Wednesday at the Levine Chapel, Brookline. Burial will be in Sharon Memorial Park, Sharon.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719
JAN 1967

PHOTO: ROBERT GA

New York City Opera mezzo-soprano MURIEL GREENSPON, who has just celebrated her fifth season with this company, is seen above with conductor CHARLES WILSON following a performance of Menotti's The Consul. Miss Greenspon sang the Mother with Mr. Wilson conducting. The mezzo, who is presently performing in Winnipeg, guested last month with the Tulsa Opera as the Mother in Hansel and Gretel and as soloist with the National Symphony in the Messiah. CHARLES WILSON has just been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by ERICH LEINSDORF.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
JAN 30 1967

Mother and Son Give Piano-Cello Recital

Isabelle Sant Ambroggio, pianist, and John Sant Ambroggio, cellist, made a joint appearance at Carnegie Recital Hall yesterday afternoon. There was such thorough give and take between them that they sounded as though they had known each other all their lives.

They have. The silver-haired pianist, who has taught in New Jersey for many years, is the mother of the cellist, who plays with the Boston Symphony. They have appeared in New York before. Their return was welcome. They are both capable musicians and are faithful to the chamber music ideal, where individual egos are put to the service of joint expressiveness.

They played the Sonatas No. 2 for their instruments by Bach, Brahms and Martinu. Their forward-looking musical attitude was demonstrated in a Duo for Cello and Piano by Philip Bezanson, which received a first New York performance.

In three short movements, the Bezanson is tightly written around key motives that pass back and forth between piano and cello, with dissonant underpinnings. The piano part is splashy and the cello part declamatory.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 138,813 SUN. 210,387

JAN 1 1967

MUSIC

Should Late-Comers Wait Till First Number's Over?

By HARVEY W. SOUTHGATE
Democrat and Chronicle Music Editor

Scanning the Scores

This argument about whether to seat or not to seat late-comers at concerts is one that everyone can get into, and almost everybody is. The vast majority of people, so far as we have observed, are in favor of shutting the doors the moment the concert begins and keeping them shut until that selection ends and the people who have been waiting in the lobby can stream in while the orchestra waits.

We well remember a concert by the Boston Symphony at which the late Pierre Monteux, then an imposing looking man of middle age, turned around just as he was about to start the concert and glared at an unfortunate late patron who had just managed to squeeze inside the door and was slinking guiltily to his seat well down toward the front. Mr. Monteux stared stonily as the patron pushed his way into the middle of the row, forcing everybody to rise or be stepped on. After a moment of silence the maestro raised his baton for the first bar.

Lots of Good Excuses . . .

At our concerts in the Eastman Theater the official starting time is usually 8:15, with a few minutes' leeway permitted for those trying to get loose of the traffic jam outside. Those actually inside the theater when the concert begins are often permitted to take seats in the rear — if there are any — until the number is over. This has been the rule, so far as we know, since the time of the Parthenon, and there is no conceivable reason for breaking it. Even as it is, the late-comers often cause a distracting break in the music if, for example, they arrive between movements of a suite of a symphony.

Is there ever an excuse for anyone to be late to a concert? Of course, many reasons, and we rise here to deny that anyone who is not in his seat at concert time is a time-waster, shiftless or an arrogant disrespecter of the rights of others.

How about the professional man who gets an urgent telephone call — or any other kind for that matter — that delays him just long enough to miss the curtain? How about the unexpected friend one meets on the street while walking from the parking station? You don't just say "Hello" and "Goodbye."

How about the one who is caught in an unforeseeable traffic jam—perhaps an accident or a snail-like traffic lane that has been re-routed from some other street? The answer, we suppose, is to start early enough to allow for such imponderables, but maybe supper was late or service at the restaurant unconscionably slow.

And how about the one, particularly at Christmas time, who finds every inch of parking room occupied, even in the parking stations, and has to settle for what he can find three or four blocks away? Buses, too, have been known to be off schedule.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 234,733

JAN 13 1967

Editorial Points

When the stock market is agitated, observers can't tell whether prices are about to fly or dive.

The President asks, and Congress does as it pleases when it gets around to it.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra doesn't match professional football. It puts on no half-time show at all.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515

JAN 21 1967

Four Foreign Conductors Honored

New York, Jan. 20 (AP) — Foreign contestants won all four top prizes in the annual Dimitri Mitropoulos competition for young conductors, but three of them have appeared in America—including a diminutive Chinese girl.

She is Miss Helen Quach, 26, born of Chinese parents in Saigon, and representing nationalist China, where she has conducted the Taiwan and Taipei symphonies.

She has served as an assistant conductor of the Houston [Tex.] symphony, and conducted it during its summer series last August.

Paul Capolongo, 26, who represented France, was in America in the summer of 1963 and won the Koussevitsky prize that year at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire festival at Tanglewood.

Alois Springer, 31, representing West Germany, and now assistant conductor of the Orchestra of Radio-TV Luxembourg, has spent two summers at the Berkshire festival, and in 1965 won the Koussevitsky prize.

Enrique Garcia-Asensio, 29, representing Spain, now is one of three principal conductors of the Spanish R. T. V. symphony.

All four were awarded equal first prizes late yesterday as the competition closed. Each will be given an assistant conductorship with either the New York Philharmonic or the National Symphony in Washington, a cash award of $5,000, and a gold medal. Their assignments will be announced Monday night.

Second prize of $2,500 and a silver medal went to Paul D. Freeman, 31, now in charge of a music center in San Francisco.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

News
STRATFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 8,515

JAN 5 1967

Symphony Orchestra presents Gustav Meier

The Greater Bridgeport Symphony Orchestra presents its third event in its twenty-first season on Saturday night, January 14, 8:30 p.m., in Klein Memorial Auditorium. Gustav Meier will make his second appearance this season as guest conductor, after which he leaves for six months of guest conducting European orchestras.

The program he will conduct includes Gluck's overture to "Alceste," Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "The Eroica" and Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

Soloist in the Concerto will be the brilliant young Israeli violinist Samuel Ashkenasi who is now making his third national tour under famed S. Hurok. Mr. Ashkenasi achieved international fame when he was winner of Second Prize in the Tschaikowsky Competition in Moscow in 1962. Since then he has played widely in North America and the European capitals, twice in the Soviet Union and as afar afield as Japan. Everywhere critics and public agree that Ashkenasi is among the musical elect of our time.

This past summer young Ashkenasi had the distinction of opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood under Erich Leinsdorf, who was so impressed with the violinist that he engaged him to also open the winter season of the orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston last September.

The January 14 concert is being sponsored by the Greater Bridgeport Jewish Community Center where tickets may be purchased. Tickets are also on sale at the symphony office, 1275 Post Road, Fairfield, phone 259-7828. All seats are reserved and priced at $2, $3, $4, and $5.

Teen-Age dress rehearsal program as usual will be held the night before the concert, Friday, January 13, from 7:30 to 10:30 in Klein Memorial Auditorium. Parents accompanying teen-agers will be admitted for the same nominal charge of $1.00. Tickets will be sold before the program at the box-office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Journal (e)
MERIDEN, Conn.
Circ. 9,332

JAN 18 1967

Religious Leader Unity Speaker

Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, has accepted an invitation to preach at the Christian Unity Week Service Thursday, Jan. 26, at St. Joseph's Church.

The internationally know religious speaker will join with Rt. Rev. John H. Esquirol, Episcopal Suffragan Bishop, for the evening observance.

Rev. Dr. Ferris' sermons, preached in Trinity Church, are printed each week and mailed to people in every state as well as many foreign countries. He also has been a guest preacher on several national radio and television religious programs.

A native of Port Chester, N. Y., he graduated from Harvard College and the General Theological Seminary, New York. He was ordinaed in 1934 and served in Grace Church, New York, and as a Fellow and tutor in the General Theological Seminary. He was rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, before his appointment to Trinity Church in 1942.

Rev. Dr. Ferris holds honorary degrees from several colleges and universities. He is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and former member of the Corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a trustee of Wellesley College and the General Theological Seminary. He was an alternate delegate to the First Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam, Holland, and has been a delegate to the General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He is author of numerous publications.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 280,099

JAN 1 1967

Symphony's Programs to Be Studied

Weekly discussions of upcoming Boston Symphony Orchestra programs are a major part of the activity of Great Symphonic Masterpieces, a class taught by George Zilzer, instructor at Brandeis University, at the Boston Center for Adult Education on Mondays and Fridays.

The first section meets on Fridays at 10:30 a.m. beginning Jan. 6; another section meets on Mondays at 8 p.m. beginning Jan. 9. The course is offered for 10 weeks, though tickets for single sessions may also be purchased. For information write or call the Boston Center for Adult Education, 5 Commonwealth Ave.; 267-4430.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

JAN 24 1967

New England Newsclip

Simon Sternburg, 79, Symphony Percussionist

Simon Sternburg, 79, retired percussionist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the Boston Symphonette concert group, died Monday.

Mr. Sternburg, who lived at 97 St. Stephen st., Back Bay, played with the B.S.O. for 32 years, until his retirement in 1953.

A native of Medford, he was graduated from Medford High School. He received a chemistry degree from Boston University.

He served on the faculties of the Boston School of Music, the University of New Hampshire's music department, and the Boston and New England conservatories of music.

Mr. Sternburg was a national authority on drums and the author of several books.

He also played trombone and string bass professionally. And he manufactured lubricants for instruments' valves and slides.

An active Mason, he belonged to the Euclid Lodge of Masons, the Aleppo Shrine and Taleb Grotto, Quincy.

He leaves a wife, Gertrude (Goldstein); a son, Horatio S. of Brookline; and a brother, Meyer, of Cape Elizabeth, Me.

Services will be at 11 a.m. Wednesday at the Levine Chapel, Brookline. Burial will be in Sharon Memorial Park, Sharon.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

JAN 1967

PHOTO: ROBERT GA

New York City Opera mezzo-soprano MURIEL GREENSPON, who has just celebrated her fifth season with this company, is seen above with conductor CHARLES WILSON following a performance of Menotti's The Consul. Miss Greenspon sang the Mother with Mr. Wilson conducting. The mezzo, who is presently performing in Winnipeg, guested last month with the Tulsa Opera as the Mother in Hansel and Gretel and as soloist with the National Symphony in the Messiah. CHARLES WILSON has just been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by ERICH LEINSDORF.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

JAN 30 1967

Mother and Son Give Piano-Cello Recital

Isabelle Sant Ambroggio, pianist, and John Sant Ambroggio, cellist, made a joint appearance at Carnegie Recital Hall yesterday afternoon. There was such thorough give and take between them that they sounded as though they had known each other all their lives.

They have. The silver-haired pianist, who has taught in New Jersey for many years, is the mother of the cellist, who plays with the Boston Symphony. They have appeared in New York before. Their return was welcome. They are both capable musicians and are faithful to the chamber music ideal, where individual egos are put to the service of joint expressiveness.

They played the Sonatas No. 2 for their instruments by Bach, Brahms and Martinu. Their forward-looking musical attitude was demonstrated in a Duo for Cello and Piano by Philip Bezanson, which received a first New York performance.

In three short movements, the Bezanson is tightly written around key motives that pass back and forth between piano and cello, with dissonant underpinnings. The piano part is splashy and the cello part declamatory.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

255

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
FEB 13 1967
New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Princess Irene of Greece Visits Fine Arts Museum

A ROYAL VISITOR to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Saturday was Princess Irene of Greece. The Princess, sister of King Constantine of Greece, was greeted by director Perry T. Rathbone and Ralph Lowell, president of the Museum. Her visit to Boston was arranged by the Boston Council of International Visitors and she arrived Wednesday without fanfare.

After viewing the Museum's collection of ancient and rare musical instruments, the Princess attended a small reception in her honor, complemented by a musical program. John Johnson of the Camarata played the harpsichord.

* * *

Paintings Brighten Walls

Works from the museum collections, including a Monet painting and selected water colors of sunny Mediterranean and American scenes brightened the walls of the Trustees Room where luncheon was served.

Those attending the reception for Princess Irene were Dr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vermeule, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Miss Narcissa Williamson, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lowell, Judge and Mrs. John Pappas, Dr. Dimitri Th. Pentzopoulos, Greek Consul in Boston, and Mrs. Pentzopoulos, Landon T. Clay, Dr. and Mrs. Klaus Liepman, Mrs. Laura Bernard and Mr. and Mrs. Perry T. Rathbone.

On Wednesday evening, the Princess attended a dinner party in Boston, given by Mrs. John C. Bullard of New Bedford. On Thursday morning, she attended a Symphony rehearsal, and visited Harvard University in the afternoon. She also attended a taping session of the Radcliffe Choral Society and Glee Club.

She visited the New England Conservatory of Music Friday, and was the guest of Henry Cabot, president of the Board of Symphony, and Mrs. Cabot, at a dinner party. Mr. and Mrs. Eric Leinsdorf were among the guests.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND EXAMINER
W. 6,000
FEB 16 1967

CEDRIC COLEMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LINCOLN CENTER

Cedric Coleman, a Hempstead High School 1963 graduate, who is studying with a full scholarship at the New England Conservatory of Music, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center, on Friday, January 27. He holds the position of alternate bassoonist.

Mr. Coleman was recommended for the position by Sherman Walt, his teacher at the Conservatory, who is also solo bassoonist with the Boston Symphony.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. Wyman Coleman, 23 Rose Avenue, Hempstead, young Coleman is a former student of Manuel Zegler of Valley Stream, who plays first bassoon with the New York Philharmonic.

First Lessons in Hempstead Schools

While a student at Hempstead High School, Coleman was an active participant in its symphony orchestra and band. He received his initial instruction on the bassoon from Harry Hodges of th Hempstead Public Schools.

Last summer, Coleman played with the Dartmouth Festival Orchestra, Hanover, New Hampshire, directed by Mario Bonaventura.

He was offered a permanent position with the National Symphony in Washington, D.C., but he declined in order to complete his education.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, February 27, 1967

'Broadway to Israel' Music At Agudat Achim Concert

"Musical Favorites from Broadway to Israel" is the theme of the program which the First Concert Trio will present at Congregation Agudat Achim on March 19 at 8 p.m. The event is one of a series being planned to mark the 75th anniversary of the congregation.

* * *

Members of the First Concert Trio are William Gunther, conductor-pianist; Miss Edith Gordon, soprano; and Herman Malamood, tenor and cantor at Temple Ansche Chesed of New York.

Gunther, born in Germany and raised and educated in Israel, was a member of the famous "Original Piano Quartet." He has appeared in concerts with Jan Peerce, Lotte Lenya and other artists of stage and screen. At present he is music director of Temple Ansche Chesed.

Miss Gordon, a graduate of the Juilliard School of Music is best known for her performances on Broadway, on national tour and on the CBS-TV "Omnibus." Recently she has appeared with the Cleveland Pops, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the City Symphony of New York and in Israel, where she recorded three song recitals for Radio-Kol Yisroel.

Malawood has made radio and television appearances in the New York city area and has toured as leading tenor soloist with the 7th Army Symphony.

* * *

The committee sponsoring the Agudat Achim program includes Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Wachpress, Dr. and Mrs. Jason Tepper, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Friedman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Takaroff, Mrs. Clifford Pepper, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Schneider, Mrs. Leon Levine, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Prager and Paul Wallach.

The concert will be open to the public and tickets may be obtained from Mrs. Jason Tepper or Stanley Friedman.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BKLYN CANARSIE COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Flushing Times
Friday, February 27, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

Stokowski Conducts

Leopold Stokowski, after an absence of two months, during which time he toured Europe, conducting in Hungary, Rumania and Paris, returns to conduct the American Symphony in concerts to be given on Sun. afternoon, Feb. 26 at 3 o'clock and Mon. evening, Feb. 27 at 8:30 at Carnegie Hall.

The soloist at these concerts will be the violinist Joseph Silverstein, Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Silverstein will play the Brahms Violin Concerto. NE

Tickets are on sale at the Carnegie Hall box office, and are priced from $1.25 to $5.00.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
FEB 1967

34

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS—AND THE LESSON IS OF PASSION LAVISHLY SPENT

by Leonard Marcus

THE WORLD IS FILLED with more knowledgeable and/or more perceptive musicians than the late Serge Koussevitzky was; there is also a surfeit of more proficient conductors. But the world has always had a need for great human beings, who can and do add their humanism, their love, to the culture of their times. Koussevitzky was assuredly one of these. His establishment of the Berkshire Music Center and his devotion to its students have left the man's imprint on American musical life to this day. Tanglewood is as much his monument as Bayreuth is Wagner's. His own students, and his students' students, today man the symphonic helms not only around the country but throughout the world. For a quarter of a century he breathed passion into the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and into Boston, where young composers found "a mecca . . . a center of symphonic premieres," as Lukas Foss (one of those Koussevitzky students himself) puts it in a "reminiscence" included with this set of reissued Koussevitzky performances.

Of course, the potential purchaser of a recording, especially of a three-record set, may be less interested in a man's greatness than in the musician's performance and the quality of his recordings. To be sure, there are cleaner versions of Brahms's and Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphonies than are contained in this RCA Victor package. The sound, while excellent for its day and still good enough to evoke the richness of the BSO strings, hardly matches modern stereophonic productions, where—at least in regard to textural clarity—microphone placement can make almost anyone sound like Toscanini. One can also make out occasional bloopers, though fairly well hidden, and uncalled-for percussion effects, like bows hitting music stands, that for a contemporary recording would be patched up in editorial cubicles. In Koussevitzky's era, when recordings were made one complete 78-rpm side at a time, such extraneities often had to be tolerated. But for anybody who remembers Koussevitzky's performances, here is a set to be treasured. The man's greatness does come through; it penetrates via his passionate love for the music being performed. Whatever else these recordings are, they are not antiseptic, as so much of today's music making seems to be. One can almost see Koussevitzky's face turning purple, that vein about to burst through his forehead.

In both Brahms works, the Academic Festival Overture and the Fourth Symphony, the Koussevitzky trademarks are apparent. Here are the loud pianos that still convey the quality of softness even though the strings are "digging in" with full force. Here, as in the upbeat to the symphony, are those minutely overheld notes that implied more rubato than was actually there. (Some of the effects that sound like rubato are actually created through a careful handling of dynamics rather than tempos; Koussevitzky really stretched the tempo significantly only at the ends of pieces and phrases, though this practice soon becomes a continuing cliché.) Here too—unfortunately, except to the totally nostalgic—is that queer balance of Koussevitzky's orchestra, in its two habitual sections: one, the bulk of the orchestra; two, the first trumpet, Mager, who no matter how softly he played, would stand out even in full orchestral chords. In the overture, one misses occasional entrances in the inner voices, and the overall texture is not so clean as that of the symphony—odd, since the former dates from 1947 while the latter was cut in the late '30s.

Shostakovich's little Ninth Symphony must here be reckoned the best of the four performances presently available on records, even though the Everest, under Sargent, comes in stereo. (It will

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 11 1967
New England Newsclip

Women

A Princess On the Run

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Princess Irene of Greece can certainly run.

Symphony's warning bell had already sounded for Friday's 2 o'clock concert when the slim princess, her pretty light brown hair uncovered above her sable-collared coat in the light snowfall, raced up Symphony's steps.

She paused decorously to hand in her ticket, with a smile, and then sprinted for the backstage door, almost running into Henry Cabot who was hurrying out.

In the small guest-artist "green room," there was a cry of delight from one of the foremost pianists of our times, and handsome Athens-born Gina Bachauer and Irene of Greece were exchanging hugs.

There was barely time for a word or two between the great pianist and her long-time pupil, and the princess sped back along the marble corridor, easily out-distancing Francis Hatch and another trustee who were also making for the closing center doors.

Inside the lofty famous hall which stands for music the world over, and where the princess has spent both nights of her first visit to Boston, listening to the Cleveland Symphony on Wednesday and the Boston Symphony Thursday, she was ushered to one the trustee seats in the center section, six rows up from the middle aisle.

Two seats away, sat chic, rose-suited Mme. Jacques Massenet, wife of the French consul general. She and the friendly 24-year-old princess exchanged smiles.

The princess wore emeralds and diamonds, a pin and a beautifully designed ring, to match her green dress, and her shoes were the same square-buckled, low-heeled sable-brown design that Jacqueline Kennedy wore for her Boston visit earlier this week.

Today, Princess Irene will have a brief private tour at at the Museum of Fine Arts and then fly to Washington for a series of "person" parties in her honor (Lynda Johnson's dinner for 50 at the White House, Greek Ambassador and Mr. Matsas' Embassy dinner for about the same number.

The young pianist (she practices every day) returns to Athens Feb. 19.

Familiar faces were all around her Friday, sharing her obvious pleasure in the Prokofiev and the Rachmaninoff—Mrs. Sewall Fessenden and Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Paul Bernat, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert Thompson, Mrs. Archie Abrams, and over from the Ritz, where the blue and white flag of Greece has honored its royal visitor, M. and Mme. Pierre Lavoire, who are leaving for Washington today before returning to Paris.

PRINCESS IRENE
. . . on departure
(Bill Brett Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 27 1967
New England Newsclip

If There Was an Encore!

I would like to add a few words to a letter in the Feb. 19 Sunday Globe regarding Boston opera audiences. In my opinion the criticism of coming late and leaving early can be applied not only to Boston opera audiences but to all audiences in this city.

I have attended concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to see the aisles jammed with "music lovers" dashing to the exits the minute the final piece is finished. Undoubtedly, Mr. Leinsdorf has become accustomed to the rudeness of Boston audiences; but when visiting companies such as the Metropolitan Opera, the Cleveland Orchestra, and many more are treated to a view of Boston's backs rather than to Boston's applause, something should be done to remedy the bad manners which characterize every Boston audience.

I have often wondered what would happen if Mr. Leinsdorf suddenly played an encore at Symphony. The frantic scramble back to the too hastily vacated seats might cure Boston concert and opera goers of their chronic and shameful bad manners.

JOHN H. McGUCKIN
Cambridge

255

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500

FEB 13 1967

New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Princess Irene of Greece Visits Fine Arts Museum

A ROYAL VISITOR to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Saturday was Princess Irene of Greece. The Princess, sister of King Constantine of Greece, was greeted by director Perry T. Rathbone and Ralph Lowell, president of the Museum. Her visit to Boston was arranged by the Boston Council of International Visitors and she arrived Wednesday without fanfare.

After viewing the Museum's collection of ancient and rare musical instruments, the Princess attended a small reception in her honor, complemented by a musical program. John Johnson of the Camarata played the harpsichord.

* * *

Paintings Brighten Walls

Works from the museum collections, including a Monet painting and selected water colors of sunny Mediterranean and American scenes brightened the walls of the Trustees Room where luncheon was served.

Those attending the reception for Princess Irene were Dr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vermeule, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Miss Narcissa Williamson, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lowell, Judge and Mrs. John Pappas, Dr. Dimitri Th. Pentzopoulos, Greek Consul in Boston, and Mrs. Pentzopoulos, Landon T. Clay, Dr. and Mrs. Klaus Liepman, Mrs. Laura Bernard and Mr. and Mrs. Perry T. Rathbone.

On Wednesday evening, the Princess attended a dinner party in Boston, given by Mrs. John C. Bullard of New Bedford. On Thursday morning, she attended a Symphony rehearsal, and visited Harvard University in the afternoon. She also attended a taping session of the Radcliffe Choral Society and Glee Club.

She visited the New England Conservatory of Music Friday, and was the guest of Henry Cabot, president of the Board of Symphony, and Mrs. Cabot, at a dinner party. Mr. and Mrs. Eric Leinsdorf were among the guests.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND EXAMINER
W. 6,000

FEB 16 1967

CEDRIC COLEMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LINCOLN CENTER

Cedric Coleman, a Hempstead High School 1963 graduate, who is studying with a full scholarship at the New England Conservatory of Music, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center, on Friday, January 27. He holds the position of alternate bassoonist.

Mr. Coleman was recommended for the position by Sherman Walt, his teacher at the Conservatory, who is also solo bassoonist with the Boston Symphony.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. Wyman Coleman, 23 Rose Avenue, Hempstead, young Coleman is a former student, of Manuel Zegler of Valley Stream, who plays first bassoon with the New York Philharmonic.

First Lessons in Hempstead Schools

While a student at Hempstead High School, Coleman was an active participant in its symphony orchestra and band. He received his initial instruction on the bassoon from Harry Hodges of th Hempstead Public Schools.

Last summer, Coleman played with the Dartmouth Festival Orchestra, Hanover, New Hampshire, directed by Mario Bonaventura.

He was offered a permanent position with the National Symphony in Washington, D.C., but he declined in order to complete his education.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, February 27, 1967

'Broadway to Israel' Music At Agudat Achim Concert

"Musical Favorites from Broadway to Israel" is the theme of the program which the First Concert Trio will present at Congregation Agudat Achim on March 19 at 8 p.m. The event is one of a series being planned to mark the 75th anniversary of the congregation.

* * *

Members of the First Concert Trio are William Gunther, conductor-pianist; Miss Edith Gordon, soprano; and Herman Malamood, tenor and cantor at Temple Ansche Chesed of New York.

Gunther, born in Germany and raised and educated in Israel, was a member of the famous "Original Piano Quartet." He has appeared in concerts with Jan Peerce, Lotte Lenya and other artists of stage and screen. At present he is music director of Temple Ansche Chesed.

Miss Gordon, a graduate of the Juilliard School of Music is best known for her performances on Broadway, on national tour and on the CBS-TV "Omnibus." Recently she has appeared with the Cleveland Pops, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the City Symphony of New York and in Israel, where she recorded three song recitals for Radio-Kol Yisroel.

Malawood has made radio and television appearances in the New York city area and has toured as leading tenor soloist with the 7th Army Symphony.

* * *

The committee sponsoring the Agudat Achim program includes Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Wachpress, Dr. and Mrs. Jason Tepper, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Friedman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Takaroff, Mrs. Clifford Tepper, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Schneider, Mrs. Leon Levine, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Prager and Paul Wallach.

The concert will be open to the public and tickets may be obtained from Mrs. Jason Tepper or Stanley Friedman.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BKLYN CANARSIE COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Flushing Times
Friday, February 17, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100

FEB 1967

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS—AND THE LESSON IS OF PASSION LAVISHLY SPENT

by Leonard Marcus

THE WORLD IS FILLED with more knowledgeable and/or more perceptive musicians than the late Serge Koussevitzky was; there is also a surfeit of more proficient conductors. But the world has always had a need for great human beings, who can and do add their humanism, their love, to the culture of their times. Koussevitzky was assuredly one of these. His establishment of the Berkshire Music Center and his devotion to its students have left the man's imprint on American musical life to this day. Tanglewood is as much his monument as Bayreuth is Wagner's. His own students, and his students' students, today man the symphonic helms not only around the country but throughout the world. For a quarter of a century he breathed passion into the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and into Boston, where young composers found "a mecca . . . a center of symphonic premieres," as Lukas Foss (one of those Koussevitzky students himself) puts it in a "reminiscence" included with this set of reissued Koussevitzky performances.

Of course, the potential purchaser of a recording, especially of a three-record set, may be less interested in a man's greatness than in the musician's performance and the quality of his recordings. To be sure, there are cleaner versions of Brahms's and Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphonies than are contained in this RCA Victor package. The sound, while excellent for its day and still good enough to evoke the richness of the BSO strings, hardly matches modern stereophonic productions, where—at least in regard to textural clarity—microphone placement can make almost anyone sound like Toscanini. One can also make out occasional bloopers, though fairly well hidden, and uncalled-for percussion effects, like bows hitting music stands, that for a contemporary recording would be patched up in editorial cubicles. In Koussevitzky's era, when recordings were made one complete 78-rpm side at a time, such extraneities often had to be tolerated. But for anybody who remembers Koussevitzky's performances, here is a set to be treasured. The man's greatness does come through; it penetrates via his passionate love for the music being performed. Whatever else these recordings are, they are not antiseptic, as so much of today's music making seems to be. One can almost see Koussevitzky's face turning purple, that vein about to burst through his forehead.

In both Brahms works, the Academic Festival Overture and the Fourth Symphony, the Koussevitzky trademarks are apparent. Here are the loud pianos that still convey the quality of softness even though the strings are "digging in" with full force. Here, as in the upbeat to the symphony, are those minutely overheld notes that implied more rubato than was actually there. (Some of the effects that sound like rubato are actually created through a careful handling of dynamics rather than tempos; Koussevitzky really stretched the tempo significantly only at the ends of pieces and phrases, though this practice soon becomes a continuing cliché.) Here too—unfortunately, except to the totally nostalgic—is that queer balance of Koussevitzky's orchestra, in its two habitual sections: one, the bulk of the orchestra; two, the first trumpet, Mager, who no matter how softly he played, would stand out even in full orchestral chords. In the overture, one misses occasional entrances in the inner voices, and the overall texture is not so clean as that of the symphony—odd, since the former dates from 1947 while the latter was cut in the late '30s.

Shostakovich's little Ninth Symphony must here be reckoned the best of the four performances presently available on records, even though the Everest, under Sargent, comes in stereo. (It will

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

FEB 11 1967

New England Newsclip

Women

A Princess On the Run

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Princess Irene of Greece can certainly run.

Symphony's warning bell had already sounded for Friday's 2 o'clock concert when the slim princess, her pretty light brown hair uncovered above her sable-collared coat in the light snowfall, raced up Symphony's steps.

She paused decorously to hand in her ticket, with a smile, and then sprinted for the backstage door, almost running into Henry Cabot who was hurrying out.

In the small guest-artist "green room," there was a cry of delight from one of the foremost pianists of our times, and handsome Athens-born Gina Bachauer and Irene of Greece were exchanging hugs.

There was barely time for a word or two between the great pianist and her long-time pupil, and the princess sped back along the marble corridor, easily out-distancing Francis Hatch and another trustee who were also making for the closing center doors.

Inside the lofty famous hall which stands for music the world over, and where the princess has spent both nights of her first visit to Boston, listening to the Cleveland Symphony on Wednesday and the Boston Symphony Thursday, she was ushered to one the trustee seats in the center section, six rows up from the middle aisle.

Two seats away, sat chic, rose-suited Mme. Jacques Massenet, wife of the French consul general. She and the friendly 24-year-old princess exchanged smiles.

The princess wore emeralds and diamonds, a pin and a beautifully designed ring, to match her green dress, and her shoes were the same square-buckled, low-heeled sable-brown design that Jacqueline Kennedy wore for her Boston visit earlier this week.

Today, Princess Irene will have a brief private tour at at the Museum of Fine Arts and then fly to Washington for a series of "person" parties in her honor (Lynda Johnson's dinner for 50 at the White House, Greek Ambassador and Mr. Matsas' Embassy dinner for about the same number.

The young pianist (she practices every day) returns to Athens Feb. 19.

Familiar faces were all around her Friday, sharing her obvious pleasure in the Prokofiev and the Rachmaninoff—Mrs. Sewall Fessenden and Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Paul Bernat, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert Thompson, Mrs. Archie Abrams, and over from the Ritz, where the blue and white flag of Greece has honored its royal visitor, M. and Mme. Pierre Lavoire, who are leaving for Washington today before returning to Paris.

PRINCESS IRENE
. . . on departure
(Bill Brett Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750

FEB 27 1967

New England Newsclip

If There Was an Encore!

I would like to add a few words to a letter in the Feb. 19 Sunday Globe regarding Boston opera audiences. In my opinion the criticism of coming late and leaving early can be applied not only to Boston opera audiences but to all audiences in this city.

I have attended concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to see the aisles jammed with "music lovers" dashing to the exits the minute the final piece is finished. Undoubtedly, Mr. Leinsdorf has become accustomed to the rudeness of Boston audiences; but when visiting companies such as the Metropolitan Opera, the Cleveland Orchestra, and many more are treated to a view of Boston's backs rather than to Boston's applause, something should be done to remedy the bad manners which characterize every Boston audience.

I have often wondered what would happen if Mr. Leinsdorf suddenly played an encore at Symphony. The frantic scramble back to the too hastily vacated seats might cure Boston concert and opera goers of their chronic and shameful bad manners.

JOHN H. McGUCKIN
Cambridge

Stokowski Conducts

Leopold Stokowski, after an absence of two months, during which time he toured Europe, conducting in Hungary, Rumania and Paris, returns to conduct the American Symphony in concerts to be given on Sun. afternoon, Feb. 26 at 3 o'clock and Mon. evening, Feb. 27 at 8:30 at Carnegie Hall.

The soloist at these concerts will be the violinist Joseph Silverstein, Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Silverstein will play the Brahms Violin Concerto. NE

Tickets are on sale at the Carnegie Hall box office, and are priced from $1.25 to $5.00.

255

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
FEB 13 1967
New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Princess Irene of Greece Visits Fine Arts Museum

A ROYAL VISITOR to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, Saturday was Princess Irene of Greece. The Princess, sister of King Constantine of Greece, was greeted by director Perry T. Rathbone and Ralph Lowell, president of the Museum. Her visit to Boston was arranged by the Boston Council of International Visitors and she arrived Wednesday without fanfare.

After viewing the Museum's collection of ancient and rare musical instruments, the Princess attended a small reception in her honor, complemented by a musical program. John Johnson of the Camarata played the harpsichord.

* * *

Paintings Brighten Walls

Works from the museum collections, including a Monet painting and selected water colors of sunny Mediterranean and American scenes brightened the walls of the Trustees Room where luncheon was served.

Those attending the reception for Princess Irene were Dr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vermeule, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Miss Narcissa Williamson, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lowell, Judge and Mrs. John Pappas, Dr. Dimitri Th. Pentzopoulos, Greek Consul in Boston, and Mrs. Pentzopoulos, Landon T. Clay, Dr. and Mrs. Klaus Liepman, Mrs. Laura Bernard and Mr. and Mrs. Perry T. Rathbone.

On Wednesday evening, the Princess attended a dinner party in Boston, given by Mrs. John C. Bullard of New Bedford. On Thursday morning, she attended a Symphony rehearsal, and visited Harvard University in the afternoon. She also attended a taping session of the Radcliffe Choral Society and Glee Club.

She visited the New England Conservatory of Music Friday, and was the guest of Henry Cabot, president of the Board of Symphony, and Mrs. Cabot, at a dinner party. Mr. and Mrs. Eric Leinsdorf were among the guests.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND EXAMINER
W. 6,000
FEB 16 1967

CEDRIC COLEMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LINCOLN CENTER

Cedric Coleman, a Hempstead High School 1963 graduate, who is studying with a full scholarship at the New England Conservatory of Music, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center, on Friday, January 27. He holds the position of alternate bassoonist.

Mr. Coleman was recommended for the position by Sherman Walt, his teacher at the Conservatory, who is also solo bassoonist with the Boston Symphony.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. Wyman Coleman, 23 Rose Avenue, Hempstead, young Coleman is a former student, of Manuel Zegler of Valley Stream, who plays first bassoon with the New York Philharmonic.

First Lessons in Hempstead Schools

While a student at Hempstead High School, Coleman was an active participant in its symphony orchestra and band. He received his initial instruction on the bassoon from Harry Hodges of th Hempstead Public Schools.

Last summer, Coleman played with the Dartmouth Festival Orchestra, Hanover, New Hampshire, directed by Mario Bonaventura.

He was offered a permanent position with the National Symphony in Washington, D.C., but he declined in order to complete his education.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, February 27, 1967

'Broadway to Israel' Music At Agudat Achim Concert

"Musical Favorites from Broadway to Israel" is the theme of the program which the First Concert Trio will present at Congregation Agudat Achim on March 19 at 8 p.m. The event is one of a series being planned to mark the 75th anniversary of the congregation.

* * *

Members of the First Concert Trio are William Gunther, conductor-pianist; Miss Edith Gordon, soprano; and Herman Malamood, tenor and cantor at Temple Ansche Chesed of New York.

Gunther, born in Germany and raised and educated in Israel, was a member of the famous "Original Piano Quartet." He has appeared in concerts with Jan Peerce, Lotte Lenya and other artists of stage and screen. At present he is music director of Temple Ansche Chesed.

Miss Gordon, a graduate of the Juilliard School of Music is best known for her performances on Broadway, on national tour and on the CBS-TV "Omnibus." Recently she has appeared with the Cleveland Pops, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the City Symphony of New York and in Israel, where she recorded three song recitals for Radio-Kol Yisroel.

Malawood has made radio and television appearances in the New York city area and has toured as leading tenor soloist with the 7th Army Symphony.

* * *

The committee sponsoring the Agudat Achim program includes Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Wachpress, Dr. and Mrs. Jason Tepper, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Friedman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Takaroff, Mrs. Clifford Pepper, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Schneider, Mrs. Leon Levine, Mr. and Mrs. Murray Prager and Paul Wallach.

The concert will be open to the public and tickets may be obtained from Mrs. Jason Tepper or Stanley Friedman.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BKLYN CANARSIE COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Flushing Times
Friday, February 17, 1967

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, February 25, 1967

Stokowski Conducts

Leopold Stokowski, after an absence of two months, during which time he toured Europe, conducting in Hungary, Rumania and Paris, returns to conduct the American Symphony in concerts to be given on Sun. afternoon, Feb. 26 at 3 o'clock and Mon. evening, Feb. 27 at 8:30 at Carnegie Hall.

The soloist at these concerts will be the violinist Joseph Silverstein, Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Silverstein will play the Brahms Violin Concerto. NE

Tickets are on sale at the Carnegie Hall box office, and are priced from $1.25 to $5.00.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 114,100
FEB 1967

be interesting to compare the Koussevitzky reading with that by the latter-day Russian Kiril Kondrashin, soon to be released on Melodiya/Angel.) This underrated delight now gets a con brio reading and should do much to revive excitement about it. Sardonic performances were among Koussevitzky's particular talents and one recalls his readings of such works as Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. (The Bartók, by the way, pokes fun at Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony; the Russian composer's Ninth Symphony mocks his own First Symphony.)

The Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky receives a broad—in both senses—handling under Koussevitzky, including several unwritten tempo changes, if this is your cup of kvas.

Koussevitzky promoted a good many American works and a couple of them find a place here. For a while a recording of Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings led by Howard Hanson was available on a Mercury disc, but the 1940 Koussevitzky recording was the one that for a time placed this work in the repertoire. The Suite cuts a strong, virile figure. Its striking opening movement has been used as theme music for classical radio programs throughout the country; its fugue is absolutely marvelous. This rendition, except for some sloppiness in the pizzicato movement, is a humdinger. The performance, never before released, of Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp, and String Orchestra comes out better than the music, as does the only other recording, on Epic, with Louis Lane and the Cleveland Orchestra. While Lane's performance is recorded in stereo, it lacks Koussevitzky's incomparable flutist, Georges Laurent, with his tender, tender, yet still bright playing.

Rachmaninoff's orchestral arrangement of his Vocalise, the fourteenth and last song in his Op. 34, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Battle of Kershenetz, from The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh, complete the collection.

For those who never heard Koussevitzky in the concert hall, this release should be instructive and enlightening. For sentimentalists, like myself, who cherish vivid memories of Koussevitzky, it will be a joy.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: Treasury of Immortal Performances"

Brahms: Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80; Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98. Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64. Rachmaninoff: Vocalise, Op. 34, No. 14. Rimsky-Korsakov: The Battle of Kershenetz. Hanson: Serenade for Flute, Harp, and String Orchestra, Op. 35. Foote: Suite for Strings, in E, Op. 63. Shostakovich: Symphony No. 9, in E flat, Op. 70.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, cond. RCA VICTOR ® VCM 6174, $14.37 (three discs, mono only) [from RCA Victor recordings, 1938–47].

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 11 1967
New England Newsclip

Women

A Princess On the Run

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Princess Irene of Greece can certainly run.

Symphony's warning bell had already sounded for Friday's 2 o'clock concert when the slim princess, her pretty light brown hair uncovered above her sable-collared coat in the light snowfall, raced up Symphony's steps.

She paused decorously to hand in her ticket, with a smile, and then sprinted for the backstage door, almost running into Henry Cabot who was hurrying out.

In the small guest-artist "green room," there was a cry of delight from one of the foremost pianists of our times, and handsome Athens-born Gina Bachauer and Irene of Greece were exchanging hugs.

There was barely time for a word or two between the great pianist and her long-time pupil, and the princess sped back along the marble corridor, easily out-distancing Francis Hatch and another trustee who were also making for the closing center doors.

Inside the lofty famous hall which stands for music the world over, and where the princess has spent both nights of her first visit to Boston, listening to the Cleveland Symphony on Wednesday and the Boston Symphony Thursday, she was ushered to one the trustee seats in the center section, six rows up from the middle aisle.

Two seats away, sat chic, rose-suited Mme. Jacques Massenet, wife of the French consul general. She and the friendly 24-year-old princess exchanged smiles.

The princess wore emeralds and diamonds, a pin and a beautifully designed ring, to match her green dress, and her shoes were the same square-buckled, low-heeled sable-brown design that Jacqueline Kennedy wore for her Boston visit earlier this week.

Today, Princess Irene will have a brief private tour at at the Museum of Fine Arts and then fly to Washington for a series of "person" parties in her honor (Lynda Johnson's dinner for 50 at the White House, Greek Ambassador and Mr. Matsas' Embassy dinner for about the same number.

The young pianist (she practices every day) returns to Athens Feb. 19.

Familiar faces were all around her Friday, sharing her obvious pleasure in the Prokofiev and the Rachmaninoff—Mrs. Sewall Fessenden and Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Paul Bernat, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Robert Thompson, Mrs. Archie Abrams, and over from the Ritz, where the blue and white flag of Greece has honored its royal visitor, M. and Mme. Pierre Lavoire, who are leaving for Washington today before returning to Paris.

PRINCESS IRENE
. . . on departure
(Bill Brett Photo)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
FEB 27 1967
New England Newsclip

If There Was an Encore!

I would like to add a few words to a letter in the Feb. 19 Sunday Globe regarding Boston opera audiences. In my opinion the criticism of coming late and leaving early can be applied not only to Boston opera audiences but to all audiences in this city.

I have attended concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to see the aisles jammed with "music lovers" dashing to the exits the minute the final piece is finished. Undoubtedly, Mr. Leinsdorf has become accustomed to the rudeness of Boston audiences; but when visiting companies such as the Metropolitan Opera, the Cleveland Orchestra, and many more are treated to a view of Boston's backs rather than to Boston's applause, something should be done to remedy the bad manners which characterize every Boston audience.

I have often wondered what would happen if Mr. Leinsdorf suddenly played an encore at Symphony. The frantic scramble back to the too hastily vacated seats might cure Boston concert and opera goers of their chronic and shameful bad manners.

JOHN H. McGUCKIN
Cambridge

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
FEB 11 1967
New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Britten: Bernstein to Bing

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE OPERA being played at the Metropolitan in New York this afternoon, and also being broadcast, had its first American performance at Tanglewood in 1946 with the composer in the audience.

Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," was the result of a long series of events in which the late Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was the motive force. Britten, born in 1913, was a child prodigy and started writing music in his early years. But his music encountered indifference, if not hostility, in England. Finally, exasperated with English musical conservatism and disillusioned by Europe's political climate, he sailed for the United States in the spring of 1939.

* * *

HE REMAINED here three years. During that time he wrote an operetta, "Paul Bunyan," for the opera department of Columbia University. The story of the mythical giant of American folklore didn't go over very well. Another composition was a "Sinfonia da Requiem" which Koussevitzky played in Boston. This led to a Koussevitzky Foundation grant of $1,000 to compose an opera. Britten returned to England in the spring of 1942. He was excused from military service on the grounds that as a composer for the British Broadcasting Co. propaganda service, he was contributing fully to the national effort. Meanwhile, he went to work on "Grimes" and finished it in 1945. Its premiere was the first postwar performance in London's Sadler's Wells Theatre.

* * *

THE OPERA was prepared at the Berkshire Music Center opera department in the summer of 1946 under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, and was first played at Tanglewood on Tuesday evening, Aug. 6, 1946. Leonard Bernstein, at that time assistant to Koussevitzky in the conducting class of the academy, was conductor. Eric Crosier, who had been the London stage director, came over to assist in the staging of the opera, and Ralph Hawkes of the London music publishing firm of Boosey & Hawkes brought Britten himself over to help supervise the opera. Britten had dedicated the work in 1945 to Natalie Koussevitzky, the late wife of the conductor.

The libretto concerns the tormented career of a poor fisherman in a small Suffolk coast town, and is based on a poem, "The Borough," by George Crabbe, who was born two centuries ago in Aldeburgh, a small community like that in the opera, and where Britten himself now lives.

* * *

BRITTEN'S choice of the Crabbe story does not conceal any mystery as a glance at his whole career reveals that he has had a strange affinity for the sea and compassion for those whose livelihood is derived from it. The list of his subsequent operas confirms his bent for this type of situation — mysteries such as Poe and De Maupassant have developed or stories which interested Melville.

Indeed one of his later operas used "Billy Budd" as the libretto, and another opera, "Albert Herring," was based on the De Maupassant story, "Le Rosier de Madame Husson." This was also produced at the Berkshire Music Center in August 1949, two years after its premiere in Europe in 1947. This was a farce, however, and far removed from the nature of much of Britten's writing.

* * *

IN "GRIMES" the protagonist in the prologue stands in court accused of the death of his apprentice. His acquittal does not satisfy the townspeople, and three acts, each with two scenes, recount the rising, vigilant spirit of the citizenry and the falling spirit of the sadly harassed-in-soul fisherman.

* * *

BRITTEN is a tall, slender, light-haired man, easy to smile and with no indication from his appearance or manner that he might be a poet or an esthetic. The reception of "Grimes" at Tanglewood lead some of his more sanguine supporters to believe that the opera might go on Broadway. It is going on Broadway this season and this actual afternoon, but not in the way the enthusiasts of a score of years ago envisaged. They expected it might have a long, continuous run, but they were confronted with reality and convinced that Grimes doesn't pay.

In his international recognition, Britten has been given greater appreciation than by the Boston Orchestra, both on its home grounds and its summer terrain. Only a scant five years ago his War Requiem, which had been written for the rededication of St. Michael's Cathedral in Coventry in May, 1962, was played here at Tanglewood a bare two months later.

* * *

IN THE EXCITEMENT and glamour of a premiere, it is doubly difficult to discern whether a composition has more than immediate impact, and anyone who would dare to predict must have a bit of the foolhardy and the insensate. That "Grimes" has endured and after a score of years is evidently more firmly ensconced in the Metropolitan repertory than it may have been at its initial performance, must be due to its intrinsic worth rather than to the fortuitous grist of Bs with which it has been attended over its career: Britten from Bernstein to Bing.

VAN NUYS, CALIF.
VALLEY NEWS AND VALLEY GREEN SHEET
D. 203,000
MAR 21 1967

'Messiah' in Full Score to Be on Video Saturday

Handel and Haydn Society of Boston will perform the complete, three-hour "Messiah" — divided into three major parts on Saturday, at 6:30 p.m. for television viewing over KCET — Channel 28.

Ever since the chorus introduced Handel's oratorio to the United States in 1818, audiences have flocked to the Boston Society's annual performances. The earlier world premiere took place in Dublin, Ireland in April, 1742.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 150-member chorus, with soloists, appear under direction of Dr. Edward Gilday, who has led the group for the past seven years.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
MAR 11 1967
New England Newsclip

George Edman, Editor, USIA Official, Dead

PAGE ONE

Berkshire Festival Cofounder Succumbs In Germany

George W. Edman, former Berkshire correspondent for The Union, former managing editor of the Berkshire Eagle in Pittsfield, and longtime foreign service officer with the U. S. Information Agency, died Friday in a U. S. Army hospital in Frankfurt, Germany.

Had Operation

Mr. Edman was a founder of the Berkshire Music Festival. He had been on a special tour of duty in New Delhi, India, where he was operated on two weeks ago for ileitis. Four days ago he was flown to Germany from India.

He and his wife, the former Alice Ross Gould, had planned to return to Pittsfield this month after a second tour of duty in India, this time as a private consultant to the U. S. government.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 10 1967
New England Newsclip

George Edman Dies at 67; Served Eagle, State Dept.

George W. Edman

Festival Founder

Mr. Edman was one of the founders of the Berkshire Music Festival, now Tanglewood, and served as chairman of the coordinating committee for nine years. He was born in Orange and came to Pittsfield in 1923.

Besides his wife, he leaves three sons, Talmadge of Wilton Conn., who is national and international sales manager for the pulp division of the Weyerhaeuser Co.; Silas, general manager of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; and Ross, professor of art history at the University of Illinois at the Circle Campus in Chicago; and several grandchildren.

George W. Edman, 67, a former managing editor of The Eagle and a retired career officer in the U. S. Information Agency's foreign service, died this morning at a U. S. Army Hospital in Frankfort, Germany, from complications following an operation two weeks ago for ileitis in New Delhi, India, where he was on a special tour of duty.

He was flown to Germany four days ago from India, having initially been making a favorable recovery from surgery. He and his wife, the former Alice Ross Gould, had planned to return to Pittsfield later this month, after completing a second tour of duty in India, this one as a private consultant to the U. S. government. He had previously served a three-year tour in India as an economic aid officer, returning to this country in 1965 and working in Washington until retiring at the end of the year.

Started in 1923

Mr. Edman began newspaper work in 1923 on the Springfield Union and also worked as Berkshire correspondent for the Boston Globe and the Knickerbocker Press of Albany, N.Y. He joined The Eagle staff in 1926 and organized the county department. He was appointed county editor in 1927 and was named managing editor in 1939. He was granted a leave of absence in May 1942 to become a civilian employe of the Office of War Information and handled press and radio activity for the OWI in Africa and Italy.

Mr. Edman was one of the original group to be awarded the Medal of Freedom for services during World War II. His final assignment with Allied Force Headquarters in Italy was as director of the psychological warfare branch. He also served two years as chairman of the Allied Publications Board, responsible for reintroducing a free press into Italy.

He returned to The Eagle in 1945 but resigned in February 1947 to become public affairs officer in Denmark for the State Department. Later that year, he was transferred to the Athens embassy. His other USIA assignments included Burma, Italy Syria and Panama.

He was decorated with the Order of the British Empire and by the Republic of Panama with the Order of Balboa. The city of Trikkala, Greece, made him an honorary citizen in 1948, along with Gen. James Van Fleet and the late Dr. Henry P. Grady. In 1955 he was made an honorary doctor of humane letters by his alma mater, the University of Massachusetts.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
MAR 12 1967
New England Newsclip

Music This Week

TUESDAY — Boston Symphony, Thomas Shippers conducting Bizet's Symphony in C, Menotti's "Apocalypse," and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." Symphony Hall at 7:30. Broadcast on Ch. 2 and WGBH-FM.

—Susan Gross, piano. Sonata in E flat major, Op. 31, No. 2, by Beethoven, and the Chopin B flat major Scherzo, Op. 31. Gardner Museum at 3 o'clock.

FRIDAY—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 456, with Evelyne Crochet as soloist, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor. Symphony Hall at 2 Program repeated Saturday at 8:30.

SATURDAY—Youth Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting Boston Symphony players in Walton's Festival Overture, "As Quiet As," by Colgrass, the Saint-Saens-Schmidt Tuba Concerto, with Chester Schmidt as soloist, excerpts from Copland's "The Tender Land," and the Hallelujah Chorus from Handel's "Messiah," with the New England Conservatory Chorus. Symphony Hall at 11 a.m.

—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. See Friday program. Symphony Hall at 8:30.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, February 1967

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
MAR 29 1967
New England Newsclip

The Writ Sarcastic

Michael Steinberg keeps complaining about the audience at Symphony, and I just want to say that I think this audience is terrific, especially the Saturday night audience. Three times this season I've put together enough money to buy a ticket for a downstairs seat at a Saturday night concert. I do this just because I think we all ought to help out the B.S.O., and every time the people sitting near me have given me a real treat of their conversation and jewelry and their rustly programs (that slick paper really SOUNDS!), and have saved me a lot of the music I would otherwise have had to listen to.

The people on Friday just walk out early, but for the most part they're so quiet that I'm stuck with having to pay attention to the music, which is a drag since, as I said, I only buy tickets to help out the B.S.O. I'm especially grateful to a group that sat behind me at the Bach St. John Passion last Saturday night; without them I'd have had to listen to Bach. Thank you so much, wherever you are.

LINDA VOGEL

Boston

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 15,950
MAR 16 1967
New England Newsclip

Final Concert

Pianist Claude Frank, a repeat soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, will be the guest artist in the final concert of the Weston Country Evening Concert series, Friday night at 8:40 in the auditorium of the Country School on Alphabet Lane.

The program will include works by Mozart, Chopin, Beethoven and Schubert.

Reservations may be obtained from Mrs. Reginald B. Elwell at 893-7361; or anyone wishing further information may contact Mrs. Dudley B. Dumaine at 899-1098.

Fabien Sevitzky, 73, Led Miami Philharmonic

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — Fabien Sevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Greater Miami (Fla.) Philharmonic, is dead at 73.

Sevitzky died Friday night of a heart attack after rehearsing with the state orchestra of Athens. He had come here two days ago for a concert series which was to be followed by appearances in Yugoslavia, Rome and London.

A nephew of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sevitzky changed his name from Koussevitzky so as not to be confused with his celebrated uncle.

Having appeared with scores of orchestras in America and Europe, he became permanent conductor of the University of Miami Symphony in 1959, holding the post until 1965, when he joined the Greater Miami Philharmonic.

The body was to be flown to Miami for burial.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 13 1967
New England Newsclip

George W. Edman

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

May I say a word about the late George W. Edman whom I have known since 1935, when as clerks of our respective boards we met frequently to discuss matters relating to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's participation in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival? This relationship developed into a close friendship, for which I am most grateful.

Through the years of devoted service to his government with the USIS in Italy, and later in fields as diversified as Panama and India, he never lost interest in the Festival, in the development of which he played such an important part.

I wish to express my indebtedness to him, as well as my affection.

GEORGE E. JUDD.

Star Route,
Deposit, N.Y.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
FEB 11 1967
New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Britten: Bernstein to Bing

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE OPERA being played at the Metropolitan in New York this afternoon, and also being broadcast, had its first American performance at Tanglewood in 1946 with the composer in the audience.

Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," was the result of a long series of events in which the late Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was the motive force. Britten, born in 1913, was a child prodigy and started writing music in his early years. But his music encountered indifference, if not hostility, in England. Finally, exasperated with English musical conservatism and disillusioned by Europe's political climate, he sailed for the United States in the spring of 1939.

* * *

HE REMAINED here three years. During that time he wrote an operetta, "Paul Bunyan," for the opera department of Columbia University. The story of the mythical giant of American folklore didn't go over very well. Another composition was a "Sinfonia da Requiem" which Koussevitzky played in Boston. This led to a Koussevitzky Foundation grant of $1,000 to compose an opera. Britten returned to England in the spring of 1942. He was excused from military service on the grounds that as a composer for the British Broadcasting Co. propaganda service, he was contributing fully to the national effort. Meanwhile, he went to work on "Grimes" and finished it in 1945. Its premiere was the first postwar performance in London's Sadler's Wells Theatre.

* * *

THE OPERA was prepared at the Berkshire Music Center opera department in the summer of 1946 under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, and was first played at Tanglewood on Tuesday evening, Aug. 6, 1946. Leonard Bernstein, at that time assistant to Koussevitzky in the conducting class of the academy, was conductor. Eric Crosier, who had been the London stage director, came over to assist in the staging of the opera, and Ralph Hawkes of the London music publishing firm of Boosey & Hawkes brought Britten himself over to help supervise the opera. Britten had dedicated the work in 1945 to Natalie Koussevitzky, the late wife of the conductor.

The libretto concerns the tormented career of a poor fisherman in a small Suffolk coast town, and is based on a poem, "The Borough," by George Crabbe, who was born two centuries ago in Aldeburgh, a small community like that in the opera, and where Britten himself now lives.

* * *

BRITTEN'S choice of the Crabbe story does not conceal any mystery as a glance at his whole career reveals that he has had a strange affinity for the sea and compassion for those whose livelihood is derived from it. The list of his subsequent operas confirms his bent for this type of situation — mysteries such as Poe and De Maupassant have developed or stories which interested Melville.

Indeed one of his later operas used "Billy Budd" as the libretto, and another opera, "Albert Herring," was based on the De Maupassant story, "Le Rosier de Madame Husson." This was also produced at the Berkshire Music Center in August 1949, two years after its premiere in Europe in 1947. This was a farce, however, and far removed from the nature of much of Britten's writing.

* * *

IN "GRIMES" the protagonist in the prologue stands in court accused of the death of his apprentice. His acquittal does not satisfy the townspeople, and three acts, each with two scenes, recount the rising, vigilant spirit of the citizenry and the falling spirit of the sadly harassed-in-soul fisherman.

* * *

BRITTEN is a tall, slender, light-haired man, easy to smile and with no indication from his appearance or manner that he might be a poet or an esthetic. The reception of "Grimes" at Tanglewood lead some of his more sanguine supporters to believe that the opera might go on Broadway. It is going on Broadway this season and this actual afternoon, but not in the way the enthusiasts of a score of years ago envisaged. They expected it might have a long, continuous run, but they were confronted with reality and convinced that Grimes doesn't pay.

In his international recognition, Britten has been given greater appreciation than by the Boston Orchestra, both on its home grounds and its summer terrain. Only a scant five years ago his War Requiem, which had been written for the rededication of St. Michael's Cathedral in Coventry in May, 1962, was played here at Tanglewood a bare two months later.

* * *

IN THE EXCITEMENT and glamour of a premiere, it is doubly difficult to discern whether a composition has more than immediate impact, and anyone who would dare to predict must have a bit of the foolhardy and the insensate. That "Grimes" has endured and after a score of years is evidently more firmly ensconced in the Metropolitan repertory than it may have been at its initial performance, must be due to its intrinsic worth rather than to the fortuitous grist of Bs with which it has been attended over its career: Britten from Bernstein to Bing.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 15,950
MAR 16 1967
New England Newsclip

Final Concert

Pianist Claude Frank, a repeat soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, will be the guest artist in the final concert of the Weston Country Evening Concert series, Friday night at 8:40 in the auditorium of the Country School on Alphabet Lane.

The program will include works by Mozart, Chopin, Beethoven and Schubert.

Reservations may be obtained from Mrs. Reginald B. Elwell at 893-7361; or anyone wishing further information may contact Mrs. Dudley B. Dumaine at 899-1098.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600
MAR 12 1967
New England Newsclip

Music This Week

8:30.

TUESDAY — Boston Symphony, Thomas Shippers conducting Bizet's Symphony in C, Menotti's "Apocalypse," and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." Symphony Hall at 7:30. Broadcast on Ch. 2 and WGBH-FM.

—Susan Gross, piano. Sonata in E flat major, Op. 31, No. 2, by Beethoven, and the Chopin B flat major Scherzo, Op. 31. Gardner Museum at 3 o'clock.

FRIDAY—Boston Symphony, Erich [illegible] Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 456, with Evelyne Crochet as soloist, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor. Symphony Hall at 2 Program repeated Saturday at 8:30.

SATURDAY—Youth Concert, Harry Ellis Dickson conducting Boston Symphony players in Walton's Festival Overture, "As Quiet As," by Colgrass, the Saint-Saens-Schmidt Tuba Concerto, with Chester Schmidt as soloist, excerpts from Copland's "The Tender Land," and the Hallelujah Chorus from Handel's "Messiah," with the New England Conservatory Chorus. Symphony Hall at 11 a.m.

—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. See Friday program. Symphony Hall at 8:30.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

POUGHKEEPSIE
Sunday, Febr [illegible] 1967

VAN NUYS, CALIF.
VALLEY NEWS AND VALLEY GREEN SHEET
D. 203,000
MAR 21 1967

'Messiah' in Full Score to Be on Video Saturday

Handel and Haydn Society of Boston will perform the complete, three-hour "Messiah" — divided into three major parts on Saturday, at 6:30 p.m. for television viewing over KCET — Channel 28.

Ever since the chorus introduced Handel's oratorio to the United States in 1818, audiences have flocked to the Boston Society's annual performances. The earlier world premiere took place in Dublin, Ireland in April, 1742.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 150-member chorus, with soloists, appear under direction of Dr. Edward Gilday, who has led the group for the past seven years.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
MAR 29 1967
New England Newsclip

The Writ Sarcastic

Michael Steinberg keeps complaining about the audience at Symphony, and I just want to say that I think this audience is terrific, especially the Saturday night audience. Three times this season I've put together enough money to buy a ticket for a downstairs seat at a Saturday night concert. I do this just because I think we all ought to help out the B.S.O., and every time the people sitting near me have given me a real treat of their conversation and jewelry and their rustly programs (that slick paper really SOUNDS!), and have saved me a lot of the music I would otherwise have had to listen to.

The people on Friday just walk out early, but for the most part they're so quiet that I'm stuck with having to pay attention to the music, which is a drag since, as I said, I only buy tickets to help out the B.S.O. I'm especially grateful to a group that sat behind me at the Bach St. John Passion last Saturday night; without them I'd have had to listen to Bach. Thank you so much, wherever you are.

LINDA VOGEL

Boston

Fabien Sevitzky, 73, Led Miami Philharmonic

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — Fabien Sevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Greater Miami (Fla.) Philharmonic, is dead at 73.

Sevitzky died Friday night of a heart attack after rehearsing with the state orchestra of Athens. He had come here two days ago for a concert series which was to be followed by appearances in Yugoslavia, Rome and London.

A nephew of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sevitzky changed his name from Koussevitzky so as not to be confused with his celebrated uncle.

Having appeared with scores of orchestras in America and Europe, he became permanent conductor of the University of Miami Symphony in 1959, holding the post until 1965, when he joined the Greater Miami Philharmonic.

The body was to be flown to Miami for burial.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350
MAR 11 1967
New England Newsclip

George Edman, Editor, USIA Official, Dead

PAGE ONE

Berkshire Festival Cofounder Succumbs In Germany

George W. Edman, former Berkshire correspondent for The Union, former managing editor of the Berkshire Eagle in Pittsfield, and longtime foreign service officer with the U. S. Information Agency, died Friday in a U. S. Army hospital in Frankfurt, Germany.

Had Operation

Mr. Edman was a founder of the Berkshire Music Festival. He had been on a special tour of duty in New Delhi, India, where he was operated on two weeks ago for ileitis. Four days ago he was flown to Germany from India.

He and his wife, the former Alice Ross Gould, had planned to return to Pittsfield this month after a second tour of duty in India, this time as a private consultant to the U. S. government.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 10 1967
New England Newsclip

George Edman Dies at 67; Served Eagle, State Dept.

George W. Edman

Festival Founder

Mr. Edman was one of the founders of the Berkshire Music Festival, now Tanglewood, and served as chairman of the coordinating committee for nine years. He was born in Orange and came to Pittsfield in 1923.

Besides his wife, he leaves three sons, Talmadge of Wilton Conn., who is national and international sales manager for the pulp division of the Weyerhaeuser Co.; Silas, general manager of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; and Ross, professor of art history at the University of Illinois at the Circle Campus in Chicago; and several grandchildren.

George W. Edman, 67, a former managing editor of The Eagle and a retired career officer in the U. S. Information Agency's foreign service, died this morning at a U. S. Army Hospital in Frankfort, Germany, from complications following an operation two weeks ago for ileitis in New Delhi, India, where he was on a special tour of duty.

He was flown to Germany four days ago from India, having initially been making a favorable recovery from surgery. He and his wife, the former Alice Ross Gould, had planned to return to Pittsfield later this month, after completing a second tour of duty in India, this one as a private consultant to the U. S. government. He had previously served a three-year tour in India as an economic aid officer, returning to this country in 1965 and working in Washington until retiring at the end of the year.

Started in 1923

Mr. Edman began newspaper work in 1923 on the Springfield Union and also worked as Berkshire correspondent for the Boston Globe and the Knickerbocker Press of Albany, N.Y. He joined The Eagle staff in 1926 and organized the county department. He was appointed county editor in 1927 and was named managing editor in 1939. He was granted a leave of absence in May 1942 to become a civilian employe of the Office of War Information and handled press and radio activity for the OWI in Africa and Italy.

Mr. Edman was one of the original group to be awarded the Medal of Freedom for services during World War II. His final assignment with Allied Force Headquarters in Italy was as director of the psychological warfare branch. He also served two years as chairman of the Allied Publications Board, responsible for reintroducing a free press into Italy.

He returned to The Eagle in 1945 but resigned in February 1947 to become public affairs officer in Denmark for the State Department. Later that year, he was transferred to the Athens embassy. His other USIA assignments included Burma, Italy Syria and Panama.

He was decorated with the Order of the British Empire and by the Republic of Panama with the Order of Balboa. The city of Trikkala, Greece, made him an honorary citizen in 1948, along with Gen. James Van Fleet and the late Dr. Henry P. Grady. In 1955 he was made an honorary doctor of humane letters by his alma mater, the University of Massachusetts.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAR 13 1967
New England Newsclip

George W. Edman

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

May I say a word about the late George W. Edman whom I have known since 1935, when as clerks of our respective boards we met frequently to discuss matters relating to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's participation in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival? This relationship developed into a close friendship, for which I am most grateful.

Through the years of devoted service to his government with the USIS in Italy, and later in fields as diversified as Panama and India, he never lost interest in the Festival, in the development of which he played such an important part.

I wish to express my indebtedness to him, as well as my affection.

GEORGE E. JUDD.

Star Route,
Deposit, N.Y.

257

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900
MAR 18 1967
New England Newsclip

National TV Concert Rehearsed, Videotaped In Boston Cathedral

Boston's venerable Cathedral of the Holy Cross has been the scene over the years of all manner of liturgical functions, from the baptism of infants and the confirmation of youngsters, to the ordination of priests and the consecration of bishops.

As the chief church of the Archdiocese and the particular parish of the Archbishops of Boston, Holy Cross has been a beloved edifice to three generations of Bostonians, and few there are in the area who haven't found their way, for some reason, to its Gothic splendors.

Primarily, perhaps, are the Cathedral's own parishioners, South End residents of myriad ways and walks of life who are gathered in the neighborhood of this immense church, largest in the See. Familiar with its chapels and shrines, too, are the staffs of hospitals and schools and businesses in the district. And occasionally there come to the Cathedral devotees of a different type, such as those who seven years ago flocked to the church to hear the world cathedral premiere of Pizzetti's "Assassinio nella Cattedrale," an operatic version of T. S. Eliot's great play, "Murder in the Cathedral," based on the death of St. Thomas a Becket.

But there are times, too, when the nation at large has opportunity to visit our cathedral via the remarkable inventions of television and its handmaiden, the so-called videotape—a process of live filming undertaken with a view to future telecasts.

Perhaps the most striking of these national visits to Holy Cross was the extraordinary Requiem Mass telecast from the Cathedral on the first anniversary of the death of President Kennedy. That visit has since been available in another remarkable form, the recorded version of Mozart music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

This week, still another opportunity was given the American viewing public of visiting Holy Cross when a CBS-TV Network team moved their complicated equipment into the Cathedral to videotape a one-hour special concert of religious music.

Highlights of the rehearsal and taping session are shown here. The concert, called "In Praise of the Lord," will be telecast this Sunday, March 19, from 10 to 11 a.m., via Boston's WHDH-TV, Channel 5.

Performers include noted Boston composer-conductor C. Alexander Peloquin; the Peloquin Chorale; Boston Symphony organist Berj Zamkochian; Columbia recording artist, Mother Marie Laetitia, R.J.M.(soprano); Dennis Striny (baritone); and a chamber orchestra, drawn largely from the Boston Symphony.

Host for the program is Rt. Rev. Walter Flaherty, Director of the radio-TV office of the Archdiocese of Boston.

The music to be heard on Sunday retells the story of Christ's life in terms of the last five centuries of sacred music by Catholic, Protestant and Jewish composers.

Dr. Peloquin has recently returned from a European tour during which he conducted performances and workshops in Rome, Germany and Belgium. He toured in Germany with his new "Mass for Joy," scored for guitar, brass and tympani.

He has also conducted a wide range of non-religious music, most recently a concert performance of Bizet's "Carmen." He has received a number of honorary degrees and awards and has contributed articles to such publications as Musart and the new edition of the Catholic Encyclopedia.

"In Praise of the Lord" was produced by CBS News in co-operation with the National Council of Catholic Men. Producer for CBS is Chalmers Dale; for NCCM, Robert J. Allen. Executive producer for CBS is Pamela Ilott; for NCCM, Richard J. Walsh. Portman Paget directs.

Holy Cross Cathedral was dedicated in 1875, a successor to the original Cathedral of Bishop Jean Cheverus, designed in 1802 by architect Charles Bulfinch. One of the large churches of the world, Holy Cross is 354 feet in length, 90 feet wide at the nave, 170 feet wide at the transepts, and occupies an area of 45,000 square feet. An echo of its title appears in the cruciform incorporated into the official coat of arms of the Archdiocese of Boston, which device is also part of the personal arms of Cardinal Cushing.

COMMENTATOR . . . Rt. Rev. Walter Flaherty, director of the Archdiocesan Radio and TV apostolate, is shown here, back to the camera, providing a narration for "In Praise of the Lord." Musicians and the Peloquin Chorale are seated within the sanctuary at left, while other singers and the public are in the pews at right. In the aisle are CBS-TV staff cameramen videotaping the session.

Pilot Photos by Philip A. Stack

POISED AND READY . . . Composer-conductor C. Alexander Peloquin is ready here to begin the program. Awaiting his "downbeat" in the background is Boston Symphony organist Berj Zamkochian, also on the faculty of Regis College in Weston.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAR 25 1967
New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
MAR 24 1967
New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Unit to Play at Trinity Church

SYMPHONY BRASS SECTION TO JOIN TRINITY CHOIR

The brass section of Boston Symphony Orchestra will join the choir of Trinity Church in presenting Easter music at the 9 a.m. and 11 a.m. Holy Communion services.

A third Holy Communion service will be celebrated at 7:30 a.m. Sunday without music.

The rector, Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, will deliver sermons at the later services.

During Easter Sunday there will also be a Junior Church Family Festival service at 4:30 p.m. and an evening prayer and sermon at 8 p.m.

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAY 8 1967
New England Newsclip

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAY 8 1967
New England Newsclip

No Direct CIA Aid To Symphony: Cabot

By WILLIAM SONZSKI

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Sunday that while the State Department has given direct financial assistance for overseas tours of the orchestra, the CIA has not.

A California publisher has alleged that the CIA secretly financed a visit to France by the orchestra in 1952.

"To my knowledge, the CIA had nothing to do with it," Cabot told The Herald. "The cultural affairs office in the State Department has helped out on several trips, but we have never dealt with the CIA."

Cabot noted that other U.S. musical companies and dance groups have also toured Europe and the Soviet Union with aid from the State Department "as a regular policy." He said New York, Philadelphia and Cleveland orchestras were among them.

The chamber group of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is currently on a tour of England, West Germany and the Soviet Union.

A U.S. official in Washington said the Soviet portion of the trip is part of the official cultural exchange program instituted between the two countries in 1958.

Exchange programs are financed by the State Department's cultural affairs bureau with funds appropriated by Congress, the official said.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
APR 27 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Puts Archives in B.U. Library

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has designated Boston University's Mugar Memorial Library as the respository for the orchestra's archieves that date back to 1881.

All tape recordings of orchestra radio broadcasts since 1958, estimated at nearly 450, are in the audio department of the library. In addition there are several commercial recordings and 37 programs on video tape.

A complete set of programs dates back to 1881, when the orchestra was founded and played its first concert in the old Boston Music Hall.

The archives contain several hand-copied scores of operas of the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

Manuscripts of commissioned works by the following composers are included: Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, Arthur Honegger, Sergei Prokofiev, Ottorino Respighi, Albert Roussel, Randall Thompson, Walter Piston and Edward Burlinghame Hill.

HERALD (e)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
CIRC. 16,500
APR 1 1967
New England Newsclip

BOARD MEMBERS—Two outstanding musicians now living in New Castle are members of the Board of Directors of the Portsmouth Community Concert Association. The men are Jacbobus Langendoen, left, and George Hamer, who play the cello and organ, respectively.

Community Concerts End Campaign Tonight

The Community Concert Association's membership campaign ends today.

Membership in the association will close for the year at 5:30 p.m., when the campaign headquarters at Kimball's Store will close.

While a canvass has been made in Portsmouth and in the surrounding area, Miss Anne Withington, association secretary, said people not contacted can join at the headquarters or by calling the special phone that has been installed at the headquarters, 436-7555.

Only association members will be admitted to the concerts, with no sale of tickets for any one concert.

Two outstanding musicians are serving on the association's Board of Directors.

Jacbobus Langendoen and George Hamer, both of New Castle, have had outstanding musical careers and are aiding with the work of the concert group.

Langendoen was a cellist with the Residentie Orchestra and the French Opera Orchestra in The Hague. He played an audition for Pierre Monteux, then conductor of the Boston Symphony, and was accepted for the orchestra.

* * *

After a career of 42 years with the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops, he retired in 1962 following the Berkshire Festival. Although formally retired, Langendoen still plays several concerts each season with the Boston Symphony.

Hamer studied organ with Charles Courboin, the famous French organist at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City. He was organist and choir master at the Mercersburg Academy for Boys in Pennsylvania.

The Robert DeCormier Folk Singers will present a concert Tuesday and new members will be able to attend by showing stubs. The entire organization is strictly non-profit, devoted solely to bringing fine artists to Portsmouth.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,450
APR 5 1967
New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 27,700
APR 5 1967
New England Newsclip

Public Groups Share in Estate

SALEM — Oliver Wolcott, 75, son of the late Gov. Roger Wolcott, gave $5000 to Peabody Museum in Salem and $2500 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Massachusetts Horticultural Society in his will, filed at the Registry of Probate.

Wolcott, a resident of 1020 Bay Rd., Hamilton, was retired counsel and vice president of the Old Colony Trust Co., Boston. He died March 11.

His will, dated Feb. 2, gave his paintings and portraits to his son, Oliver, Jr., of Hamilton. Also sharing in a trust fund established from the residue are his widow, Sybil Appleton Wolcott and two daughters, Mrs. Helen W. Parson of Wayland and Mrs. Augusta W. Howes of Framingham.

Peabody Museum was also given Wolcotts' books on voyages and explorations.

The will nominated the son and the bank as executors of the estate. Its value was not estimated.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
APR 18 1967
New England Newsclip

ONORED ON ANNIVERSARY—Dr. Theodore Ferris (right) with Bishop Anson Phelps Stokes.

Trinity Rector Gets a Surprise

By MIN S. YEE
Staff Reporter

It was an awkward moment for a minister.

When the Rev. Theodore Parker Ferris, who has served 25 years as rector of Trinity Church, Copley Sq., walked into the main ballroom of the Sheraton Plaza Hotel, 1000 friends and parishioners rose and applauded vigorously.

It was a surprise banquet honoring the Rev. Mr. Ferris and perhaps one of the best-kept secrets in the city, at least from him.

Everybody else knew. Parishioners, friends, newspapermen, radio and television men, caterers, program printers. Even the Boston Symphony knew.

"O, my God," he whispered softly and strode down the steps into the ballroom as members of the Boston Symphony played something called "Fanfare for Doctor Ferris."

He became rector of Trinity Church in 1942.

In 1952, he was selected as one of the 12 outstanding ministers in the United States by Life magazine.

A strong advocate of the dynamism of the city parish, Dr. Ferris has consistently maintained that "the city parish is still very much alive."

"Ted is the only rector of Trinity that knew enough about music to be a trustee of a symphony," said the Rt. Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, retired presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church in the U.S., former Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts and rector of Trinity Church, in his crisp toastmastery delivery.

"That he's resisted the temptation to enter Babylon is one of the triumphs of Boston over New York, said Bishop Sherrill.

Turning to Dr. Ferris, Bishop Sherrill said, "In the name of all these people I want to thank you. Go ahead now on your next 25 years."

Friends and parishioners presented the Rev. Ferris with a cash gift and a book of more than 1000 signatures. George Peabody Gardner made the presentation.

Among the head table guests were Dr. Nathan M. Pusey, president of Harvard University; the Rt. Reverend Anson Phelps Stokes Jr., bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Massachusetts; the Rt. Reverend John M. Burgess and the Rt. Reverend Frederick C. Lawrence, suffragan bishops of the Massachusetts diocese; the Very Rev. Charles H. Buck Jr., dean of the Cathedral of St. Paul, Boston; and the Very Rev. John B. Coburn, dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

New York Times
Saturday, April 8, 1967

UNCF Drive Taps Time, Inc., Exec

NW YORK, N.Y. The appointment of Andrew Heiskell as the 196 chairman of the Greater New York Committee of the United Negro College Fund was announced today by George Champion, the Fund's national campaign chairman.

Heiskell, who is chairman of the Board of Directors of Time Inc., will direct a group of nearly 1,000 volunteers who will seek $1,800,000 as part of the organization's national goal of $5,250,000. Last year, the New York Committee raised $1,283,000 for the Fund's member institutions.

In accepting the appoitment, Mr. Heiskell noted, "I believe that the Fund's 33 member colleges, with 35,000 students enrolled, are doing one of the most important jobs in American education today. These colleges must be helped to move ahead rapidly on all fronts. We simply do not have another hundred years in which to do a long-delayed job."

Mr. Heiskell added, "Of all the forces that alter the human condition none is stronger than the well-educated mind."

During the past two decades, the United Negro College Fund has received more than $95 million in contributions to assist its predominantly Negro Member institutions. Money contributed to the Fund is used to expand educational programs, bolster scholarship aid to nearly 19,000 needy strudents, improve faculties and build library holdings.

Mr. Heiskell is chairman of the Board of Trustees of Urban America, a member of the Executive Committee of the Inter-American Press Association and serves on the Boards of Directors of the Council for Latin America, the Atlantic Council, the Inter-American Foundation for the Arts and the Actors Studio.

He is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony, Bennington College and the University of Chicago, as well as a member of the Visiting Committee of the Joint Center for Urban Studies of M.I.T. and Harvard University, the Board of Visitors of the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs of the University of Pittsburgh, and the Boards of Directors of the Institute of International Education and the International EExEcutive Service Corps.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
APR 28 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
APR 30 1967
New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Archives to B.U.

The Boston Symphony plans to put the orchestra's archives on deposit in Boston University's Mugar Library.

The arrangement gives students access to such musical materials as original manuscripts, programs and tape recordings and relieves Symphony Hall of a storage problem.

The collection remains the property of the orchestra, according to Gustave A. Harrer, director of libraries at B.U.

The program books date back to the orchestra's founding in 1881. The manuscripts include several hand-copied scores of 18th and 19th century operas.

Among the contemporary manuscripts are Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, Hindemith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass, a Honegger symphony, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 4, Roussel's Symphony No. 3, Piston's Symphony No. 8, Thompson's "Last Words of David," and pieces by Respighi and Hill. All were commissioned by the orchestra or dedicated to its conductors.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
APR 3 1967
New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

* * * * *

At the last but one Friday afternoon symphony concerts on Friday, spring was in the air. The feminine audience blossomed forth with a show of spring hats that made the floor of the venerable old Symphony Hall look like a flower garden. Mini skirts there may be, but the symphony goers stick firmly to the length they feel is correct, regardless of fashion, and a much more pleasing scene it makes.

Among those there enjoying the very varied profram of music which included something for everyone, was Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead in a pale blue fitted coat, trimmed with black jet buttons; Mrs. Hollis T. Gleason of Cohasset; Mrs. Paul Schmid of South Westport, very chic in black and white checks; Mrs. Robert Lawrence of Westwood in a lemon yellow suit; Mrs. Richard Overholt of Dedham in bright green, a green velvet band in her hair; Mrs. Nelson Aldrich of Marblehead; Miss Bertha Stringer of Hingham; Mrs. Prentiss Shepherd of Boston; Mrs. M. Tucke Curtiss Jr. and Mrs. Richard Harpin, both of Hingham, who were together; Mrs. Charles Bartlett of Dedham who was at the International Ball later; Mrs. Edward F. Woods of Cohasset; and Mrs. Barton Gummere of Marblehead in a mustard yellow coat and Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston in a gay little hat of springing white flowers, who were deep in conversation during the intermission.

259

MUSIC CLUBS MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
5 TI. A YR. 5,500
APR 1967

Boston Symphony Orchestra—History

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard at the New York Convention, had an unusual beginning. Whereas most of this country's orchestras have been organized by a committee of interested citizens, Boston's orchestra was started by one man. This same man guided it personally and paid all its debts from his own pocket for nearly 40 years. Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoyed the great advantage of growing to full maturity with a freedom from serious financial struggle.

The Orchestra's remarkable founder was Major Henry Lee Higginson. He has been called a typical Bostonian, with regard to his strong convictions and ideals, his love of music, his loyalties and personal courage. He was thwarted from becoming a pianist himself by a hand injury during his student days. For 20 years afterward he labored in the Boston financial world, losing one fortune and amassing another, always nourishing a dream to provide Boston with a great symphony orchestra like those of the European capitals he knew so well. When the moment finally came, the citizens of Boston were ready to accept and support an orchestra.

The first concert took place in the Boston Music Hall on October 22, 1881. The Orchestra's Boston concerts were played in the Music Hall for nearly 20 years, until the present Symphony Hall was opened in 1900. In those years the German tradition in music prevailed, with its devotion to Beethoven, Mozart, and Schubert, and the early Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors were German. Georg Henschel was its first conductor, from 1881-1884. Then followed Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889 and again from 1898-1906; Artur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler (no relation to Arthur Fiedler), 1908-1912; and again Karl Muck, 1912-1918.

The First World War brought enormous changes to the Orchestra. The strong anti-German feeling which was then prevalent resulted in the unfortunate dismissal of Doctor Muck and some of the players. At this time Major Higginson was then in his eighties and he recognized the burden of carrying the Orchestra was too much for him. In 1918 he entrusted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a Board of Trustees for the first time, and in so doing handed over a greater measure of responsibility to the citizens of Boston.

Several devoted patrons immediately came to the financial rescue, and the Trustees engaged the French conductor Henri Rabaud to lead the Orchestra through the tremulous season of 1918-1919. In the five seasons following, 1919-1924, Pierre Monteux undertook the rebuilding of the ensemble. At the end of his term he had received much critical acclaim for having restored the Orchestra to its former capabilities.

A new era began with the advent of Serge Koussevitzky. His particular combination of intellect, dramatic flair, electric enthusiasm, and cosmopolitan taste in music proved to be so enduring that he served an unprecedented term of 25 years, 1924-1949. During his tenure the Orchestra responded to the challenges of a rapidly changing world. The Orchestra's recordings, begun slowly and painstakingly in 1917, appeared with more and more frequency, as did regular broadcasts of its live concerts. In 1930 the free Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River embankment began under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. In 1936 Doctor Koussevitzky and the Orchestra played their first summer concerts in the Berkshire Hills, and in 1938 they began their annual summer residence at the now famous estate of Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. All these avenues quickly increased the Orchestra's audiences by the tens of thousands. In 1940 Doctor Koussevitzky realized his dream of many years when the Orchestra founded Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. This summer academy of music for young advanced musicians further increased the Boston Symphony Orchestra's influence throughout the world.

The broader audience, the added activities, and the extra financial responsibilities which naturally resulted, all played a part in the next development in the method of support of the Orchestra. From the beginning, of course, there had always been the basic funds provided by the sale of tickets, but a yearly deficit resulted, which Major Higginson paid from his personal funds for 1881-1918. In the next 16 years a handful of Boston citizens helped the Trustees to erase the annual deficits. By 1934, however, private fortunes had dwindled to a marked degree, and the Trustees conceived the idea of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whereby a contribution of any amount automatically made the donor a Friend of the Orchestra. This placed the support of the Orchestra directly in the hands of its audiences and admirers in Boston and throughout the world, making it completely a public trust. Boston has taken the plan to its heart. There have been the additions of a strong endowment fund, and income from recordings, but the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra still constitute a major source of support, contributing as much as $350,000 annually in recent years.

Serge Koussevitzky retired as Music Director of the Orchestra in 1949 but continued as Director of the Berkshire Music Center until his death in the summer of 1951. Charles Munch began his 13-year tenure as Music Director in the 1949-1950 season. He continued the policy of giving strong support to the music of contemporary composers, and introduced much music from the French repertoire to this country. During Doctor Munch's term the Orchestra made its first tours abroad, under the auspices of the United States Government. In 1951 he restored to the public the privilege of hearing the Orchestra in Open Rehearsals, a practice which Major Higginson had instituted in the early days. Doctor Munch retired at the end of the 1961-1962 season, and Erich Leinsdorf began his current term in the fall of 1962.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was never simply a small community ensemble. Major Higginson's policy and his financial support led the Orchestra into early and continuous visits to other cities in the East and throughout the country. Boston accepted its early accomplishments with pride, and has watched it grow into one of the major musical organizations of the world.

Tours

In the early years of its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra stayed close to its home city. During its second season the Orchestra traveled across the Charles River to Cambridge where concerts were given thereafter for 81 years until the "Cambridge" concerts were moved to Symphony Hall to accommodate an ever-increasing audience. The third season (1883) saw the Boston Symphony Orchestra journey to Providence for the first of a continous series of concerts that in 1965 brought the Orchestra to the Rhode Island capital for the 82nd consecutive year.

Not until the sixth year of the Orchestra (1887) did it venture to New York City. With the 1965-1966 season the Orchestra had visited New York for 79 seasons—longer than any other visiting orchestra to that city.

Through its long history Boston's orchestra has visited many neighboring New England cities and colleges with some of these hearing the Orchestra annually.

orchestra came into the hall and said they couldn't find anyone to play Kodaly's 'Psalmus Hungaricus' on the

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100
APR 4 1967
New England Newsclip

Schools Get Federal Grant To Study Opera Production

By MARY ANN O'CONNELL
Telegram Staff Reporter

The School Department has received a $37,368 federal grant that will enable it to cooperate with the Boston Opera Company in a pilot project on relating curriculum to the performing arts, Miss Dorothy M. Davis, coordinator of governmental relations, said yesterday.

The purpose, she explained, is to provide cultural enrichment and give children from target area schools an idea of the many occupational opportunities in the performing arts.

The grant was made under Title I of the 1965 Education Act that provides funding for programs in target area schools. Those are schools that have a relatively high concentration of pupils from low-income families.

Selection Under Way

The 100 to 200 students from public and parochial schools who will participate in the program are being selected by their teachers and principals on the basis of talent in a particular area, she said. Students talented in home economics, industrial arts, English, music or physical education are being selected. Students talented in a particular area will work in groups of eight to 10, she added.

The students "will learn how to produce an opera starting with the fundamentals and working up," Miss Davis commented. Sometime in early May or late June they will produce Offenbach's opera "Voyage to the Moon."

The students will attend two performances of the Boston Opera Company and participate in seven Saturday sessions at Providence Junior High School where they will learn about the work that goes into producing an opera. Miss Davis explained that home economics students would learn about making costumes and industrial arts students about making stage sets.

To Go Backstage

Before the students go to the opera they will be given an orientation program. At the opera, they will spend some time backstage studying their particular area of interest, Miss Davis said.

"We are teaming a member of our staff with a member of the Boston Opera staff," she said, explaining that a home economics teacher would work with the staff member in charge of making costumes. Along with the student program, there will be in-service training for the teachers. Miss Sarah Caldwell, director of the Boston Opera Company, will be working with the teachers.

The School Department is doing the program for the state Department of Education "to see if this type is worthwhile for Title I," Miss Davis said.

Work began in September when teachers from public and parochial schools met to plan the program.

A coordinator will be selected by the school administration, but the program will be under the direction of Miss Caldwell.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Opera Company is expected to perform the Offenbach's opera for the students sometime in the next few weeks in one of the schools. Miss Davis said the date was indefinite because of the difficulty in coordinating the schedules of Boston Symphony members with the opera company members. The symphony will play the music for the opera.

Students who will participate are grades seven, eight and nine at Providence and Grafton Street Junior High Schools and students in grades seven and eight of Canterbury, Chandler, East Kendall, Elizabeth, Gage, Oxford and Woodland streets schools and Holy Name, Sacred Heart School, Sacred Heart Academy, St. Joseph, St. Paul, St. Peter and St. John Ascension parochial schools.

RECORD (m)
MERIDEN. CONN.
CIRC. 20,000
APR 17 1967
New England Newsclip

George Faxon Recital For St. Andrew's Event

George Faxon, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, Boston, will present a dedicatory recital of the new Austin pipe organ at St. Andrew's Episcopal Church on April 24 at 8 p.m. The general public is invited.

He is associate professor of church music at Boston University and is a fellow of Trinity College, London, Eng.

Faxon received his early training at the New England Conservatory of Music, continuing studies with Harold Darke at Kings College, University of Cambridge, England, and with Carl Dolmetsch, Haslemere, England.

Former positions held include assistant to Palmer Christian, University of Michigan, assistant to E. Power Biggs and subsequently head of the organ department, Longy School, Cambridge, Mass., and for ten years on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and head of the organ department there for seven years.

George Faxon

He is also known as an organ recitalist and has played many recitals throughout the country and was chosen one of the convention recitalists at the National Convention of the American Guild of Organists in New York in June 1956. He also was on the faculty of Union Seminary School of Sacred Music in New York during the summer term 1956 as instructor in organ and director of the organ class. Recent recitals include two appearances in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Faxon has recorded for AEolian-Skinner "King of Instruments" series and was formerly dean of the Boston Chapter, American Guild of Organists. Writing of a recital in Saint Thomas Church, New York, Ray Berry of the "American Organist" says: "For this listener, and without any reservation, George Faxon, more than any other organist I know, brings to organ literature literate attention freed from all fetishes, fads and hamstrings. He is without peer in imaginational, resourceful use of any instrument, in the ability to communicate a magnificent musical experience. George Faxon is one of the truly great organ artist-musicians extant."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, April 21, 1967

Whittemore, Lowe In Concert Weds.

Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, duo-pianists, will present the final concert of the Community Concerts season Wednesday at Proctor's Theater.

Admission is by membership card only. Bonus tickets to new members joining during campaign week will be mailed Monday, according to Mrs. Calvin L. Keiper, registrar.

Whittemore and Lowe, acknowledged as music's pre-eminent two-piano team, have run up a record of achievement in all media open to duo-pianists. They have appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonia of London, as well as the orchestras of Chicago, Cleveland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Washington, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Dallas, Detroit, Oklahoma City, Denver, San Antonio, Atlanta and Rochester. In the recording field, they are among the few serious performers to sell over one million records.

One section of the Wednesday night program will be a "Music of Today" portion during which the duo-pianists will announce from the stage the selections to be played.

The program will also include a "Sonata in D minor," Bernardo Pasquini; "Sonata in E flat Major," J. S. Bach; and "Arrival of the Queen of Sheba from Handel's Solomon." Also the Brahms "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and "La Valse" by Ravel. "La Valse," a choreographic poem, was originally written for two pianos.

History of the House of Steinway

Steinway Piano Factory covers 12 acres. Delegates tour and April 19 and will be lunch guests of the Invitation of the Post-Convention Tour of the will see the exquisite factory, on the history of the House of Henry Z. Steinway, President of Steinway and Sons, has invited delegates on a post-Convention tour of the Steinway Piano Factory on April 19.

There are approximately 2,000 Steinway Pianos listened all over the world for the use of Steinway Artists.

In rehearsal and performance.

Steinway manufacturing facilities in the United States have long since left Park Avenue for the Astoria section of New York City. 109 West 57th Street, Steinway Hall has been located at first two floors on which the showroom, concert and service department of Steinway & Sons occupies the artist, and famous "piano bank" holding as many basement houses the selection of world-wide in many as 100 concert grands for the selection of world-wide in many The House of Steinway, is of course, Hamburg and a finishing manufacturing facilities in Hamburg and a finishing factory in London to serve the export markets of

While still a young orchestra in 1886 the Boston Symphony traveled to Chicago for the first of more than a score of visits, the most recent during its trans-continental tour under Erich Leinsdorf in 1963. Cincinnati, Columbus, Detroit, and Ann Arbor have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra on numerous occasions.

Each season in addition to its New England and New York appearances the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in several cities along the eastern seaboard. In the course of 85 years the Orchestra has traveled from Atlanta to San Francisco, from Montreal to Dallas, from Moscow to Tokyo.

The first tour to Europe took place in 1952 with concerts in 11 cities including London, Berlin, and Amsterdam. Four years later the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Europe this time as the first western orchestra to be heard in the Soviet Union. Concerts there were given in Moscow and Leningrad. Guest Conductor Pierre Monteux conducted Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Paris where 40 years earlier he had conducted the world premiere in the same theatre. On this tour other cities visited included Prague, Vienna, Oslo, Helsinki, and a special program in the Cathedral at Chartres. During the 1956 tour the Orchestra also played in Ireland and at the Edinburgh International Music Festival.

The longest international tour by the Orchestra took place in 1960 when the Orchestra under Charles Munch, as it was on the two previous foreign tours, gave two concerts in Taiwan, 22 in Japan, three in the Philippines, seven in Australia, and two in New Zealand.

Erich Leinsdorf

The following is excerpted from "Erich Leinsdorf: Musician of the Year" by Milton Esterow, which appeared in "Musical America," December, 1963.

"One day in 1961, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony, called Erich Leinsdorf, 'Henry Cabot would like to meet you,' he said. 'Could you have lunch with us on Monday?' Leinsdorf said he could. He was not sure what Cabot, President of the Orchestra's Board of Trustees, had in mind, but suspected that 'Cabot wanted to look me over for future reference.' Cabot, it developed, was thinking not only about the future but also about the present. After some casual talk about a number of things, including how Cabot played the clarinet, he offered Leinsdorf one of music's biggest plums—the post of musical director of the Boston Symphony. . . .

"Erich Leinsdorf was born on February 4, 1912. His father died when Erich was three. 'I was started in music by my mother,' Leinsdorf said. 'Her plan was to get me —through the help of one of her uncles, who was an editor—into the newspaper business. I started playing the piano when I was five. Up to my 15th year, I was in doubt what I was going to be. I was interested in soccer. I played left fullback, and when I was tired of running I was the goalie. I had a very good kick with my left foot.

"'By the age of 18, I knew I was going to be a performer. I didn't know in what capacity. At that age you can't make up your mind. I tell the kids at Tanglewood that the casting is done a little bit by forces outside themselves.

"'I studied orchestral conducting in Vienna and tried to land any kind of position. Austria was in a depression, and the shadows across the border were large.' In 1933, he hiked 150 miles to Salzburg, where he got a job as Bruno Walter's assistant in preparing operas for the festival.

"In 1934, Toscanini was in Vienna to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. 'I was sitting and listening to one of the rehearsals,' Leinsdorf said. 'One of the officials of the orchestra came into the hall and said they couldn't find anyone to play Kodaly's 'Psalmus Hungaricus' on the piano for the old man. I told him I could. Toscanini liked the way I played it.'

"For the next three summers, Leinsdorf was Toscanini's assistant in Salzburg. In 1938, Leinsdorf was hired as a conductor at the Metropolitan. How did he get the job in New York? 'Lotte Lehmann had a lot to do with it. I knew her well in Salzburg. I coached her in some of her roles. But I've never quite pinned down who did what. Toscanini? He wasn't on speaking terms with the Met. The direct line was Lehmann, Edward Johnson and Artur Bodanzky.'

"On Leinsdorf's arrival in this country, there was visa trouble. His visa expired in 1938. 'It took the help of a freshman Congressman named Lyndon Johnson to prepare the necessary legal formula for me to leave the country, go to Canada briefly, and apply to the American consulate for quick re-entry.'

"Leinsdorf made his debut at the Met on January 21, 1938, conducting 'Die Walküre.' Noel Strauss wrote in The New York Times: 'Although but 26 years old, the new director led his forces with a sure hand and in general made a favorable impression. If there was nothing startling about his work, it evidenced solid musicianship and was ripe with exceptional promise.'

"Some months later, the Met was ripe with complaints. The Wagnerian wing, led by Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad, felt that Leinsdorf was not yet ready to conduct at the Met.

"'To my fairly accurate memory, there was never an overt fight between us,' said Leinsdorf. 'There was a disapproval of my musical ways. Bodanzky had got them used to a style—to get through as fast and easily as they could. He speeded up Wagner's tempos till it wasn't even funny. Lauritz told me, "You know, you may be right with your tempos, but nobody can sing these operas three times a week your way."'

"Leinsdorf was at the Met until 1943. He left to become conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. A few months later, he was inducted into the army. He was honorably discharged 18 months later. From 1947 to 1955, he was conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic. Then there was a season as director of the New York City Opera. He went back to the Met as guest conductor and was there until the call came from Boston.

"Leinsdorf lives in Brookline, Massachusetts, with his wife, Anne, whom he married in 1939. They have five children."

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100
APR 4 1967
New England Newsclip

Schools Get Federal Grant To Study Opera Production

By MARY ANN O'CONNELL
Telegram Staff Reporter

The School Department has received a $37,368 federal grant that will enable it to cooperate with the Boston Opera Company in a pilot project on relating curriculum to the performing arts, Miss Dorothy M. Davis, coordinator of governmental relations, said yesterday.

The purpose, she explained, is to provide cultural enrichment and give children from target area schools an idea of the many occupational opportunities in the performing arts.

The grant was made under Title I of the 1965 Education Act that provides funding for programs in target area schools. Those are schools that have a relatively high concentration of pupils from low-income families.

Selection Under Way

The 100 to 200 students from public and parochial schools who will participate in the program are being selected by their teachers and principals on the basis of talent in a particular area, she said. Students talented in home economics, industrial arts, English, music or physical education are being selected. Students talented in a particular area will work in groups of eight to 10, she added.

The students "will learn how to produce an opera starting with the fundamentals and working up," Miss Davis commented. Sometime in early May or late June they will produce Offenbach's opera "Voyage to the Moon."

The students will attend two performances of the Boston Opera Company and participate in seven Saturday sessions at Providence Junior High School where they will learn about the work that goes into producing an opera. Miss Davis explained that home economics students would learn about making costumes and industrial arts students about making stage sets.

To Go Backstage

Before the students go to the opera they will be given an orientation program. At the opera, they will spend some time backstage studying their particular area of interest, Miss Davis said.

"We are teaming a member of our staff with a member of the Boston Opera staff," she said, explaining that a home economics teacher would work with the staff member in charge of making costumes. Along with the student program, there will be in-service training for the teachers. Miss Sarah Caldwell, director of the Boston Opera Company, will be working with the teachers.

The School Department is doing the program for the state Department of Education "to see if this type is worthwhile for Title I," Miss Davis said.

Work began in September when teachers from public and parochial schools met to plan the program.

A coordinator will be selected by the school administration, but the program will be under the direction of Miss Caldwell.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Opera Company is expected to perform the Offenbach's opera for the students sometime in the next few weeks in one of the schools. Miss Davis said the date was indefinite because of the difficulty in coordinating the schedules of Boston Symphony members with the opera company members. The symphony will play the music for the opera.

Students who will participate are grades seven, eight and nine at Providence and Grafton Street Junior High Schools and students in grades seven and eight of Canterbury, Chandler, East Kendall, Elizabeth, Gage, Oxford and Woodland streets schools and Holy Name, Sacred Heart School, Sacred Heart Academy, St. Joseph, St. Paul, St. Peter and St. John Ascension parochial schools.

RECORD (m)
MERIDEN. CONN.
CIRC. 20,000
APR 17 1967
New England Newsclip

George Faxon Recital For St. Andrew's Event

George Faxon, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, Boston, will present a dedicatory recital of the new Austin pipe organ at St. Andrew's Episcopal Church on April 24 at 8 p.m. The general public is invited.

He is associate professor of church music at Boston University and is a fellow of Trinity College, London, Eng.

Faxon received his early training at the New England Conservatory of Music, continuing studies with Harold Darke at Kings College, University of Cambridge, England, and with Carl Dolmetsch, Haslemere, England.

Former positions held include assistant to Palmer Christian, University of Michigan, assistant to E. Power Biggs and subsequently head of the organ department, Longy School, Cambridge, Mass., and for ten years on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and head of the organ department there for seven years.

George Faxon

He is also known as an organ recitalist and has played many recitals throughout the country and was chosen one of the convention recitalists at the National Convention of the American Guild of Organists in New York in June 1956. He also was on the faculty of Union Seminary School of Sacred Music in New York during the summer term 1956 as instructor in organ and director of the organ class. Recent recitals include two appearances in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Faxon has recorded for AEolian-Skinner "King of Instruments" series and was formerly dean of the Boston Chapter, American Guild of Organists. Writing of a recital in Saint Thomas Church New York, Ray Berry of the "American Organist" says: "For this listener, and without any reservation, George Faxon, more than any other organist I know, brings to organ literature literate attention freed from all fetishes, fads and hamstrings. He is without peer in imaginational, resourceful use of any instrument, in the ability to communicate a magnificent musical experience. George Faxon is one of the truly great organ artist-musicians extant."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, April 21, 1967

Whittemore, Lowe In Concert Weds.

Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, duo-pianists, will present the final concert of the Community Concerts season Wednesday at Proctor's Theater.

Admission is by membership card only. Bonus tickets to new members joining during campaign week will be mailed Monday, according to Mrs. Calvin L. Keiper, registrar.

Whittemore and Lowe, acknowledged as music's pre-eminent two-piano team, have run up a record of achievement in all media open to duo-pianists. They have appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Philharmonia of London, as well as the orchestras of Chicago, Cleveland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Washington, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Dallas, Detroit, Oklahoma City, Denver, San Antonio, Atlanta and Rochester. In the recording field, they are among the few serious performers to sell over one million records.

One section of the Wednesday night program will be a "Music of Today" portion during which the duo-pianists will announce from the stage the selections to be played.

The program will also include a "Sonata in D minor," Bernardo Pasquini; "Sonata in E flat Major," J. S. Bach; and "Arrival of the Queen of Sheba from Handel's Solomon." Also the Brahms "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and "La Valse" by Ravel. "La Valse," a choreographic poem, was originally written for two pianos.

History of the House of Steinway

While still a young orchestra in 1886 the Boston Symphony traveled to Chicago for the first of more than a score of visits, the most recent during its trans-continental tour under Erich Leinsdorf in 1963. Cincinnati, Columbus, Detroit, and Ann Arbor have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra on numerous occasions.

Each season in addition to its New England and New York appearances the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in several cities along the eastern seaboard. In the course of 85 years the Orchestra has traveled from Atlanta to San Francisco, from Montreal to Dallas, from Moscow to Tokyo.

The first tour to Europe took place in 1952 with concerts in 11 cities including London, Berlin, and Amsterdam. Four years later the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Europe this time as the first western orchestra to be heard in the Soviet Union. Concerts there were given in Moscow and Leningrad. Guest Conductor Pierre Monteux conducted Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Paris where 40 years earlier he had conducted the world premiere in the same theatre. On this tour other cities visited included Prague, Vienna, Oslo, Helsinki, and a special program in the Cathedral at Chartres. During the 1956 tour the Orchestra also played in Ireland and at the Edinburgh International Music Festival.

The longest international tour by the Orchestra took place in 1960 when the Orchestra under Charles Munch, as it was on the two previous foreign tours, gave two concerts in Taiwan, 22 in Japan, three in the Philippines, seven in Australia, and two in New Zealand.

Erich Leinsdorf

The following is excerpted from "Erich Leinsdorf: Musician of the Year" by Milton Esterow, which appeared in "Musical America," December, 1963.

"One day in 1961, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony, called Erich Leinsdorf, 'Henry Cabot would like to meet you,' he said. 'Could you have lunch with us on Monday?' Leinsdorf said he could. He was not sure what Cabot, President of the Orchestra's Board of Trustees, had in mind, but suspected that 'Cabot wanted to look me over for future reference.' Cabot, it developed, was thinking not only about the future but also about the present. After some casual talk about a number of things, including how Cabot played the clarinet, he offered Leinsdorf one of music's biggest plums—the post of musical director of the Boston Symphony. . . .

"Erich Leinsdorf was born on February 4, 1912. His father died when Erich was three. 'I was started in music by my mother,' Leinsdorf said. 'Her plan was to get me—through the help of one of her uncles, who was an editor—into the newspaper business. I started playing the piano when I was five. Up to my 15th year, I was in doubt what I was going to be. I was interested in soccer. I played left fullback, and when I was tired of running I was the goalie. I had a very good kick with my left foot.

"'By the age of 18, I knew I was going to be a performer. I didn't know in what capacity. At that age you can't make up your mind. I tell the kids at Tanglewood that the casting is done a little bit by forces outside themselves.

"'I studied orchestral conducting in Vienna and tried to land any kind of position. Austria was in a depression, and the shadows across the border were large.' In 1933, he hiked 150 miles to Salzburg, where he got a job as Bruno Walter's assistant in preparing operas for the festival.

"In 1934, Toscanini was in Vienna to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. 'I was sitting and listening to one of the rehearsals,' Leinsdorf said. 'One of the officials of the orchestra came into the hall and said they couldn't find anyone to play Kodaly's 'Psalmus Hungaricus' on the piano for the old man. I told him I could. Toscanini liked the way I played it.'

"For the next three summers, Leinsdorf was Toscanini's assistant in Salzburg. In 1938, Leinsdorf was hired as a conductor at the Metropolitan. How did he get the job in New York? 'Lotte Lehmann had a lot to do with it. I knew her well in Salzburg. I coached her in some of her roles. But I've never quite pinned down who did what. Toscanini? He wasn't on speaking terms with the Met. The direct line was Lehmann, Edward Johnson and Artur Bodanzky.'

"On Leinsdorf's arrival in this country, there was visa trouble. His visa expired in 1938. 'It took the help of a freshman Congressman named Lyndon Johnson to prepare the necessary legal formula for me to leave the country, go to Canada briefly, and apply to the American consulate for quick re-entry.'

"Leinsdorf made his debut at the Met on January 21, 1938, conducting 'Die Walküre.' Noel Strauss wrote in The New York Times: 'Although but 26 years old, the new director led his forces with a sure hand and in general made a favorable impression. If there was nothing startling about his work, it evidenced solid musicianship and was ripe with exceptional promise.'

"Some months later, the Met was ripe with complaints. The Wagnerian wing, led by Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad, felt that Leinsdorf was not yet ready to conduct at the Met.

"'To my fairly accurate memory, there was never an overt fight between us,' said Leinsdorf. 'There was a disapproval of my musical ways. Bodanzky had got them used to a style—to get through as fast and easily as they could. He speeded up Wagner's tempos till it wasn't even funny. Lauritz told me, "You know, you may be right with your tempos, but nobody can sing these operas three times a week your way."'

"Leinsdorf was at the Met until 1943. He left to become conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. A few months later, he was inducted into the army. He was honorably discharged 18 months later. From 1947 to 1955, he was conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic. Then there was a season as director of the New York City Opera. He went back to the Met as guest conductor and was there until the call came from Boston.

"Leinsdorf lives in Brookline, Massachusetts, with his wife, Anne, whom he married in 1939. They have five children."

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100

APR 4 1967 New England Newsclip

Schools Get Federal Grant To Study Opera Production

By MARY ANN O'CONNELL
Telegram Staff Reporter

The School Department has received a $37,368 federal grant that will enable it to cooperate with the Boston Opera Company in a pilot project on relating curriculum to the performing arts, Miss Dorothy M. Davis, coordinator of governmental relations, said yesterday.

The purpose, she explained, is to provide cultural enrichment and give children from target area schools an idea of the many occupational opportunities in the performing arts.

The grant was made under Title I of the 1965 Education Act that provides funding for programs in target area schools. Those are schools that have a relatively high concentration of pupils from low-income families.

Selection Under Way

The 100 to 200 students from public and parochial schools who will participate in the program are being selected by their teachers and principals on the basis of talent in a particular area, she said. Students talented in home economics, industrial arts, English, music or physical education are being selected. Students talented in a particular area will work in groups of eight to 10, she added.

The students "will learn how to produce an opera starting with the fundamentals and working up," Miss Davis commented. Sometime in early May or late June they will produce Offenbach's opera "Voyage to the Moon."

The students will attend two performances of the Boston Opera Company and participate in seven Saturday sessions at Providence Junior High School where they will learn about the work that goes into producing an opera. Miss Davis explained that home economics students would learn about making costumes and industrial arts students about making stage sets.

To Go Backstage

Before the students go to the opera they will be given an orientation program. At the opera, they will spend some time backstage studying their particular area of interest, Miss Davis said.

"We are teaming a member of our staff with a member of the Boston Opera staff," she said, explaining that a home economics teacher would work with the staff member in charge of making costumes. Along with the student program, there will be in-service training for the teachers. Miss Sarah Caldwell, director of the Boston Opera Company, will be working with the teachers.

The School Department is doing the program for the state Department of Education "to see if this type is worthwhile for Title I," Miss Davis said.

Work began in September when teachers from public and parochial schools met to plan the program.

A coordinator will be selected by the school administration, but the program will be under the direction of Miss Caldwell.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Opera Company is expected to perform the Offenbach's opera for the students sometime in the next few weeks in one of the schools. Miss Davis said the date was indefinite because of the difficulty in coordinating the schedules of Boston Symphony members with the opera company members. The symphony will play the music for the opera.

Students who will participate are grades seven, eight and nine at Providence and Grafton Street Junior High Schools and students in grades seven and eight of Canterbury, Chandler, East Kendall, Elizabeth, Gage, Oxford and Woodland streets schools and Holy Name, Sacred Heart School, Sacred Heart Academy, St. Joseph, St. Paul, St. Peter and St. John Ascension parochial schools.

RECORD (m)
MERIDEN. CONN.
CIRC. 20,000

APR 17 1967 New England Newsclip

George Faxon Recitali[illegible] For St. Andrew's Event[illegible]

George Faxon, organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, Boston, will present a dedicatory recital of the new Austin pipe organ at St. Andrew's Episcopal Church on April 24 at 8 p.m. The general public is invited.

He is associate professor of church music at Boston University and is a fellow of Trinity College, London, Eng.

Faxon received his early training at the New England Conservatory of Music, continuing studies with Harold Darke at Kings College, University of Cambridge, England, and with Carl Dolmetsch, Haslemere, England.

Former positions held include assistant to Palmer Christian, University of Michigan, assistant to E. Power Biggs and subsequently head of the organ department, Longy School, Cambridge, Mass., and for ten years on the faculty of the New England Conservatory and head of the organ department there for seven years.

George Faxon

He is also known as an organ recitalist and has played many recitals throughout the country and was chosen one of the convention recitalists at the National Convention of the American Guild of Organists in New York in June 1956. He also was on the faculty of Union Seminary School of Sacred Music in New York during the summer term 1956 as instructor in organ and director of the organ class. Recent recitals include two appearances in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Faxon has recorded for AEolian-Skinner "King of Instruments" series and was formerly dean of the Boston Chapter, American Guild of Organists. Writing of a recital in Saint Thomas Church, New York, Ray Berry of the "American Organist" says: "For this listener, and without any reservation, George Faxon, more than any other organist I know, brings to organ literature literate attention freed from all fetishes, fads and hamstrings. He is without peer in imaginational, resourceful use of any instrument, in the ability to communicate a magnificent musical experience. George Faxon is one of the truly great organ artist-musicians extant."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Friday, April 21, 1967

Whittemore, Lowe In Concert Weds.

Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, duo-pianists, will present the final concert of the Community Concerts season Wednesday at Proctor's Theater.

Admission is by membership card only. Bonus tickets to new members joining during campaign week will be mailed Monday, according to Mrs. Calvin L. Keiper, registrar.

Whittemore and Lowe, acknowledged as music's pre-eminent two-piano team, have run up a record of achievement in all media open to duo-pianists. They have appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonia of London, as well as the orchestras of Chicago, Cleveland, San Francisco, St. Louis, Washington, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Dallas, Detroit, Oklahoma City, Denver, San Antonio, Atlanta and Rochester. In the recording field, they are among the few serious performers to sell over one million records.

One section of the Wednesday night program will be a "Music of Today" portion during which the duo-pianists will announce from the stage the selections to be played.

The program will also include a "Sonata in D minor," Bernardo Pasquini; "Sonata in E flat Major," J. S. Bach; and "Arrival of the Queen of Sheba from Handel's Solomon." Also the Brahms "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and "La Valse" by Ravel. "La Valse," a choreographic poem, was originally written for two pianos.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,850
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 44,600
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,250
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,450
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

CIA Man Says Boston Symphony Tour Financed

United Press International

NEW YORK — A former Central Intelligence Agency officer said he turned over thousands of dollars in CIA funds to American labor leaders to help bolster unions in post-war Europe against Communist subversion.

The onetime CIA executive, Thomas Braden named United Auto Workers president Walter P. Reuther, to whom Braden said he handed over $50,000 in $50 bills, and driving Brown of the American Federation of Labor who allegedly got $15,000 "from the vaults of The CIA."

Braden, now editor and publisher of the Blade-Tribune, Oceanside, Calif., defended these and other actions of the CIA in an article in the Saturday Evening Post.

Referring to criticisms made by Reuther's brother, Victor, director of international affairs for the UAW about labor cooperation with the CIA, Braden scoffed, "Victor Reuther ought to be ashamed of himself."

"At his request, I went to Detroit one morning and gave Walter $50,000 in $50 bills. Victor spent the money, mostly in West Germany, to bolster labor unions there."

In Detroit, Walter Reuther confirmed Sunday that the U.A.W. did agree, reluctantly, on one occasion, to the request to transmit government funds to supplement inadequate funds being made available by the U.S. labor movement.

Reuther did not name the sources of the funds in his statement but a U.A.W. spokesman confirmed today that the money referred to was the $50,000 mentioned by Braden.

Reuther also said that following this incident his brother victor was contacted by Braden and asked to become an agent for the CIA, using as a front his position as European representative of the C.I.O.

Included among other claims by Braden were:

—That the CIA financed a highly successful European tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

—That money for the publication of Encounter, a magazine published in England dedicated to cultural achievement and political freedom, come from the intelligence agency.

—That a CIA agent was placed in a "Europe-based organization of intellectuals called the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

Of all the groups with which the CIA worked, Braden said, the intelligence agency had the greatest difficulty with labor.

He cited the case involving Jay Lovestone, an assistant to David Dubinsky in the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

TAIN, CONN.
50
MAY 15 1967 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAY 10 1967 New England Newsclip

HERALD (m)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 159,500
MAY 9 1967 New England Newsclip

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750
MAY 10 1967 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

New York Post
D. 324,256 SUN. 243,637
MAY 9 1967

TRAVELER (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 146,300
MAY 9 1967 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 12,800
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

EAGLE (e)
CLAREMONT, N. H.
CIRC. 7,050
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,200
MAY 10 1967 New England Newsclip

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,450
MAY 9 1967 New England Newsclip

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 67,000
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 91,350
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,300
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

EVENING EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
COMB. CIRC. 43,400
MAY 8 1967 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 411,800
MAY 15 1967 New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
MILFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 9,300
MAY 15 1967 New England Newsclip

NEW ENGLAND NEWS ROUNDUP

Whether the entire membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra represented just so many Central Intelligence Agency operatives was a moot point. Thomas W. Braden, a former CIA official, said that the agency financed trips abroad by the orchestra. He made the statement in the course of interviews during which he said the CIA also channeled $50,000 through the United Auto Workers union to combat Communist influence in foreign trade union organizations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, said the orchestra had received some help from the State Department in financing its trips abroad, "but to my knowledge, the CIA had nothing to do with it."

★ ★ ★

Hub Symphony Tie With CIA Refuted

Symphony - CIA Link Is Denied

Charges Denied By Symphony

DORCHESTER—The CIA seems to finance everything. One recent allegation is that they sponsored a world tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Do you suppose they would be interested in assisting our Stadium Commission Chairman James F. Burke? A money-losing stadium would certainly not look good for democracy. PETE HEADLEY

On The Lighter Side

By DICK WEST

WASHINGTON (UPI) —New reports of Central Intelligence Agency involvement with private groups keep popping up.

In the latest controversy there were assertions, and some denials, linking the CIA with such diverse enterprises as the AFL-CIO, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the magazine Encounter, the Congress for Cultural Freedom and an organization called PEN.

Boston Orchestra Denies Financial Aid from CIA

BOSTON (UPI)—A trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra denies a charge the orchestra was linked to the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Sunday the State Department has given financial assistance for overseas tours of the orchestra, "but to my knowledge, the CIA had nothing to do with it."

A former CIA officer, Thomas Braden, now publisher of an Oceanside, Calif., newspaper, made the charge Sunday in New York.

Cabot said the State Department has financed other U.S. musical companies and dance groups on European Soviet Union tours. "It's a regular policy," he added.

The chamber group of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is currently on a tour of England, West Germany and the Soviet Union.

CIA Tried to Block Parts of Mag Story

The CIA and U.S. labor

By Erwin D. Canham

Let's think

Now there is another flurry of rather sensational publicity concerning the CIA and American labor unions. There is also publicity about the CIA's relations with various cultural organizations — including, of all things, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is inevitable that all these things should come to light. Doubtless there will be more. But neither Americans nor other supporters of freedom around the world should draw hasty conclusions. The nations in the late 1940's and 1950's were engaged in ruthless political warfare. Communism, effectively led from Moscow, had infiltrated many national and international organizations of real importance. Trade unions were a major target.

Whereupon the United States, acting in close collaboration with likeminded peoples and governments elsewhere, began to create defenses. None of these defenses was more vital, or more effective, than in the trade-union movement. American unions, both those stemming from the AFL and the CIO, were vigorous and helpful. They contributed a good deal of their own resources to defend free trade unions in Western Europe and the Americas, primarily, and to set up Communist-free international labor groupings.

Was it wrong?

American labor could hardly have been expected to pay all the costs of these activities. Thus government, chiefly through the CIA, came into the picture. The Communists were fighting their side of the battle in all sorts of clandestine ways, and doubtless still are. Was it wrong to use CIA funds to combat them? Was it adopting Communist tactics? When is it legitimate to "fight fire with fire"? When is it not?

Under the circumstances of the late 'forties and early 'fifties, subsidy of various anti-Communist activities was hardly to be avoided without giving up the struggle ingloriously, scarcely before it began. Now we have proceeded far beyond that point. Western Europe is strong. The free trade-union movement can look out for itself, though some unions in some countries are still infiltrated. The game is far from over.

I do not hold much with the theory of "fighting fire with fire." There is always danger of self-destructive weapons. Freedom is a powerful tool, and freedom is strongest when it is totally in the open. Secret subsidies carry dangerous seeds of corruption and dishonesty. But there are international tasks that must be financed, hopefully in the open.

Taxpayers pay

The taxpayers, after all, pay the whole costs of CIA. All the money comes from the same ultimate place — every American's pocketbook. Is there no way by which the device of the public corporation, openly financed either by tax money or contributions, can be used to pay for things that have to be done? Cannot we increase the scale of legitimate private foundation support in such areas?

Of course, such things as paying for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Paris trip with CIA funds are plain silly. Soon it was done differently. The good musicians found themselves on the State Department's open cuff. It is now said that CIA financing may first have been used because open funding would have required security clearance and some of the musicians may have had dubious politics in their backgrounds. Could be. But how silly and how tragic, too.

Some hope

There is some hope that we have grown up. But we should not exaggerate the errors of our past. The United States, and likeminded nations and peoples, have fought a pretty good fight these years against infiltration. Communism is weaker by far within the institutions of the non-Communist nations than it was in the late 1940's. People are thinking for themselves. Though they criticize the United States vigorously and enthusiastically, they refrain from swallowing Communist dogma, too.

The CIA is being shrunk back to its essential task of intelligence work, or so it seems.

The battle within labor around the world goes on. Nowhere is it more essential than in Latin America, where very effective support of free trade unions has been carried out by an agreement between United States employers and labor leaders. These things can be done — the right way.

261

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

MAY 13 1967

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

No One's Perfect

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

EVERYONE KNOWS the old story of the Quaker who told his wife that no one in this world was perfect "excepting thee and me and not even thee some times."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had three musical directors since it first came to the Berkshires in the summer of 1936: Koussevitzky, Munch and the incumbent Leinsdorf. Each one has been a man of great musical stature but individual in his every approach and in the execution of whatever he chose to concentrate on. Every conductor has his favorite composers, his special interests in the literature as well as his own methods and idiosyncrasies in performance. The Boston leaders have afforded their audiences much gratification, but even landslides in politics are far from unanimous. There has always been cavil in Boston as in every orchestral household and as there is and always has been in politics in Washington.

* * *

WE MAY HAVE opposing opinions about many things in music, such as in the choice of programs and their execution, but when you give one person the responsibility of constructing, preparing and performing a concert, at least you must further allow him his own way of doing and stating things. But as careful and meticulous as he may be, there are always details, if not larger segments, of a work which do not come out as planned. The most unexpected factors may interfere.

There are few musical events—small or large ensembles or even solo performances—in which some slight deviation from plan does not occur. A string may break; a wind-instrument player's throat or nostril may develop a temporary hindrance; a mosquito, invisible from the audience, may make an unscheduled visit; a page can refuse to get turned, or a performer may grab two at a time; somebody in the audience may distract a player for an instant. A million things can, and do, happen, but the average professional musician has enough experience and sang-froid to carry on without betraying that anything has gone awry.

* * *

THERE WAS a famous incident at Parma during a performance of "Rigoletto" in which the Gilda of the evening went astray vocally and the whole audience, obviously as familiar with the Verdi masterpiece as were the artists on stage, prompted the temporarily befuddled soprano with unanimity and the deepest of empathy. Another similar incident occurred when the New York Philharmonic Orchestra on tour was to give a concert in Tchaikovsky Hall in Moscow. A member of the orchestra's staff was giving an introductory message to the audience, in Russian, to be sure, when he stumbled over a pertinent phrase and the entire audience with one sympathetic voice supplied the proper and needed word.

Arthur Schnabel was once listening to a playback of a Beethoven piano sonata he had just recorded. The slip of a single finger became evident as a wrong note sounded. The recording engineers offered to excise the offending passage and let him replay the phrase accurately which they then would insert. Schnabel objected. He said that he thought that the spirit of the music, even with the incorrect note, was so exactly as he wanted to express it that he would prefer to let the imperfect performance remain rather than replace it with a more accurate but possibly duller one.

* * *

MILTON KATIMS, conductor of the Seattle symphony, told of his first appearance in the National Broadcasting Co. orchestra under Toscanini. He had won the coveted place at the first desk of the violas, but in the very first concert he barged in at an improper moment and sullied an otherwise clean and clear performance. He couldn't wait, he remembered, to get backstage after the concert to tell the maestro how mortified he was to have spoiled the evening. Toscanini laid his hand on Katim's shoulder and told him, "It even sounded good."

Maggie Teyte, the late great singer and Debussy specialist, gave a recital in Williamstown some years ago at which she sang some of the numbers for which she was so famous. At the conclusion of one she told her audience with disarming candor, "I can do it better than that," and, turning to her accompanist, said: "Let's do it again."

* * *

STRINGS NOT only break but get out of tune while they are being played, bow hair gets less taut as a performance goes along, a drop of perspiration starts a ski-run down the facial slopes of a momentarily unresourceful and defenseless soloist, some detail of a performer's costume annoys or embarrasses him. One's imagination cannot possibly set down the whole catalogue of possibilities. Fortunately, very, very few performances are even temporarily disrupted. Under the most aggravating conditions the show goes on.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,200

MAY 20 1967

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

To Be a Conductor

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

BERLIOZ PLAYED a flute and a guitar; Koussevitzky, the double bass; Monteux, viola; Munch, violin; Bernstein, Leinsdorf and Szell, piano; Toscanini, cello. The only vocalist I can recall who became a big time conductor was Georg Henschel who was selected to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Henry Lee Higginson founded it in 1881. Henschel, incidently, was 31 at the time. He lived to be 84 and after his Boston stint returned to London where he continued to be held in the highest esteem as a vocal coach. He numbered among his pupils the venerated Roland Hayes long after he had been established as one of our proudest vocal exhibits.

* * *

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI on his 85th birthday April 17 declared that the modern orchestra is so complex that when he took over the Philadelphia Orchestra (in 1912), he went to Paris every summer to study a new instrument. "I learned trumpet, trombone, tuba, everything. I did not want to annoy my players by asking them something about the nature of their instrument."

Anyone who thinks it would be nice to become a conductor because all you have to do is to swing a baton all evening is a trifle naive. A conductor should, first of all, know all the orchestral instruments, and if at first hand, all the better. A conductor whose instrument is the piano can sometimes make himself look pretty ridiculous to the musicians before him if he doesn't know what the strings, for example, are capable of or incapable of, or how a vibrato is manipulated or a string most opportunely crossed, or if he asks for certain effects from the winds when he doesn't quite know how their tone is produced.

* * *

TOO MANY estimates of the ability of a conductor are derived from the impact on the audience of a series of final crash-bangs played with full force and unanimous precision. This can be the least requirement of the conductor. An orchestral score presents an incomprehensible diagram to a novice or to a professional as a blueprint to an engineer.

A conductor working in material employing voices finds it imperative or, at least, mighty convenient to learn the vocal demands of the work. Many of them sing along or mouth the syllables as they direct. A man immersed in the mere notes of his score cannot sense and hence signal an accent while his singer is in untenable equilibrium.

* * *

THERE HAVE been so-called infant prodigy conductors. It is within the limits of possibility that a musically inclined youngster, or an uninstructed oldster, for that matter, could make certain indications to an ensemble to which experienced musicians could execute passable performances. He might establish an acceptable tempo and maintain precision, even display a degree of flexibility in ritards, for instance. But to produce an individual package combining tonal balance, dynamics, intelligent contrasts and all the details of a disciplined performance takes time, study, experience and talent. Even the "born" conductor has to acquire these attributes.

Even the most gifted have pretty limited repertories at the beginning of their careers, a fact which has prevented the nomination of a few outstanding talents from being chosen for posts of long-season responsibilities. To be sure, mose students get to know the orchestral repertory so that it is pretty familiar to them after deep immersion in the musical whirlpool. But to do more than merely beat time is another matter. To penetrate the essence of the composer's message is not an instant accomplishment.

* * *

CONDUCTORS HAVE their favorites and preferences. When Charles Munch made his American debut with the French Broadcasting Orchestra, his major offering of the concert was the Berlioz "Fantastic" Symphony. When he came to Boston for his first guest appearance with the Boston Symphony, the anchors of his program was the "Fantastic." After being engaged as the orchestra's musical director, his first program was weighted again with the same Berlioz. When he took the orchestra on tour in this country or, in 1952, on its European tour, every program included the Berlioz. He became known as a Berlioz specialist and he merited the honor. He did it well and obviously felt most secure in it. But for those whose lot it was to sit before him at the desks or whose duty it was to sit in the audience and hear the symphony six, seven, eight or more times, it became somewhat like being served roast beef eight times in a row—no matter how renowned the chef.

* * *

IT IS ONLY within a fairly short few generations that the vocation of conductor has become so glamorous. There was no one who merely swung a baton in Bach's day. Indeed, the leader either sat at a keyboard and indicated whatever was essential as he, too, played along, or the concertmaster directed from his post at the head of the violins. The early conductors faced the audience, believe it or not. It was Mendelssohn who is credited with having been the first to turn his back to the audience and to look at his musicians. He also wore white gloves. Wagner did away with a few of the remaining foppish ornaments of the craft and got down to the business of making music.

There is a good chance that orchestral playing today is far more expert than was tolerated a century and more ago when musicians were so poorly paid they had to do some sort of moonlighting. There are few surer thrills than the spectacle of a symphony orchestra executing any item of the repertory with serried ballet rhythmic discipline, and producing "charms to soothe the savage breast."

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

MAY 17 1967

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Bill

The Senate passed the bill to allow the Boston Symphony Orchestra to hold additional property, up to $40 million.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 61,100

MAY 15 1967

New England Newsclip

Music: Assumption Dedication Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The authoritative and worthily-voiced Gilbert and Anna Chabot Memorial Organ was formally dedicated yesterday afternoon in beautiful Hebert Memorial Auditorium at Assumption Preparatory School.

Berj Zamgochian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed a program that united musical value with a substantial demonstration of the instrument's resources.

It is a two-manual Wicks Organ.

Zamgochian is a thoroughly sound musician. He has an ample technique which he uses wisely. His dedication to the music he plays was illustrated by his reverent comments about his incentive for arranging "Hymn of Vesting" from the divine liturgy of the Armenians.

A disclosure of the instrument's high range potency was made in the introduction to Handel's "Concerto No. 2 in B flat major." This particular quality re-occurred frequently during the program.

The impression was one of brassy largess and pomp. The spirited opening movement was spun with clean technique and a good supply of tonal color.

Special attributes of the Handel were an impressive pedal cadenza and effective choice of solo stops for the recitative — styled adagio.

Bach chorale-preludes were exemplary of fleet fingerwork, soulful harmonic patterns in rich tonal fabric, and expansive effects.

The Bach "Toccata in D minor" was well-ordained and effectively brilliant. The accompanying Fugue was alertly paced, and made frequent alternations of keyboard for contrasted coloration.

Two episodes of warmly-toned reflection were Franck's "Cantabile" and "Pastel No. 3" by Karg-Elert, although the latter progresses to heavy sonorities. Both gave clear accounts of the instrument's poetic capacities.

An "Impromptu" by Louis Vierne wa a model of digital velocity. The Armenian "Hymn of Vesting" featured winding melody with modal intervals engaged in impulsive rhythmic figures.

Bossi's "Giga" proved to be a pert, energetic little work of considerable technical finesse.

Manari's "Concert Study for Pedals" on the Theme "Salve Regina" was a tour de force in ornate passage weaving. It was a spirited if not tonally flawless performance.

A large audience was most enthusiastic.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

MAY 15 1967

New England Newsclip

EXPRESS (e)
NEWPORT, VT.
CIRC. 4,150

MAY 23 1967

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Artist

Recital Held on Dedication Of Assumption Prep Organ

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

The beautiful Hebert Memorial Auditorium of Assumption Preparatory School was nearly filled yesterday for the dedicatory recital by Berj Zamkochian, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the Gilbert and Anna Chabot Memorial Organ.

This Wicks 20-rank instrument of the new open-tone type memorializes the Parents of the Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A and is a gift of the family.

Zamkochian did a highly creditable piece of work, playing from memory practically all of the varied and taxing program.

The volume and timbre seem well suited too the size of the auditorium, and highly adaptable to a varety of uses and needs. The console is movable.

Demanding Performance

The sturdier voices were displayed in Handel's Concerto No. 2 in B flat major and in Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor. These also naturally contained some of the most demanding and skilled playing of the afternoon.

Three chorale preludes of Bach were strongly contrasted. "Rejoice Ye Christian Men" had a colorful theme against rapid background filigree. "My Heart Is Filled With Longing" brought warmth and poignancy. "Now Salvation Is Come to Earth" returned to the use of the great organ.

"Mood music," presenting various aspects of the organ came in Franck's "Cantabile," Vierne's "Impromptu" and Karg-Elert's "Pastel No. 3."

Bossi's "Giga" was a study in perpetual motion.

A different flavor entered the program with Zamkochian's own arrangement of the "Hymn of Vesting" from the Armenian Divine Liturgy. This had mysticism and Eastern modality.

Manari's Concert Study for Pedals on the Theme, "Salve Regina" was impressive in technique without being too centered on virtuosity. The encore, "Toccata" by C. Alexander Peloquin of Rhode Island, was rousing fare, logical both in its fleet themes and its final dissonances.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

JAN 8 1967

Symphonies

They're Making More Music

By JOAN SIMMONS

A lot of people are making a lot of music across the country if the American Symphony Orchestra League's survey of the 1965-66 symphonic season is a reliable indication.

The number of symphony orchestras operating in the country last year was set at 492 by this survey. Esitmates from other sources have ranged as high as 1200 to 1400.

The American Symphony Orchestra League, which conducted the survey in cooperation with Broadcast Music, Inc., omitted 800 orchestras from its calculations because of the paucity of their public performances. Although the exact number of concerts required was not specified by the agency making the survey for the two organizations, Broadcast Music Inc. stated that the dividing line was assumed to be three concerts or less.

According to these standards the Albany Symphony would have been included on the strength of a single concert, having given four performances in the season in question.

No other Capital District organization would seem to qualify under the current survey, but the Northeastern New York Philharmonia and the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra, both based at Union College in Schenectady, would meet the terms for the current season.

SOME MUSIC MAKERS—Clockwise, from top left: Edgar Curtis, founder-director of Northeastern New York Philharmonia and Northeastern New York Student Orchestra; Julus Heigyi, director of the Albany Symphony; Claude Monteaux, director of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic; Engene Ormandy of the Philadelphia which summers here and Erich Leinsdorf whose Boston Symphony also summers in the area; and Wolfgang Mozart, whose works lead the concert repertoire.

In First Season

The former is just a year old, making this its first full season with a schedule of 23 concerts. The Student Orchestra was initiated at the beginning of the 1965-66 season and this year is presenting ten performances.

The Albany Symphony Orchestra has expanded its subscription series by one concert for the current year. In addition it has "sold" an additional concert which

See SYMPHONIES, P.-2

Figures Show Mozart Most Popular Composer

Here is a breakdown on the popularity of some of the composers and musical eras as reflected in the 4,871 concerts staged by the 492 orchestras included in the American Symphony Orchestra League study. The survey covered the 1965-66 concert season in which a total of 19,375 works were performed.

Composer or Era	Works Performed
Mozart (most popular composer)	1,298
Beethoven (second)	1,202
Brahms (third)	776
20th Century Composers	6,720
Stravinsky	326
Ravel	288
Copland	167
Bernstein	136
Barber	105
Bartok	105

Symphonies: A National Survey Finds Them Making More Music

Continued from Page F-1

was presented in Menands in November.

The breakdown of the types of orchestras included in the nationwide survey bears an interesting resemblance to the current local situation. Of the 492 organizations, 146, or more than one-fourth, are youth orchestras, similar in make-up to the Northeastern New York Student Orchestra which includes area high school and college students with a general age range of 15 to 21 years.

The number of youth orchestras included both city or community-wide organizations, such as the Student Orchestra, and specific high school and college orchestras. None of the area school orchestras qualified because of the lack of public performances.

Of the 346 "adult" orchestras surveyed, there were 276 community orchestras consisting primarily of amateurs. It is in this category that the Albany Symphony would be included. The dividing line for "professional" and "amateur" is only vaguely defined.

It includes musicians like members of the Albany Symphony who are members of the American Federation of Musicians, the national musicians union, but who make their livlihoods as everything from court stenographers to teachers and housewives. Also covered are organizations like the Northeastern New York Philharmonia, whose members work entirely within their field of music although not exclusively as performers.

Rest Professional

The remainder of the orchestras studied were divided into 43 "metropolitan" orchestras of professional standing and 27 "major" orchestras, of course also entirely professional in make-up.

The divisions into categories is based on the annual budget. Major orchestras are lead by the Boston and Philadelphia Symphonies and the New York Philharmonic, all with annual budgets of approximately $3,000,000. To be eligible for a "major" designation an orchestra must spend at least $500,000 a year according to generally accepted standards.

Metropolitan Orchestras range from $100,000 to $500,000 in annual expenditures. In this category are such organizations as the Hudson Valley Philharmonic based in Poughkeepsie. Operating on a budget in excess of $125,000 this orchestra derives its support from the entire mid-Hudson area, performing from Chatham southward.

The 492 orchestras gave a total of 4,871 concerts during the period in question, making an average of almost ten per ensemble. Of course there are many in the ranks of the Albany Symphony with four or five concerts annually as opposed to the top orchestras. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, claims a "54 week" season annually for that organization, a feat which makes it responsible for a good number of the total annual concerts.

19,375 Works Played

In further breakdowns, the orchestras performed a total of 19,375 different works of which 6,720 were by Twentieth Century composers, an amazingly high percentage for this group. More astonishing at first glance is the fact that of the 783 composers represented in the year's program's, 573 worked or work in this century or were "modern" composers.

On second glance this would appear more plausible when one considers the large number of works of major classical composers that are prominent on concert circuits as compared to the relatively few works per composer among those still actively composing.

The survey bears this out attributing an entirely predictable 1,298 performances for works of Mozart, the most frequent "favorite" choice by most serious music lovers. Beethoven came close with 1,202 performances. Beethoven would appear to be the local favorite with his Third, Fifth and Ninth symphonies being among the most popular ever written. All were performed in this area last season, the Ninth receiving three presentations within four months.

Brahms came in third with 776 performances.

Stravinsky First

Of the 20th Century composers Stravinsky ranked first with 326 followed by Ravel with 288. Of composers active since 1938 (contemporary) Aaron Copland came in first with 167 performances. Copland was a popular local choice among the contemporaries even conducting some of his own works at Tanglewood. Also among the contemporaries were Leonard Bernstein with 136 and Samuel Barber and Bela Bartok each with 105.

All were represented in area performances although the proportions in relation to the national figures are more complicated than we care to tackle.

The final consideration is the source of finance for this extensive activity. The Philadelphia Orchestra boasts a high earning power of 86 per cent of its annual budget. The earning power nationally ranges from almost nothing to a mean of about 50 per cent, with only a few of the major orchestras nearing Philadelphia's claim.

The second source of income are grants from state local and federal governments as well as private foundations and businesses.

The Hudson Valley Philharmonic derives a large part of its financial backing from area businesses combined with various grants. Often grants, like those of the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations, are offered on a matching basis with equal amounts raised from local business.

The Northeastern New York Philharmonia and Student Orchestra are both primarily dependent upon a federal grant under Title Three of the 1964 Education Act. The terms of this grant forbid charging an admission fee thus eliminate an earned income for concerts financed by the grant. Union College also subsidizes certain operating expenses of both orchestras.

The Albany Symphony is entirely dependent upon earned income and business support. The only monetary gift received by the Symphony in recent seasons is a small grant from the Albany League of Arts.

263

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 635,619 SUN. 1,337,277
NOV 22 1966

Air Shuttle Continues to Grow,

Musician boards shuttle at La Guardia with bass fiddle. Airline charged half-fare for it.

3 Million a Year Line Up For Guaranteed Seating

By EVERT CLARK

An Eastern Air Lines official, discussing that phenomenon of air travel known as the Eastern air shuttle, said recently:

"A Frankenstein's monster is what it is. It walks, it talks, it growls—but how do you control it?"

He meant that the shuttle, as usual, was growing and changing at a faster rate than the airline could cope with gracefully, an airline within an airline, run as much by passenger demand and other outside factors as by the company.

One of the most successful ideas in transportation history, the shuttle is said to be the only new way of handling passengers in more than 30 years of air travel in this country. Yet today the shuttle has its problems: old planes, crowded airways, congested terminals, uneven floods of passengers. Nevertheless an airline management that finally made the shuttle stop losing money intends to keep it flying.

The shuttle is a guaranteed-seat, no-reservation service linking Washington, New York, Newark and Boston. But that is like saying an airplane is a long, slender tube that flies.

The shuttle is a happening, a social and business tool, a V.I.P. airline without V.I.P. frills, a way of life for commuters between some of the most vital political, cultural and economic power-centers of the 20th century.

It is air travel in microcosm, a laboratory for the study of passenger habits and transportation innovations, a conversation piece, a nightmare and a boon for its operators and its users.

On its first day, five and a half years ago, the shuttle carried 640 passengers. Tomorrow, Eastern expects it to carry 20,000—most of them college students going home for Thanksgiving.

Each holiday the students help to strain the shuttle to the utmost and swell its total, which has exceeded 12 million passengers and now averages more than three million a year. Since the shuttle began, only two persons have been killed, both in a collision with another plane near the New York-Connecticut border.

In pre-shuttle days Eastern carried only 40 per cent of the Washington-New York area air traffic and 35 per cent of the New York area-to-Boston traffic. It now carries 86 per cent and 76 per cent, respectively.

If the shuttle were split off from Eastern's other operations it would rank ninth among the nation's major domestic air carriers and 16th among the 95 major world airlines.

But it is not so much an airline as a convenience.

Prominent Riders

The wife of a prominent New York banker once shuttled to Boston because a rug was several hundred dollars cheaper there. Arthur Goldberg, United States Representative to the United Nations, often shuttles several times a week, and last Friday's shuttle travelers included Lynda Bird Johnson (flanked by three Secret Service men), Under Secretary of State and Mrs. Nicholas Katzenbach, Cardinal Spellman and the Secretary General to the North Atlantic Treaty Organizations, Manlio Brosio.

The key to the shuttle—and to Eastern's frustrations — is the guaranteed seat. It means that a passenger can show up at a shuttle gate without a reservation, and, if he is on time, he is certain of a ride.

Shuttle flights are scheduled for the hour or the half-hour, depending on the city. But as soon as the first plane fills up, even if it is before departure time, that plane wheels away from the gate and another "section" (airplane plus crew) is rolled out to handle the leftovers. Many times in a week a second, third or fourth section is required, so that planes are leaving every 15 or 20 minutes.

Sixteen times Eastern has flown an extra section for a single passenger, to prove that a seat really is guaranteed.

Occasionally seating poses a minor problem. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, some 90 players strong, showed up unexpectedly at Boston's Logan Airport one night to go to New York. Eastern hauled an extra section out of the hangar, so the symphony could fly.

All the instruments went into the baggage compartment, except the bass fiddle. It rode, at half fare, strapped into a seat beside the bull-fiddle player.

"Cellos, drums—all that other stuff is no problem," an Eastern aide said. "It all goes into the baggage compartment. But not bull fiddles. They won't give them up; they just won't give them up. A bull-fiddle player won't walk without his fiddle."

Eastern's wags like to pretend that a great fear permeates those who run the shuttle. Some night, they say, a 95-member orchestra—and a bull fiddle—will show up to ride on a 95-seat Lockheed Electra or Lockheed Constellation, and Eastern will have to roll out another plane to carry a bull fiddle at half fare.

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,372 SUN. 86,562
SEP 20 1966

Letters to the Editor

Let's Make City True Music Center

When I visit in other Tennessee cities somebody is sure to tell me that they envy me. Because I live in Chattanooga, that Great Music Center of the Southland. Then I give my accustomed snarl and ask: "Are you sure we are talking about the same Chattanooga? Would you mind repeating what you say, in the presence of our three TV channels and our some ten radio stations?" Because clearly they have not heard the word, they do not recognize that there may be quite as many music lover as aficionadas of high school football—or even national baseball.

True, we have extraordinarily devoted members of the Symphony Guild or the Opera Guild, who put in longer hours at the telephone than any operator of a stocking machine. I understand they are struggling to assure a full house for our two operas—count 'em, while Atlanta has a week, and people begging. True, the Symphony Guild is still trying to fill a thousand seats. If our V.I.P. industrialists are too tired for an evening of symphonic music they might buy a $5 pool ticket, which will go to music students or Senior Neighbors, who love music and cannot afford it. And if members of the Chamber of Commerce, or the Mayor, or the Councils, who yearn for more and more industrial establishments, would consider the experience of other cities—Louisville, Ky., Atlanta, Ga.—they would notice that the cultural tone of a city determines the placement of many plants, because it is often hard to find excellent industrial managers, and these managers want a cultural climate for their children. Maybe music, also.

Since TV is increasingly disgusting, I was thrilled, a few Sundays back, to turn on the station that had advertised, Mirabile dictu, a live broadcast from Tanglewood, Mass. I have always loved the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have heard it in Boston, and in those wooded acres where the students sit on blankets outside the shell, and the white birches grow tall. What did I get? A long drawn out baseball game, with a few late flickers of a magnificent pianist. And I don't like baseball. Shoot, if you must, this old grey head!

Now, tonight, the first Metropolitan Opera opening in 75 years. From New York's vast Lincoln Center. This is a night to wait for! Alas, this is a night for a local football tussle. Actually, I like football. But I am heartbroken, I am real Mad. There should be some sponsors, some stations, willing to recognize that some of Chattanooga — Tennessee —not Mississippi, Not Alabama, down to earth old Tennessee, some of our citizens want to see Chattanooga as the music center of our Southland.

—LORINE PRUETTE, Ph.D.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 280,100
MAY 7 1967
New England Newsclip

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Extend Esplanade Concerts

To the Editor of The Herald:

Ere long Mr. Fiedler will move with his orchestra from Symphony Hall to the Shell on the Esplanade. Then after too few concerts the beautiful shell will be silent and it should not be silent.

There is nothing lovelier in Boston than a summer evening on the banks of the Charles—the little boats with their red sails and the sunsets—then as the twilight wanes, the lights, one by one stud the buildings on the opposite shore. Thousands of people enjoy these evening concerts and what finer entertainment do we have to offer tourists?

Aren't there other orchestras who can carry on after Mr. Fiedler departs?

If allowing the Shell to remain like a ghost for so many weeks is caused by lack of funds, it is none too soon to think about a 'money for music" campaign. There seem to be funds for everything under the sun—or what about the old fashioned "pass the hat?"

We must have Esplanade concerts all through the summer evenings!

ETHEL L. JACKSON
Brookline

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 835,000 SUN. 1,500,000
FEB 26 1967

ANVIL

There is a forge in Millstone Valley, N. J., that is reputedly the oldest extant in this country, dating from about 1690. When struck with a hammer, one of the anvils—not the most historic but the largest — gives off just the right sound for Robert Moevs's latest composition, "Et Occidentem Illustra." Accordingly it was shipped up to Boston last week for use in the premiere of the work by the Boston Symphony on Friday. It is accompanying the orchestra for repetitions of the work at the State University of New Jersey in New Brunswick on Thursday and Carnegie Hall on Saturday.

The discovery of the anvil by Moevs, who lives in the forge's vicinity, gave him more than musical satisfaction. It added to the historical associations of his work. This was commissioned by the Jersey institution, still known as Rutgers, to commemorate the bicentennial of its charter last year. Now in his third year as composer-in-residence at Rutgers, the 46 - year - old Moevs adapted the university motto for his title. His text—the work is for chorus and orchestra — comes from Dante's "Inferno," which was 700 years old in 1965. And Millstone Valley was where Rutgers moved when New Brunswick became headquarters for the British during the Revolutionary War.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,100
FEB 25 1967

Pianist Foss, the protégé of Serge Koussevitzky, bows to a Tanglewood audience after performing the solo part in a Bach concerto. Leading the orchestra's applause is concertmaster Richard Burgin.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,750
MAY 27 1967
New England Newsclip

Svetlana May Work With BSO

By MARGO MILLER
Globe Critic

Svetlana Alliluyeva may do the narration in a Boston Symphony-RCA Victor recording of the children's classic, "Peter and the Wolf," by Prokofiev.

"Peter" had its American premiere in Symphony Hall Mar. 25, 1938, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, a friend of the composer.

Negotiations between Mrs. Alliluyeva, who found asylum in the United States last month, and the recording company are pending.

The Boston orchestra has been doing a series of recordings of Prokofiev's orchestra music for RCA, "Peter" had tentatively been scheduled for December performances, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and a narrator to be selected.

In the form of a fairy tale, "Peter" also introduces children to the instruments of the orchestra. It was an instant success in Moscow, where its premiere was given on May 2, 1936.

Prokofiev's connections with the Boston Symphony go back to the Koussevitzky era. Many of the American premieres of his works were given here and his Symphony No. 4 was written as a commission for the orchestra's 50th anniversary, 1930-31.

The Boston public and press found this Symphony hard to take. Angered, Prokofiev said he would write something they could understand. This turned out to be "Peter."

During the Stalin era, Prokofiev and other Russian composers were criticized for writing "difficult" music. The decree for public performance was for simple music that simple people could enjoy. This ban on experimentation has gradually been ignored.

It is believed that Mrs. Alliluyeva's name and her pleasing personality at television press conferences made her a natural for the BSO-RCA project.

Public figures are often called upon to narrate "Peter." Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt did it at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony for a war-relief benefit.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 532,600

MAY 7 1967

New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Replies to a Critic

'I Consider Masterworks Inviolable'

"I belong to that quaint school of men who consider masterworks inviolable," Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declares in a letter to the Globe in which he stoutly defends the autonomy of art.

The letter was written in reply to an attack on the orchestra for the Holy Week performance of Bach's The Passion According to St. John for its "anti-Semitism."

The exchange of letters between the critic, Arthur Korb of Newton Centre, Globe music critic Michael Steinberg and Leinsdorf follows in sequence:

Korb writes: "It's been years since I heard this work in a concert hall, and it came as a shock to hear the Jews described as godless, sadistic beings, thirsting for the gentlest and holiest of all men. I couldn't help but think what a smash hit this must have been in Germany under Hitler.

"No amount of rationalization can soften the impact of that picture of the Jews as a people guilty of the most horrible crime of the ages (a picture made more powerful because of the beautiful music of the score), guilty not just 2000 years ago but now, as we hear it told again. This is part and parcel of the very thing that Pope John and now Pope Paul renounced, and that finally moved the Catholic hierarchy itself to 'absolve' the Jewish people of guilt, and Catholic texts are being revised, though opposition continues, as does anti-Semitism.

"I believe the St. John Passion text should and could be modified in such a way that none of the power or beauty of the total concept will be lost. The solution is simply to refer to the Jews not as Jews but as 'the people.' To Jesus, the Jews were still 'His people' and the world consisted of only them and the Roman conquerors. He would not have referred to them as though they were different from him, as does this text. Without getting involved in theology, since it is not necessary, I point out that Bach himself didn't hesitate to cut, change and edit the score, and I think he'd approve of this change, were he alive today."

Steinberg comments: "This has come up often in connection with Bach's Passion settings. Only a year ago, Lukas Foss, for the performances of the St. John Passion that he conducted at a series of New York Philharmonic concerts, made almost the very changes Korb suggests; however, the changes were unsympathetically received by most listeners.

"One relevant point is that one must understand the texts of the Bach Passions whole, that is, the gospel plus the commentary that is made on it in the arias and chorales. This commentary exists in order to remind the Lutheran congregation that was Bach's audience for these works, that Jesus died on the cross not because of the emnity of the Jews, but to atone for the sin of all mankind since the fall of Adam. Or, to put it another way, it is the congregation's own guilt that makes the Passion and the death of Jesus necessary."

Leinsdorf writes: "While I had only one letter protesting against any part of the text as it appears in the Passion According to St. John, I am glad to reply to the significant letter which you received from Korb. He proposes changes in the text, perhaps unaware that a recent performance by a venerable organization substituted an innocuous 'folk' or 'people' whenever the original says 'Jew.'

"I felt at the time that by censoring or changing the text something improper was happening. My dear sir, and all of you who would agree with him, be advised that I feel you cannot have it both ways. If you opposed the book burnings of the Nazis, if you objected and condemned the muzzling of all artists not acceptable to the Third Reich, then you must reject and condemn any effort to suppress or change a work of supreme accomplishment by one of the Evangelists and one of the great composers. If St. John and Bach can be changed with the consent of civilized people, then they invite the placing of the seal of approval by any and all vigilante groups and societies which may wish to have most of the creative heritage clorinated, sterilized and deodorized. A culture is not a hospital, and an orchestra is not a political manifesto. Any viewpoint but the liberal one will destroy all vestiges of free artistic expression. To judge what is art and what political propaganda, there are professional experts with many years of experience in most of our reputable organizations.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra Corporation appointed me on Apr. 17, 1961, to guide the musical and artistic policies of the orchestra. For the length of my adult life I have had no doubt that the Passion According to St. John by Bach is a masterwork for the ages. It belongs on our concert programs.

"As long as I hold the responsibility for this orchestra's artistic policies, the works selected will have been chosen for their merit and to be given as intended by the composers.

"I know stage personalities who prove their own religious devotion by refusing to make the sign of the cross when they play Don Carlo or Boris Godunov or Des Grieux. They do not understand the realm of imagination and make-believe, and they are ill-fitted for the chosen profession as stage performers.

"Any real performer who steps onto the stage leaves his private person in the dressing room; and the imaginative member of the audience leaves his everyday person in the cloak room.

"I belong to that quaint school of men who consider masterworks inviolable. A Goethe poem cannot be changed any more than a Beethoven sonata, nor can a fig leaf covering an Apollo do anything to conceal the small-mindedness of him who placed it on the statue.

"Culture, art, and the creative output of great men tend to resist any efforts toward conformity. And I feel that political philosophical or any other private thoughts must not be applied to works of artists, for when they are we invite dictatorial methods and thus the destruction of artistic freedom."

Chicago's AMERICAN
Always on Top of the News
D. 428,852 SUN. 498,861

APR 7 1967

Roger Dettmer

Boston Music Suffers Decline

MUSIC CRITICS WHO LIVE in glass cities, to bend the axiom, perhaps have no business throwing stones, and Lord knows our symphonic community is, by major-league measure, currently one of the country's three glassiest. How otherwise, tho, to express dismay, and distress, at the Boston Symphony's decline in five seasons under the arched eyebrows of Erich Leinsdorf?

The same orchestra that played momentous Mahler in Orchestra hall the first season of Leinsdorf's tenure returned last evening for the first of two programs in the absence, and under auspices, of our own beleaguered band —on tour until April 20. Their opening concert gave the promise, on paper, of eloquent expression as well as intellectual substance, and accordingly a large audience of the local faithful gathered to be regaled.

By prior Boston standards, however, works of Haydn, Webern, and Bruckner were conducted in greater part dispassionately, played with only modest discipline, and without the sonority that was Koussevitzky's signature until his retirement 18 seasons ago.

EVEN UNDER the volatile Munch, Koussevitzky's B-S-O "sound" prevailed, albeit sporadically in a hectic, Gallicized context. But replacements have been numerous in key chairs during Leinsdorf's administration, and his strings are the principal sufferers, especially since Richard Burgin's retirement as concertmaster.

Violins, in particular the firsts, have a steelier, thinner sound than remembered, and incline toward arpeggiated attack [releasing at will, not to say whim, on the basis of Thursday's scattered returns]. Bass strings of today favor a slow, throbbing vibrato, and have been instructed—as Chicago's celli and bass also have been, by Martinon—to lay on with a long bow.

Winds have fought the good fight to sustain whilom standards, altho flutes and reeds have a basic intonational problem if we keep in mind that this is, after all, the Boston and not Buffalo's orchestra. Brass have retained the lung-power of yore, and much of their vaunted luster, but attacks in the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner—a reading by Leinsdorf almost casual in its lack of commitment, and repeatedly in violation of the composer's tempo and dynamic indications—were divisive.

LEINSDORF led off, conducting from a two-manual, scarcely audible harpsichord aimed in at his players, with Haydn's scampering 13th Symphony, in D, for the first time in Chicago. It failed, however, in spite of prevailing precision, to skip or to sing — as the content required—and in fact plodded a good deal. When, that is to say, it didn't perish of inertia in the slow movement, afflicted with a palpitant, 19th century-style cello solo.

Leinsdorf needed four of Anton Webern's pointillistic Six Pieces, Op. 6, in the original version for large orchestra of 1909, to realize that he wasn't conducting Alban Berg instead [Fritz Reiner led their first local performance within a fortnight of the Pittsburgh premiere in America]. Playing was never, for as much as a moment, soft enough—even when the conductor refrained from correction of the composers' dynamic and tempo marking.

The concluding Bruckner, not played here since the season of 1949-50, was plainly—and to be sure sadly —an instance of interpretation without intuition, or even remarkable sympathy. Leinsdorf couldn't recall the original scherzo tempo when it returned, and elsewhere seemed to relish only the lyrical second themes in Bruckner's Brobdignagian sonata-schemes.

His manner, as well as appearance, too often reminded one of a maitre'd, in circumstances clearly requiring a maestro. And the orchestra was a consequent reflection of their leader's recreative casuistry.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 51,100

APR 11 1967

New England Newsclip

Close-Up

Five-Year Inventory

By Dan Webster

Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Stately, lithe Erich Leinsdorf glided into the room upstairs in Symphony Hall, shook hands with the press during a series of steps and bows that looked choreographed and sat down to sketch a new era with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That was five years ago. Many of the questions raised by his appointment to succeed Charles Munch have been answered; many of the answers Leinsdorf has provided have been questioned, but there is no doubt that he has put a firm imprint on that august musical institution.

With his fifth season closing, Leinsdorf was willing to take stock and look ahead, but not, he points out, to the next five years. "I won't offer a five-year plan; I'll end up sounding like a Stalinist," he joked last week during his orchestra's stop in Rochester, N.Y.

Fun And Profit

Rochester was an important city in his life and the concert there had been a pleasure for him. "Everybody stood up and it was an emotional thing for me," he said.

But looking over the five years spent near the BSO podium, Leinsdorf recalled his promise to reinstate Mozart and Haydn in repertory which had developed a distinctly French accent during Munch's 13-year regime.

"I have shifted the emphasis from the shorter pieces of the 19th and early 20th century to the short symphonies of the 18th century. I have done this quite deliberately. Haydn is the most unplayed composer we have. I think I can still do 78 symphonies which have not been performed in Boston.

Not Lost Nor Least

"He is a vastly unknown composer; with him I am never in embarrassment for an opening number.

"With Mozart, I have played a good deal, but I am planning many of the Divertimenti and I am going to explore all the Piano Concerti, many of which have not been done in Boston.

"Making programs is the most difficult part of conducting, and I don't think that three days go by without my making a change or adding something new to my plans. I do it mostly on hunches.

"I find that the more I go on and the more the public writes to me, the more complex it becomes trying to reconcile every demand of varying lines of taste. The most outspoken people are those who subscribe to short series. For some, Berg is too old fashioned and for others Bonancini too recent. I can't please everybody, but I use the letters as guides and then . . . one applies one's hunches.

"On our tour we are doing Michael Colgrass' 'As Quiet As.' I find it a very fine piece — a not too frequent reaction to a lot of recent music — and I find it has an instant appeal which I don't mind at all. I can't say I mind having a happy audience.

"We played Robert Moev's piece in New York and got a controversial response. He was upset, but I said it was music designed to rouse controversy and anyway, anything is better than indifference.

Modern Touch

"Next year, I am playing the Webern Variations and doing the Schoenberg Piano Concerto. There is no dearth of important pieces to play.

"The problem is keeping familiar works fresh for the audience and the orchestra. The point is not to do the Brahms, the Beethoven and the Tchaikovsky too frequently so the audience doesn't take them for granted. I conduct 100 concerts during the winter season and I have to be very careful to keep the old works in reserve so that when they arrive it is as if they were new and sometimes they arouse great emotions when they are rediscovered. These standbys can become a ritual and like some religious ritual, lose the meaning."

Leinsdorf left an expanding operatic career to take the BSO podium, and his contract barred him from the pit for two years. But he has kept an eye on opera by producing one each season at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, and through recordings in Rome, now that the ban is off.

Original versions have caught his attention and the uncut "Lohengrin" he premiered in 1965 paved the way to this summer's American premiere of the original "Fidelio" at Tanglewood.

"I like to go into problem works. One might as well see what a composer had in mind when he first wrote a work, before he felt the need to revise or before his friends convinced him to do it.

Obscure Opus

"This un-Fidelio was difficult to plan. We located it in some out-of-the-way publication, found the publisher had sold it to somebody else in Franconia or Swabia, and discovered the parts were missing and so on. Before we signed the singers we stressed to them that they would all have to relearn the music," he said.

Unlike other Tanglewood operas, this "Fidelio" will not be recorded. Why?

"You recall Count Bobby and the marriage broker?" Leinsdorf asked, drawing on an Austrian comic figure.

"The marriage broker told Count Bobby he had found a contessa, very beatuiful, wealthy, of an excellent family. And besides, she's a maiden.

"Count Bobby said 'I must marry a woman of good family. Rank and title is, of course, a necessity, and that she is beautiful is wonderful. But I won't marry her. If nobody else wanted her before, I don't want her either.'

"That's why we're not going to record 'Fidelio.' "

Looking ahead, he said, "In the long view, there are big works I'd like to do. Our Schumann 'Faust' was a rewarding work and I am thinking now of the 'Guerrelieder' and some more original operas.

"I'll give you a puzzle. Next year, we may do a very very popular opera which has never been performed in its original form, not even at its premiere. It's not 'Faust.' "

Answers, anyone?

BLANK PAGE

265

V771
USE 70 MANILA
REFILL
SAMUEL WARD · BOSTON

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND